The National Marine Fisheries Service in 1990 listed both populations as threatened. The western population in Alaska was listed as endangered in 1997 after a dramatic decrease was documented.

Deep Trouble As Demand For Coal Rises, Risky Mines Play Bigger Role (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

MCDOWELL, Ky. -- Last September, Timothy D. Hall was drilling holes in the deepest part of a low-roofed coal mine when an explosion thrust him from his drill machine and set him on fire.

He crawled 45 feet to a mudhole inside the mine to douse the flames. The fireball melted the bill of his hard hat, charred his oxygen canister and burned his jacket, according to government investigators. After he was carried outside, but before any pain set in, he was shocked to see the flesh of his fingers had melted together.

Mr. Hall, 36 years old, survived and has regained limited use of his hands. His episode is part of an alarming upswing in coal-mining accidents, at a time when the industry is in the midst of a boom. Since May 20, seven miners have died, bringing the number of workers killed in coal-mine accidents in the U.S. this year to 33 -- compared with 22 for all of last year.

Part of the problem, some say, is a rise in the number of small, undercapitalized mines that have become economical since coal prices have surged. Miners refer to them as "dogholes."

In many cases, small operators work as contractors for big coal companies. The mine where Mr. Hall worked, for instance, was owned by J. & R. Coal Inc., and employed 23 miners. It provided coal to Consol Energy Inc., the fourth-largest coal producer in the U.S.

Roger Bentley, J. & R. Coal's owner, declined to comment on the accident. He said the mine has closed and the company is no longer in business. Thomas Hoffman, a spokesman for Consol Energy, says it reviewed the safety records of Mr. Bentley, as it does for all mine operators it contracts with, and "we thought his safety performance in the past was pretty good."

Despite the recent rash of fatalities, coal mining has gotten safer overall, due to improved technology and mining methods. In the early part of the 20th century, when there were roughly seven times as many coal miners as today, the annual death toll from accidents often exceeded 2,000 miners. In 1950, there were 643 fatalities. By 1990, the number had dropped to 66.

But higher fatality rates at small mines, which many mine-safety experts define as those employing fewer than 50 miners, have plagued the industry even in years when the overall number was falling. A report by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, which examined data from 1988 to 1997, found the fatality rate at coal mines with fewer than 50 employees was 4.24 times the rate at mines with 250 or more workers. According to data from the Labor Department's Mine Safety and Health Administration, in each of the past three years, the fatality rate at underground coal mines with fewer than 50 workers was higher than the rate for all underground coal mines.

Small mines tend to open when coal prices rise. The average price of coal from Central Appalachia -- which includes parts of Virginia, Kentucky and West Virginia -- was $58 per ton last year, up from $29 in 2002. Prices are rising in part because of increased demand for coal to generate electricity from utilities seeking an alternative to natural gas as its price has risen. Domestic steelmakers have been using more metallurgical coal, while China's rapid industrialization is also creating demand for huge amounts of coal to make steel.

"As long as prices stay high, you're going to get the marginal producers coming in to capture a share of the market," says R. Larry Grayson, chairman of the department of mining and nuclear engineering at the University of Missouri-Rolla. He says the danger of accidents increases when smaller mines proliferate because they tend to have less-experienced workers, use older equipment and mine harder-to-reach coal seams that are passed over by big companies.

Mines with fewer than 50 employees represent about 25% of all underground coal-mining jobs, according to MSHA.

Fourteen of last year's 22 deaths at underground mines, surface mines and coal-preparation plants occurred at operations with fewer than 50 employees, according to MSHA data. Of the 33 deaths this year, 11 occurred at mines with fewer than 50 employees. Five miners were killed last month following an explosion at an underground mine operated by Kentucky Darby LLC of Middlesboro, Ky., which employed 34 miners, according to MSHA. Repeated calls to the mine's office went unanswered.

"All of a sudden we're having a horrendous year in both West Virginia and Kentucky, and it's unacceptable," says Bill Caylor, president of the Kentucky Coal Association, which represents mostly big coal operators, many of which hire small contractors. But he says overall, "we've made tremendous strides and we're still pushing for safety."

Most fatalities that occur in mines of any size are the result of "freak accidents," and some are due to human error, says Mr. Caylor. The term "dogholes" is a sensational one, used by mine-safety "zealots," he adds. "But there is some legitimacy to this," he says. "There are some operators that are ruthless that have been the bad apple in the entire barrel."

More operators have opened mines to "try to make a quick profit because the coal market is high right now," says Dennis O'Dell, administrator of occupational health and safety for the United Mine Workers of America. Small mines are almost entirely nonunion, and miner advocates say workers at such operations often don't have the same protections as those at big unionized mines.

Of the 33 coal miners killed this year, three worked at unionized mines that employed at least 100 miners, according to MSHA. The other 30 worked at nonunion mines.

"More miners are at risk because of undercapitalized mines," says Tony Oppegard, a former MSHA official during the Clinton administration who is now a lawyer in Lexington, Ky., representing miners and their families. "I think the deaths are going to mount with the demand for coal."

Workers at small mines tend to be less experienced and more economically desperate than those at big mines, says Mr. Oppegard. "You've got this permanent base of unemployed people in eastern Kentucky," he says. "You'll always have people who are willing to work under whatever conditions that you impose."

Poor conditions in small operations have been linked to deaths. The 13th coal miner killed this year, Cornelius Yates, died Jan. 10 in a Pikeville, Ky., mine that employed nine. The 44-year-old was operating a machine used to drive six-foot-long bolts into the mine roof to secure it when the roof collapsed and killed him.

In that case, federal investigators determined the roof was unstable. "The condition was widespread and obvious and should have been detected by a reasonable prudent mine examiner," investigators wrote. The company was cited for safety violations related to the accident, but fines haven't been set yet, says MSHA.

James H. Blevins, owner of Maverick Mining Co., in Robinson Creek, Ky., which operated the mine, declined to comment.

Mr. Caylor, of the Kentucky Coal Association, believes the best way to improve safety is for state and federal inspectors to observe the working habits of a miner "and teach him how to work safer, rather than sitting there as a policeman, writing a ticket."

Others say enforcement needs to be tightened. In February, MSHA announced plans to toughen penalties for mine operators. One step: raising the maximum penalty for flagrant violations to $220,000 from $60,000. The agency said its penalty structure is 25 years old and needs updating.

Last week, the U.S. Senate passed broad mine-safety legislation that requires coal mines to store more oxygen underground, sets stricter fines and mandates use of wireless communications devices in mines within three years, among other things. The bill is pending in the House.

MSHA has recognized safety woes of small mines. In 2003, it opened the Small Mine Office to help mines with five or fewer employees, by providing safety guides, among other things. Mines of this size "do not have the resources to have sophisticated health-and-safety programs," said David Dye, MSHA's acting administrator, in a speech last fall.

"Technology is one of the factors that has led to improvements in mining safety, and larger mines are better able to take advantage of it," says Carol Raulston, spokeswoman for the National Mining Association, which represents big operators.

Even though coal prices are up, margins can still be tight for small operators. It often costs more per ton to extract coal from lower-quality seams. Many small operators don't own the land they mine; instead they mine on a contract basis, selling the coal at below-market prices to larger operators who own the mineral rights to the property.

Ron D. Bowling, who owns a company that plans to start operations this month at a small surface coal mine in Pike County, Ky., says higher prices for mining equipment and diesel fuel are also squeezing small operators. But he says most mine owners are diligent about safety.

"All the people I know in the business, their worst nightmare is getting someone hurt on the job," says Mr. Bowling, who plans to employ 12 to 15 people at his mine.

Some experts believe drug use among miners could be contributing to accidents, and small mines often do less drug-screening than large ones. But as another recent accident at a small mine shows, there can be a mix of factors.

In December, David Sherman Morris, Jr., a 29-year-old shuttle-car operator, was killed at a 31-employee coal mine operated by H&D Mining Inc., of Cumberland, Ky. He was struck by a loaded coal hauler, used to transport coal inside the mine. The hauler severed Mr. Morris's left leg above the ankle and crushed his right leg, according to an MSHA report.

A toxicology report of Mr. Morris's blood and urine found opiates as well as cannabinoid metabolites, which are typically generated from marijuana use. Unlike conventional alcohol testing, which measures impairment at the time of the test, drug testing measures usage in recent days or even weeks. A drug test administered on the operator of the coal hauler shortly after the accident also found opiates and cannabinoid metabolites.

MSHA investigators didn't speculate on whether any drug-related impairment contributed to the accident. Instead, they pointed to errors and negligence of mine management. Investigators said a major contributing cause was that side boards -- which allow more coal to be carried -- had been attached to the coal hauler, and coal was loaded 60 inches high, obstructing the view of the person operating it. The height of the mine where the accident occurred was 67 inches.

Struck From Behind

The company's procedures for operating equipment underground placed Mr. Morris in a dangerous position when he was struck from behind, investigators said. They also determined "this injury became a fatality because basic first-aid was not properly performed" by mine personnel. No fine has been issued for the accident yet, according to MSHA.

James H. Hurley, a co-owner of H&D Mining, says the accident wasn't the company's fault. "It was just an accident," he says. "It was no fault of equipment." He also says he doesn't think better first aid would have kept the miner alive.

Mr. Hurley says state and federal inspectors who visited the mine roughly every two weeks didn't complain about the sideboards before the accident, adding that the sideboards were put on by the manufacturer and that other operators are still using them. He has since removed them.

Drugs could have played a role, Mr. Hurley says. Since the accident, he says H&D has started drug testing all new employees and randomly testing current ones.

Mine owners say they are watched closely by federal and state inspectors who cite operators for numerous minor violations, such as not having the proper paperwork on hand, as well as more serious ones.

In many cases, however, fines issued by MSHA are appealed by coal operators, and the agency says 10% to 15% go unpaid. MSHA says it doesn't have authority to shut down mines if fines aren't paid. In February, MSHA filed what it called "precedent-setting" lawsuits against two Kentucky coal operators to force payment of long-overdue fines.

Multiple Risks

Miners say raising safety concerns at small mines can mean risking one's job, as well as future employment at other mines. Mr. Hall, who was burned in the explosion last fall, says he complained several times to management that the drill he used became dangerously hot while he was operating it. He says he was rebuffed by the mine's superintendent.

Sitting in his house in McDowell, Ky., in a room that serves as a living room and a bedroom for himself, his wife and two children, Mr. Hall, a miner his entire adult life, worries he won't be able to work again. To demonstrate the limited use of his hands, he bends his wrists slightly, and the scarred skin goes taut and white. "I don't think I could ever go back underground," he says. "I still have nightmares."

As a drill operator working in a mine that was 35 inches high, on average, Mr. Hall says he earned $18 an hour. He now receives roughly $2,200 in workers' compensation payments each month.

In February, Phil Stalnaker, a lawyer in Coal Run, Ky., who is representing Mr. Hall, filed a suit against J. & R. Coal and Mr. Bentley in Letcher County Circuit Court, alleging that Mr. Hall's application for workers' compensation benefits played a significant role in his termination from the company several weeks after the accident. Darrell Hall, an attorney in Whitesburg, Ky., who is representing J. & R. Coal, declined to comment on the case.

DOJ_NMG_0030791

In March, MSHA fined J. & R. Coal $139,300, saying the accident involving Mr. Hall occurred "as a result of the operator's high negligence." MSHA cited the company for not keeping his drill and methane meters in proper condition, among other things. The fine hasn't been paid.

Mr. Bentley, the former owner of J. & R. Coal, didn't return calls seeking comment on payment of the fine.

Hints Of Oil Bonanzas Beneath Arctic Ocean (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The studies on Arctic sediment that appear today in the journal Nature tell a dramatic story of polar warming and cooling over millions of years. But what they tell petroleum geologists may be just as striking.

Though there is little mention of it in the papers, some scientists involved in the work said the huge amounts of organic material from dead algae and plants embedded in the ancient sedimentary layers suggested that the center of the Arctic Ocean could hold vast oil deposits.

Several of the researchers said they were reluctant to focus on that aspect of the work, saying it would be unfortunate if their climate studies prompted new oil exploration that could liberate more greenhouse gases and further warm the climate.

But one of the authors, Henk Brinkhuis of the University of Utrecht in the Netherlands, was not shy when he first pointed this out to reporters in 2004. This week, he said he remained confident that the prospect was real.

"The entire Arctic rim is already one big exploration machine," Dr. Brinkhuis said. "I was nearly crucified for talking about this by some of the more politically environmentally friendly people out there. But it's a fact."

If the oil exists, it would probably take decades to develop techniques for exploiting such midocean deposits, Dr. Brinkhuis and other scientists said.

Still, a quarter of the world's undiscovered oil and gas resources lie in the Arctic, according to the United States Geological Survey.

Oil companies are clearly interested in what may lie beneath the sea, said Kathryn Moran, a professor of ocean engineering at the University of Rhode Island who was a chief scientist on the drilling project that led to the new studies.

Dr. Moran said she recently gave a talk on the project at the University of Alaska, Fairbanks, and was invited at the last minute by BP, the giant oil company, to stop over in Anchorage to present the talk to 30 petroleum geologists.

"They've definitely taken note," Dr. Moran said.

Studies Portray Tropical Arctic In Distant Past (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The first detailed analysis of an extraordinary climatic and biological record from the seabed near the North Pole shows that 55 million years ago the Arctic Ocean was much warmer than scientists imagined — a Floridian year-round average of 74 degrees.

The findings, published today in three papers in the journal Nature, fill in a blank spot in scientists' understanding of climate history. And while they show that much remains to be learned about climate change, they suggest that scientists have greatly underestimated the power of heat-trapping gases to warm the Arctic.

Previous computer simulations, done without the benefit of seabed sampling, did not suggest an ancient Arctic that was nearly so warm, the authors said. So the simulations must have missed elements that lead to greater warming.

"Something extra happens when you push the world into a warmer world, and we just don't understand what it is," said one lead author, Henk Brinkhuis, an expert on ancient Arctic ecology at the University of Utrecht in the Netherlands.

The studies draw on the work of a pioneering 2004 expedition that defied the Arctic Ocean ice and pulled the first significant samples from the ancient layered seabed 150 miles from the North Pole: 1,400 feet of slender shafts of muck, fossils of ancient organisms and rock representing a climate history that dates back 56 million years.

While there is ample fossil evidence around the edges of the Arctic Ocean showing great past swings in climate, until now the sediment samples from the undersea depths had gone back less than 400,000 years.

The new analysis confirms that the Arctic Ocean warmed remarkably 55 million years ago, which is when many scientists say the extraordinary planetwide warm-up called the Paleocene Eocene Thermal Maximum must have been caused by an enormous outburst of heat-trapping, or greenhouse, gases like methane and carbon dioxide. But no one has found a clear cause for the gas discharge. Almost all climate experts agree that the present-day gas buildup is predominantly a result of emissions from smokestacks, tailpipes and burning forests.

The samples also chronicle the subsequent cooling, with many ups and downs, that the researchers say began about 45 million years ago and led to the cycles of ice ages and brief warm spells of the last several million years.

Experts not connected with the studies say they support the idea that heat-trapping gases — not slight variations in Earth's orbit — largely determine warming and cooling.

"The new research provides additional important evidence that greenhouse-gas changes controlled much of climate history, which strengthens the argument that greenhouse-gas changes are likely to control much of the climate future," said one such expert, Richard B. Alley, a geoscientist at Pennsylvania State University.

The $12.5 million Arctic Coring Expedition, run by a consortium called the International Ocean Drilling Program, was the first to drill deep into the layers of sediment deposited over millions of years in the Arctic. The samples were gathered late in the summer of 2004 as two icebreakers shattered huge drifting floes so that a third ship could hold its position and bore for core samples.

Estimates of the prevailing temperatures in the different eras represented by the sediments were made in part by tracking the comings and goings of certain algae called dinoflagellates that typically indicate subtropical or tropical conditions.

Because the samples lacked remains of shell-bearing plankton that are usually relied on to provide temperature records, the researchers used a newer method for approximating past temperatures: gauging changes in the chemical composition of the remains of a primitive phylum of microbes called Crenarchaeota.

Some scientists familiar with the research said that while there were still questions about the precision of this method at temperatures like those in the ancient Arctic Ocean, it was clear that the area was warm.

The temperatures recorded in the samples, right through the peak of warming 55 million years ago, were consistently about 18 degrees higher than those projected by computer models trying to "backcast" what the Arctic was like at the time, according to one of the papers.

Another significant discovery came in layers from 49 million years ago, where conditions suddenly fostered the summertime growth of vast mats of an ancient cousin of the Azolla duckweed that now cloaks suburban ponds. The researchers propose that this occurred when straits closed between the Arctic Ocean and the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans.

The flow of water from precipitation and rivers created a great pool of fresh water, but about 800,000 years after the blossoming of duckweed began, it ended with a sudden warming of a few additional degrees. The researchers suggest that this signaled when shifting land formations reconnected the Arctic with the Atlantic, allowing salty, warmer water to flow in, killing off the weed.

The researchers said the sediments held hints that Earth's long slide to colder conditions, and the recent cycle of ice ages and brief thaws, began quite soon after the hothouse conditions 50 million years ago. A centerpiece of their argument is a single pebble, about the size of a chickpea, found in a layer created 45 million years ago.

The stone could have been deposited on the raised undersea ridge only if it had been carried overhead in ice, said Kathryn Moran, a chief scientist on the drilling project, who teaches at the University of Rhode Island.

The stone was probably embedded in an iceberg or perhaps a plate of sea ice that tore free from a gravelly shore. It sank as the ice melted or broke apart, Dr. Moran proposed. Such "dropstones" have long been used to date when an oceanic region has been ice covered or ice free.

The amount of ice-carried debris in the sediment layers began to increase about 14 million years ago, the scientists said. That is also about when the great ice sheet that now weighs down eastern Antarctica originated, Dr. Moran noted. In general, the results from the Arctic drilling project suggest that the cooling and ice buildup at both poles happened in relative lockstep.

This simultaneity tends to support the idea that the cooling was caused by a drop in concentrations of carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping gases, which mix uniformly in the global atmosphere, said Dr. Moran and other members of the team.

Julie Brigham-Grette of the University of Massachusetts, an expert in past Arctic climates who was not connected with the new studies, cautioned against giving too much significance to the single sample, and particularly the single stone from 45 million years ago.

Dr. Brigham-Grette said it was vital to try to mesh the new core results with data gathered around Arctic coasts, where there is plenty of evidence for warm conditions in at least some places as recently as 2.4 million years ago.

Despite her doubts, she said, the project was a stunning achievement.

"It's all very, very exciting to me, because now we can start to rewrite the history of the Arctic," Dr. Brigham-Grette said. "It's like working a giant landscape puzzle of 500 pieces. For a while we only had 100 pieces. Now we have 100 more, and the picture is getting clearer."

Corporate America Warms To Fight Against Global Warming (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Corporate leaders don't normally invite the federal government to raise their taxes. But that's exactly what Paul Anderson is doing.

Anderson, the chairman of Charlotte-based Duke Energy, wants the federal government to fight global warming by taxing companies based on the "greenhouse gases" they pump into the atmosphere — just the sort of big-government remedy the Bush administration says would hobble the economy.

For his efforts, Anderson has been excoriated by conservative talk radio host Rush Limbaugh and threatened with an "exorcism" by an industry peer.

But Anderson, 61, is no closet left-winger. He's a registered Republican, Bush backer and member of the president's Council of Advisors on Science and Technology. That such a Big Business stalwart is demanding federal action on climate change illustrates an unmistakable evolution in corporate thinking, motivated both by evidence that global warming already is affecting the economy and by the prospect of fat profits from new environment-friendly products.

"If we approach this rationally, it will not be disruptive to the economy and will not turn the world upside down and will, at the same time, address the problem," says Anderson.

Corporate America, which once regarded cries of "global warming" about as favorably as The Communist Manifesto, increasingly is embracing the need for reducing human contributions to the planet's rising temperatures. Forty companies — including Boeing, IBM, John Hancock and Whirlpool — have publicly endorsed the notion that climate change is real by joining a business council organized by the Pew Center on Global Climate Change.

Electric power companies are the single largest industrial emitter of carbon dioxide, the chief chemical culprit in "global warming." But Duke Energy on the East Coast, California's PG&E on the West Coast, and other utilities see mandatory federal emission caps as preferable to the current patchwork of state regulations they confront. A uniform national standard would eliminate costly uncertainties hanging over investment decisions on new multibillion-dollar power plants, they say.

It's not just power companies that are agitating for action. Institutional investors are demanding that companies disclose their financial exposure to future climate changes. Insurers are abandoning underwriting in coastal areas threatened by costly Hurricane Katrina clones, and companies such as General Electric and DuPont are gearing up to prosper from the transition to a carbon-constrained world. Last year, Goldman Sachs Chairman Henry Paulson, now Treasury secretary-designate, warned that the time needed to address climate change was running out.

"There's a sea change underway in American business," says Al Gore, the former vice president. "What's different in business audiences in the past year or so is a new and widespread receptivity, a keen awareness, an eagerness on the part of large numbers to find out how they can take a leadership position. And a recognition, too, that there are profits to be made."

Insurers may prove to be the canaries in the coal mine of climate change. As global temperatures rise, instances of severe weather — hurricanes, tornadoes, even hailstorms — are expected to become more intense and more damaging. Though no single event can be definitively linked to long-term warming of the atmosphere, Mother Nature is getting more costly for insurers.

Annual weather-related insured losses rose from $1 billion in the 1970s to an inflation-adjusted average $15 billion in the past decade, according to Ceres, a coalition of institutional investors and environmental groups. The group said soaring weather-related insurance claims, which it linked to the warming climate, are leading to higher premiums and greater coverage restrictions for policyholders. As private insurers flee vulnerable areas, state and local government "insurers of last resort" are being left with the bill, Ceres said.

After being battered by losses from four Florida hurricanes in 2004, Allstate last year refused to renew policies with 95,000 homeowners and 16,000 commercial property owners in the state.

"We are girding for the onslaught of the next hurricane season," Allstate CEO Ed Liddy said last month. "What's new is the intensity of this (storm) cycle could be a lot worse than things that we've seen before."

Well before climate change turns Iowa into oceanfront property, its financial impact on insurers could affect everything from building codes to land-use policy, says Tim Wagner, director of the Nebraska Department of Insurance, who chairs a National Association of Insurance Commissioners (NAIC) climate-change task force.

The panel was scheduled to kick off its deliberations last year at a September conference in New Orleans, which was washed out by Hurricane Katrina.

In Nebraska, several years of unusually severe hailstorms have prompted insurers to raise deductibles and encourage a shift to hail-resistant roofing — which costs about twice as much as a conventional asphalt roof.

The potential financial impact on insurers is so great that it threatens to paralyze policy-writing in the most vulnerable geographic areas. To ensure the industry has the financial resources to weather repeated catastrophic events, a federal reserve fund financed by a new tax on all insurance policies might be needed, Wagner says.

"Climate change is so big, it's very hard for the man-on-the-street to understand what's taking place. The plain truth of the matter is it's here and it's going to be costly," Wagner says.

A clear sign that climate concerns have moved into the financial mainstream is the growing activism of institutional shareholders. Over the past few years, investors have become increasingly worried about insufficient disclosure about the risks companies face from global warming. Under existing regulations, publicly traded companies are required to disclose to investors any information that could have a "material" impact on their financial results. There are no additional requirements governing climate-change issues.

A changing climate threatens companies throughout the economy with costs from future regulations, the physical effects of a changing landscape, even the danger of massive lawsuits, such as the claims filed against tobacco companies. In 2004, eight states and New York City sued five power companies seeking to force them to cut carbon dioxide emissions. (Last year, a federal district judge dismissed the lawsuit, saying Congress, not the courts, should set environmental policy. The plaintiffs are appealing that decision.)

A recent Mercer Investment Consulting survey of 183 institutional investors found that 44% thought climate change was "very" or "somewhat important" in economic terms. An additional 14% said it would become important within five years.

In February, a London-based investor coalition called the Carbon Disclosure Project sent its fourth annual request for information on greenhouse-gas emissions to 1,800 of the largest publicly traded companies in the world. A total of 211 institutional investors with a collective $31 trillion under management signed the letter — up from the 35 investors representing $4.5 trillion worth of capital who signed the first report.

Among the U.S. signatories: Merrill Lynch, Franklin Templeton, Dreyfus, State Street Global Advisors, New York state and city employee pension funds, and the state treasurers of Maine, Vermont and Oregon.

The nation's largest public pension fund, the $182 billion California Public Employees' Retirement System (Calpers), also signed and has backed shareholder resolutions at Ford Motor and General Motors. "Our focus is to get companies to expand and to improve the disclosure and transparency of environmental data," says Dennis Johnson, Calpers' senior portfolio manager for corporate governance.

Johnson says the pension fund doesn't plan to sell any of its holdings to force greater disclosure, preferring instead to work with the companies in which it owns shares.

Each year, about 30 corporations confront shareholder resolutions seeking greater disclosure of the potential impact of climate change, according to Mindy Lubbers of Ceres. The past two years, climate change has been the leading source of non-financial shareholder resolutions, according to Gary Guzy of Marsh & McClennan.

In April, a Ceres-backed shareholder resolution requiring Dominion Resources, a Richmond, Va.-based utility, to report on its exposure to climate change was defeated with 22.5% of the votes. But that was almost three times the 8% support a similar measure garnered at last year's annual meeting.

Dominion's management opposed the resolutions, arguing that its environmental officer regularly updated its board and that information on its policies was available to shareholders on the company website. The past two years, more than one dozen electric power companies have issued such reports, according to Ceres.

The Bush administration stirred global controversy by refusing in 2001 to sign the 1997 Kyoto treaty, which would have required the U.S. to sharply reduce carbon dioxide emissions by 2010.

President Bush has repeatedly insisted that mandatory emissions curbs like those contained in the treaty would cost the U.S. economy too much. “I walked away from Kyoto because it would have damaged the American economy, it would have destroyed the American economy, it was a lousy deal for the American economy,” he said in a July interview with British TV network ITV.

Government and private estimates of the annual cost to the $13 trillion U.S. economy of implementing the Kyoto restrictions range from $125 billion to $400 billion.

Yet, the leaders of major U.S. corporations such as General Electric and DuPont say addressing climate change offers the technology-rich USA a chance to make — not lose — big money.

One year ago, Jeff Immelt, GE's chief executive, unveiled a plan to cut his company's greenhouse-gas emissions by more than 40% by 2012. At the same time, Immelt said GE would double its annual revenue from a broad portfolio of environmentally sound products to $20 billion by 2010.

GE identified an opportunity to boost profit by concentrating on environmental technologies after customers in many industries and many countries began demanding help meeting tougher regulations, says Lorraine Bolsinger, the executive in charge of GE's Ecomagination initiative. “I don't see the downside. I know folks say there will be some kind of economic tax. … I'm not sure anyone who worries about that has done the full analysis,” adds Bolsinger.

At DuPont, a previous brush with environmental controversy shaped an early embrace of the climate-change issue. In the late 1980s, the company came under pressure to stop producing chemicals called chlorofluorocarbons, which were blamed for depleting the ozone layer. In 1988, DuPont agreed to do so. That experience helped shape DuPont's response to calls for action to combat climate change, says Linda Fisher, the company's vice president of environment, health and safety. DuPont set its first goal for reducing greenhouse gases in 1991. By 2003, it had trimmed its emissions by 72%.

Along the way, it racked up savings of $3 billion through energy conservation. Example: In plants in Alabama, Tennessee and Missouri, DuPont is replacing natural gas with methane from landfills in its industrial boilers. Elsewhere, the company redesigned scores of industrial processes to squeeze efficiencies from every step of chemicals manufacturing.

“What started as an effort to address our carbon footprint has turned out to be financially a very good thing,” says Fisher.

This fall, DuPont expects to start using corn to produce a chemical called PDO, which is used to make clothing. The Loudon, Tenn., plant will use 40% less energy than traditional oil-based processes, the company says. The resulting reduction in greenhouse-gas emissions is equivalent to removing 22,000 cars from the roads.

Executives say such examples are representative of the environmental gains that could be achieved throughout the economy — if there were federal action. With Europe and Japan having embraced Kyoto, many business leaders in the United States say it is inevitable that the U.S. will eventually adopt similar emission limits. The Senate last year approved a non-binding resolution that called for such action.

The choice for business, they say, is between trying to block the inevitable or trying to shape whatever climate-change policy the government ultimately adopts. The financial stakes are enormous: The wrong policy, no matter how well-intentioned, could cripple the economy in a quest for environmental improvement.

"If we get out and shape it, we can craft a result that works for us and moderates the (economic) impact," says Peter Darbee, CEO of PG&E. "One can always say, 'We won't do it until everybody does it.' But leadership isn't about waiting for everybody to agree. … Leadership is about doing the right thing and doing it early."

The Interior Department's 'Relief Pitcher' (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Even in a big bureaucracy, some things can happen fast.

On his first day on the job this week as secretary of the interior, Dirk Kempthorne found out he is already a defendant in thousands of lawsuits, give or take a few.

Interior's deputy solicitor, David L. Bernhardt, tried to break the news gently, noting that Kempthorne's name was simply replacing that of his predecessor, Gale A. Norton. And in some cases he's not formally named, or the Justice Department is taking the lead. "Don't take it personally," Bernhardt said.

Resolving the long list of lawsuits -- including one accusing the government of cheating American Indians out of as much as $137.2 billion over the past 118 years -- is one of many tasks the former Idaho governor and senator faces as the nation's 49th interior secretary. With 30 months before the administration ends, he must confront everything from a huge maintenance backlog at the national parks to a contentious debate over how to best protect endangered species.

"I'm coming in in the seventh inning. I'm the relief pitcher," Kempthorne, 54, said in an interview in the midst of his first official day, which began at 6:30 a.m. Tuesday, when he left his apartment for a Fox News interview, and ended at 9 p.m., after he polished off Costco sandwiches his staff had brought in and did some paperwork. "I'm going to come in there, and I want to make sure it's a winning series."

Kempthorne spent his first day doing what he does best: stroking the egos of interest-group leaders, chatting up tourists standing by historic memorials he now oversees, and bonding with politicians. Gamely hobbling on the left foot he broke more than a week ago while jogging on uneven pavement, he shook hands with every Interior employee he could spot and signed autographs for schoolchildren before heading to the top of the Washington Monument.

Aware that federal prosecutors are investigating several current and former Interior officials for possible improper ties to disgraced GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Kempthorne began his day with an ethics briefing by agency lawyers, working on an agency-wide memo on professional conduct and asking if he could accept a personalized windbreaker from a political group or a piece of Park Service haberdashery. (Both are fine, as long as the outside gift was reported; a couple of hours later, Kempthorne sported the Park Service baseball cap on the Mall.)

During a lunch with officials from the National Congress of American Indians, he raised the possibility of settling the suit tribal members have lodged against Interior, and he told his staff that President Bush has urged him to use the department as a bridge to its often fractious constituents.

"He said, 'I don't want it to be polarized. I want us to be bipartisan,' " Kempthorne said.

Unlike Norton, who did little to cultivate environmental leaders, Kempthorne has occasionally made overtures to liberal groups. On Tuesday he held a conference call with 25 conservation, environmental and sporting organizations, including the Defenders of Wildlife and Environmental Defense. He used the word "respect" at least a dozen times during the day, telling the environmentalists at the close of their conversation: "This was my way of showing respect for all you men and women."

"The fact that he made the call was more noteworthy than the substance of the call itself," said Michael J. Bean, a senior attorney for Environmental Defense, who has worked with Kempthorne on protecting endangered species. "He's an open and accessible guy, willing to listen to points of view with which he might ultimately disagree."

Other environmentalists pointed out that in the end, Kempthorne usually goes against them. As governor, he resisted the reintroduction of grizzly bears into Idaho's Selway-Bitterroot Wilderness area (he called them "flesh-eating") and called for eradicating wolves in his state "by any means necessary." During his one term in the Senate, he earned a 1 percent voting score from the League of Conservation Voters.

"He might put it in a more charming way, but it's still going to be catering to special interests rather than serving as a steward of our public lands," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, the group's legislative director.

Kempthorne is an optimist, a former University of Idaho student president who revels in the fact that he'd found a sales clerk at the Pentagon City mall to help him pick out ties (he wore a shiny mint-green one on Tuesday) and that his father, who will turn 90 on July 4, will be able to watch fireworks on the Mall from the interior secretary's balcony.

Asked about the environmental impact of mining -- mining, timber and energy firms contributed generously to his gubernatorial and Senate campaigns -- Kempthorne said it's important to remember what mining does for average Americans.

"When we ride on a bicycle, that's brought to us by mining. When you ride in a car, that's brought to you by mining," he said, pausing to display his wedding ring. "This ring was brought to me by mining, but it's also the symbol of my love for my wife."

That's the sort of philosophy that prompted Sen. Larry Craig (R-Idaho) to declare on the Senate floor last week: "I believe in the next 2 1/2 years [that] Dirk Kempthorne presides over the Department of Interior as the second secretary of the interior of this Bush administration, he will, by his presence and the efforts currently underway, actually produce more energy for this nation and our nation's energy consumers than will the secretary of energy."

Kempthorne shies away from such talk. He says he hopes a combination of drilling and alternative energy sources will help wean the United States from its dependence on foreign oil.

People have underestimated Kempthorne in the past, said the Idaho Conservation League's executive director, Rick Johnson: "He's viewed as not a high-powered dude, and there's more going on there."

But Johnson, who has negotiated with Kempthorne over environmental issues, suggested it will be hard for him to leave a mark or to broker meaningful compromises among farmers and American Indians, environmentalists and oil and gas developers, and other warring factions.

"The administration was looking for someone to keep a steady hand on the tiller," Johnson said. "I don't think he'll have that much of an impact."

Upper Sioux Tribe To Banish Drug Offenders (AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

GRANITE FALLS, Minn. - A small American Indian reservation in southwest Minnesota plans to banish drug offenders.

The plan targets anyone who commits a drug crime on the Upper Sioux's reservation land in southwest Minnesota. The individual is automatically prohibited from setting foot on the reservation.

Tribal courts will decide how long the banishment lasts. The banned individual will retain tribal membership.

The policy also includes anyone who commits gang-related or violent crimes. The new law was passed earlier this month as part of the tribe's "zero tolerance" policy.

"Our goal is to ensure the safety of our members, their children, our tribal lands, our guests to our tribal lands," said Kevin Jensvold, chairman of the Upper Sioux's governing Board of Trustees. "Our survival depends on upon our ability to face this enemy."

Too often government refrains from taking strong stands against serious problems, he said. And drugs are a serious problem. Jensvold said no one can say the Upper Sioux were too timid to take a stand.

Banishment has a long history in Indian culture, although the Upper Sioux version is less harsh than tradition banishment, which in ancient times treated offenders as if they were dead.

Jensvold said the Upper Sioux policy is a tough love approach and is designed to encourage rehabilitation. "We are here to assist our members to refrain or recover," he said. "We are here to demonstrate that we are a tribal nation who care."

The push for the new policy came after a tribal examination of the dangers of methamphetamine use. Tribal secretary Elitta Gouge said no one knows how extensive drug use is on the reservation, but they know the tribe has to fight back.

"We're going to warn everyone who is a dealer or a supplier that we're going to prosecute to the fullest extent of the law, if they should bring drugs onto the rez," she said.

The Upper Sioux is among the smallest reservations in Minnesota, at about 2 square miles. Many of the tribe's 430 members live off the reservation but nearby.

San Francisco Chronicle Writers Challenge Bonds Leak Subpoena (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury about how they got Barry Bonds' leaked testimony urged a judge on Wednesday to let them off the hook.

The Chronicle's Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, the latest reporters to become entangled in the federal government's ramped-up efforts to investigate leaks, argued that the First Amendment protects reporters and their sources.

In an affidavit accompanying their filing, Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Carl Bernstein wrote to U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins of San Francisco that anonymous sources were instrumental in breaking the Watergate scandal.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams have been have been subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury investigating who leaked them the secret testimony of San Francisco giants slugger Bonds, the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi and other professional athletes.

About two dozen athletes were called before an earlier San Francisco grand jury in 2004 as part of the government's investigation into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative - the California nutritional supplement lab that was exposed as a steroid ring.

The Chronicle published the testimony in a series of stories beginning in late 2004. Both Fainaru-Wada and Williams say they aren't going to comply with the supoena, which means they could be fined and jailed until they divulge their sources. The reporters also could be jailed for a fixed term for contempt if Jenkins forces them to appear before the grand jury.

Justice Dept. Is Criticized By Ex-Official On Subpoenas (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Subpoenas issued last month to reporters for The San Francisco Chronicle were criticized yesterday by a former chief spokesman for Attorney General John Ashcroft as a "reckless abuse of power."

The former spokesman, Mark Corallo, made similar statements in an affidavit filed in federal court yesterday. He said Mr. Ashcroft's successor, Alberto R. Gonzales, had acted improperly in issuing the subpoenas.

"This is the most reckless abuse of power I have seen in years," Mr. Corallo said in an interview. "They really should be ashamed of themselves."

The subpoenas, part of an effort to identify The Chronicle's sources for its coverage of steroid use in baseball, would not have been authorized by Mr. Ashcroft, Mr. Corallo said. "You just don't ride roughshod over the rights of reporters to gather information from confidential sources," he added.

Mr. Corallo left the Justice Department in 2005. His public relations firm represents, among others, Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser. A spokeswoman for Mr. Ashcroft, who also stepped down in 2005, declined to comment on Mr. Corallo's sworn statement, which was submitted with the reporters' motion to quash the subpoena.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said he could not address the subpoena to the Chronicle reporters. Subpoenas, he said, are "handled consistent with Justice Department guidelines and on a case-by-case basis on facts specific to the case that only those in the Justice Department would be aware of."

Mr. Gonzales has in recent weeks hinted that the Justice Department may move beyond subpoenas for journalists' sources, and pursue the criminal prosecution of reporters under espionage laws for publishing classified information.

Mr. Corallo said the department's attitude toward news organizations "is starting to look like a policy shift, a policy shift for the worse."

Specialists in journalism and First Amendment law said that Mr. Corallo's statement was itself significant evidence of a shift.

"This illustrates in an unmistakable fashion," said Mark Feldstein, director of the journalism program at George Washington University, "that the Gonzales Justice Department has moved so far away from the mainstream of established legal opinion and case law when it comes to press freedom that even judicial conservatives are disturbed by it."

The Chronicle reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, submitted Mr. Corallo's sworn statement along with their motion to quash the subpoenas, which was filed yesterday in Federal District Court in San Francisco.

The articles in The Chronicle that gave rise to the subpoenas had quoted, apparently verbatim, transcripts of grand jury testimony from prominent athletes, including the baseball stars Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi. Whoever provided those transcripts to the reporters may have violated grand jury secrecy rules or a judge's order.

Under the Justice Department's internal guidelines, subpoenas to the press for confidential sources require authorization by the attorney general. Under Mr. Ashcroft, Mr. Corallo said, he and others also had authority to deny such requests.

Mr. Corallo said that in three years as the department's press secretary and public affairs director, he approved a single subpoena to the press, involving what he called a serious national security matter, and turned down many more. One of those he refused, he said in the court filing, concerned "a public corruption case involving leaks of grand jury information."

Mr. Gonzales has defended his decision to issue the subpoenas. "I think it was information that was necessary, that we needed to have in connection with that investigation," he told the editorial board of The Houston Chronicle last month.

Mr. Corallo said he had used a different standard, one rooted in Justice Department policy.

"It has to be a matter of grave national security or impending physical harm to innocent people," he said, "not just, well, this is the only way we're going to be able to get this information."

N.Y. Judge: 40 Years For One Of Biggest Foreign Drug Catches (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- A man described as one of the biggest foreign heroin dealers ever extradited to the United States was sentenced Wednesday to 40 years in prison, dodging a life term in a U.S. deal with Colombia that was hotly debated in court.

Ramiro Lopez-Imitola, who prosecutors said headed a heroin trafficking organization in Colombia and Venezuela, was sentenced in U.S. District Court and ordered to forfeit $200 million in assets, though he claimed to be broke.

In a release, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said Lopez-Imitola was "not only one of the biggest heroin traffickers ever extradited to the United States, but he maintained his empire through brutality and corruption."

His sentencing in Manhattan lasted all day as lawyers disputed the meaning of an extradition deal in which the United States agreed he would not be sentenced to life in prison for heading a drug group in Cucuta, Colombia, and Caracas, Venezuela.

The argument over what constitutes a life sentence highlighted a concern the United States faces with other countries when it tries to extradite prisoners into a legal system that demands stiff penalties for drug crimes.

The system yielded to an extent as U.S. District Judge Robert P. Patterson said he took into account the defendant's age, 61, when he decided on a sentence that left him a shot at freedom in his 90s _ for good behavior behind bars and credit for time served.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Neil M. Barofsky had demanded a 60-year prison term, saying the Colombian government had agreed that 60 years would be acceptable since that is the maximum prison term allowed in its own courts.

Defense lawyer Salvador Delgado said a prison term that long would be a life sentence, and he noted that judges in Colombia usually take into account a defendant's age at sentencing. He requested a 10-year sentence.

The lawyer said his client was in frail health and was unlikely to survive much longer than that in prison.

Lopez-Imitola said he was not the "animal they are trying to take to the slaughterhouse."

But the prosecutor told the judge that Lopez-Imitola was a brutal drug lord who led an international heroin trafficking organization that sold $200 million worth of the drug in the United States alone.

DOJ_NMG_0030800

He said Lopez-Imitola burned one of his drug couriers with a hot iron because he believed the courier had failed to pay him $100,000 from the sale of heroin and ordered the body of another courier cut open to extract drugs after the man died of an overdose in Miami.

"He has shown absolutely no remorse for his crimes," Barofsky said.

Drug Enforcement Administration special agent John P. Gilbride called the desecration of the drug courier "the extent to which a monster would go in order to make millions from the drug trade."

For more than an hour, Lopez-Imitola denied carrying out the torture and insisted he was unfairly victimized by others before he pleaded guilty March 15, 2005, to drug charges.

"I'm not a man who hates," he said. "I've admitted I'm guilty, but I'm not as guilty as they're making me out to be."

Greeneville Sun, May 31, 2006

A Telford man federal authorities alleged was a key local figure in a decade-long conspiracy to import drugs into Northeast Tennessee pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court here on Monday to two conspiracy charges.

Mark Allen Saults, 34, whose last known address was Old State Route 34 Telford, pleaded guilty before Senior U.S. District Judge Leon Jordan to two counts of a federal indictment.

One indictment count charged Saults with conspiring with others to distribute 15,000 pounds of marijuana.

The second indictment count alleged that Saults conspired to distribute 25 pounds of methamphetamine.

Saults faces the possibility of receiving a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years in prison when he is sentenced by Judge Jordan on Oct. 11, plus up to a $4 million fine and a term of supervised release of from five years to life.

However, according to a plea agreement filed in his case, Saults has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors.

The government, in turn, has agreed to, at the time of sentencing, “bring to the court’s attention the nature, extent, and value” of that cooperation.

Under the plea agreement in his case, Saults also agrees to testify before federal grand juries and during trials if requested to do so by the U.S. Attorney’s office.

Allegedly Part Of Large Ring

During a January press conference in Johnson City, Acting U.S. Attorney James R. Dedrick alleged that Saults and co-defendants that included Greene County resident Richard Glenn Milburn, were members of “one of the largest, if not the largest, drug importation and distribution organizations that Upper East Tennessee has had in a long time.”

Dedrick also said that the illegal drug organization in which the indicted men allegedly took part had generated “millions and millions of dollars” over the years.

On Tuesday, Washington County Sheriff Ed Graybeal said he was glad to hear that Saults had pleaded guilty.

Graybeal said the investigation that led to federal charges against Saults, and others, had taken “a lot of drugs off the street.”

The Washington County sheriff also praised the cooperation among federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies that led to the federal indictments against Saults and his co-defendants.

Case Against Saults

A court document called an “agreed factual basis” filed in Saults’ case states that between January 1995 and December 2005, Saults “did knowingly, intentionally and without authority, conspire with at least one other person to distribute and possess, with the intent to distribute, 15,000 pounds of marijuana and 25 pounds of a mixture of a substance containing methamphetamine ... .”

During the course of the conspiracy, according to court documents, Saults “obtained marijuana and/or methamphetamine from various locations across the country, including Cleveland, Ga., and Albuquerque, N.M., and through co-conspirators and couriers, Saults had the drugs transported to the Eastern District of Tennessee.”

The marijuana and methamphetamine, obtained from New Mexico, were acquired by Saults’ alleged co-conspirator Sidney Charles Terrell, or from alleged co-conspirators Victor Hugo Vargas and Louis Antonio Medina, and allegedly transported by various individuals, including Doug Keith Davis, to Thomas Turner, in Cleveland, Ga., according to court records.

Saults would then acquire the illegal drugs from Turner for transportation by co-conspirators to the Eastern District of Tennessee, according to court records Subsequently, court records allege, the drugs were distributed in Northeast Tennessee by Saults and others, including: "Richard Glenn Milburn, Travis Brown, Derek Anthony Keys, James Franklin Devotie, Robert Anthony Hampton, Shannon Luttrell and Michael Damon Bawgus."

Saults and Milburn, according to the agreed factual basis, were arrested on Dec. 1, 2005, by agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration when the two came to meet with an informant from whom they allegedly had agreed to purchase 50 pounds of marijuana and two pounds of "pure methamphetamine."

At that time, $36,000 in cash was seized from Saults' person, according to the agreed factual basis.

When he was arrested last Dec. 1, according to the agreed factual basis, officers allegedly found a loaded handgun on Milburn and another firearm behind the seat of his vehicle. In addition, about 14 grams of "crystal methamphetamine" was allegedly seized from Milburn's truck, according to the agreed factual basis.

Trial Set July 31

Trial for Milburn and Victor Hugo Vargas is scheduled to begin on July 31 in U.S. District Court here.

A change of plea hearing for co-defendant Eric Phillip Shawback was scheduled for today in U.S. District Court in Knoxville.

Similar change of plea hearings are scheduled for June 13 in Knoxville for co-defendants Doug Keith Davis, Robert Anthony Hampton and Travis Brown, according to court documents.

A hearing for Hampton originally was scheduled for Tuesday in U.S. District Court here, but it was rescheduled at the request of his attorney, David Leonard.

Shannon Luttrell pleaded guilty earlier, as did Thomas Turner. Both are awaiting sentencing.

Federal Indictment Handed Down For Man From Otis And Salem (LCNG)

Lincoln City News Guard, May 31, 2006

On May 24, a federal grand jury indicted a Salem and Otis resident on multiple charges, including the charge of "human trafficking," according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Ramon Lopez-Montanez, 39, was indicted on charges of forced labor, marijuana manufacturing and use of a false government document.

Lopez-Montanez was investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, U.S. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Oregon State Police, Multnomah County Sheriff's Human Trafficking Task Force, Salem Police Department, Drug Enforcement Administration, Lincoln County Interagency Narcotics Team and the Lincoln County Sheriff's Office.

Lopez was arrested in Salem on May 23. The indictment documents were unsealed on May 24 in preparation for appearance before a magistrate in Portland.

According to the indictment, Lopez-Montanez is charged with growing marijuana in Salem and Otis and using a false Oregon driver's license to open an account at Wells Fargo Bank in Lincoln City.

Lopez-Montanez is a citizen of Mexico, according to the Department of Justice.

The indictment charges that Lopez-Montanez obtained the "labor and services" of a woman in Mexico "by threats of serious harm to and physical restraint against" this woman and her family and friends. According to the Department of Justice, he also forced her to witness acts of violence against others and subjected her to acts of violence.

"The U.S. Attorney's Office will work closely with our law enforcement partners to investigate and prosecute what amounts to modern-day slavery," said U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut for the District of Oregon. "We will not tolerate the exploitation and abuse of men, women and children who are the victims of human trafficking."

No trial date had been set for Lopez-Montanez as of press deadlines.

Alton Man Receives 25-year Sentence (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, May 31, 2006

A 39-year-old Alton man was sentenced in federal court in East St. Louis Tuesday to 25 years in prison on crack cocaine charges.

Christopher B. Taylor was convicted of distributing and possessing with intent to distribute crack cocaine.

Taylor also was fined and must serve 5 years supervised release after completing his sentence, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

The case was investigated by agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration, federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives and the Alton Police Department. It was prosecuted by Assistant U.S. attorneys Thomas M. Daly and Andrew Simonson.

The case was prosecuted as part of a continuing DEA investigation targeting crack cocaine trafficking in Alton.

Woman Gets Prison In Drug Deal (FLJOURNAL)

Flint Journal (MI), May 31, 2006

FLINT - A woman who delivered an ounce of crack cocaine to undercover investigators last year was sentenced Tuesday to nearly 4 years in prison, even though her attorney argued for probation, saying her involvement in the drug trade was her boyfriend's fault.

U.S. District Judge Paul Gadola sentenced Renee Holmes, 31, to 3 years and 10 months in prison.

"It's a question of role," argued her lawyer, C. Frederick Robinson, before she was sentenced. "Her involvement was minimal in this offense."

He noted that Holmes, a mother of two, had a good employment record, attended church and only "answered her boyfriend's phone" on May 17, 2005 - the date she was charged with delivering crack cocaine to law enforcement authorities.

"She has good standing in the community," said Robinson. "She has no pattern of criminal conduct. She's a victim of her affiliation with her boyfriend."

But the judge noted at Holmes' sentencing Tuesday that she had pleaded guilty for a transaction in which she, not her boyfriend, spoke with a confidential informant who'd been working with law enforcement about the sale of an ounce of crack, and it was Holmes who delivered it and took $850 for it.

"You chose to engage yourself in this business," the judge told her. "It's a very, very serious offense."

Gadola noted that Holmes had a 1994 conviction for carrying a concealed weapon, but that conviction apparently had been suppressed or sealed, and he could not consider it as he sentenced her.

Gadola said Holmes' involvement in the drug trade tended to "melt away" the positive aspects of her life.

"(Crack has) destroyed young people in great numbers, families, neighborhoods, communities," he said.

Holmes and her boyfriend, Damon D. Cooper, were among nine people indicted by a grand jury on federal drug charges last September after an investigation by federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents and Flint police.

Holmes asked for time before she was sentenced to prison so she could make arrangements for the care of her children, but Gadola said she should have dealt with that before she was to be sentenced. Federal rules require a drug offender to be immediately remanded to the Bureau of Prisons, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert W. Haviland said.

Holmes' relatives cried and hugged one another as she was led from the courtroom to start her prison term.

Former Prosecutor's Spouse Fights Cash Seizure (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan Lyons, Staff Writer

Albany Times Union, May 31, 2006

Federal officials say $352,680 found in SUV is tied to drug dealing

ALBANY -- Federal authorities are moving to seize $352,680 in cash that Illinois state troopers confiscated from a car being driven across the country by the husband of a former Albany County prosecutor.

The Justice Department contends the money, which was sealed in shrink-wrap and lined with scented fabric-softener sheets, is the proceeds of drug dealing and therefore subject to seizure.

But Robert L. Schultz, 45, who is married to former Assistant District Attorney Kimberly A. Mariani, is challenging the government's assertion. He filed court papers in Illinois last week arguing that troopers illegally searched his car and authorities cannot keep the money simply because he gave varying accounts of where it came from.

Mariani was fired from her job in December after she invoked her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. She refused to testify before a federal grand jury in Illinois that was investigating her husband, officials said.

The case broke open on Nov. 20 when a trooper stopped Schultz for speeding along Interstate 80 in Atkinson, Ill. Schultz was driving a Nissan Xterra sport utility vehicle that he had rented two days earlier in Fresno, Calif., after he missed a flight to Albany.

The trooper claimed he smelled a strong odor of marijuana coming from inside the car and from Schultz's body. But after authorities impounded the car, they did not find a trace of illegal drugs and have not offered an explanation for the trooper's actions.

"There was no probable cause to search the vehicle in the first place, (the trooper's) assertation that he smelled cannabis was fabricated and merely a pretext to pursue an otherwise illegal search," said a motion filed recently in U.S. District Court in Illinois by Schultz's attorney, Joseph M. McCoy of Albany.

Still, federal authorities contend Schultz, who worked part-time for his father-in-law, Timothy Coughtry, in Altamont, and also owned a small, self-named construction company in California, gave police several accounts of where the money was from and why he was driving it across the country, according to federal authorities.

Schultz told troopers the money was from his parents, whom he described as millionaires, and that it was a down payment for a $500,000 home in Aruba. He also stated it was from his father, who is a professional gambler; that it was an inheritance; that it was a wedding gift for him and his wife; and that it was to pay his in-laws back for a $200,000 loan, according to a federal complaint.

"When Schultz was questioned about why his father vacuumed sealed the currency in plastic bags, he indicated ... that it was just the way he keeps his money," the complaint states. "Schultz also told law enforcement that maybe his mom puts scented fabric softener sheets between the plastic and the money so that the money would not mold."

Attorneys for Mariani and Schultz did return telephone calls seeking comment.

Mariani was interviewed at least once by DEA agents in Albany, according to federal authorities and her attorney, E. Stewart Jones.

Mariani and Schultz, who were married in January 2005 and have shared a home in Altamont, met in California several years ago. He spends most of his time on the West Coast, Jones said previously.

The couple had recently been exploring options for purchasing a home in Aruba, but Jones said nothing was finalized.

Schultz, who was alone in the car that day, has not been charged with any crime.

Mariani joined the Albany County district attorney's office in January 2000, working under former district attorneys Sol Greenberg and Paul A. Clyne.

Defendant In Drug Case Wants Name Of Informant (GC)

Greenwood Commonwealth, May 31, 2006

Kevin Matthews wants to know the identity of the federal informant who turned on him, but the U.S. attorney's office said the law doesn't require them to identify that person until trial time.

The pleading filed by Matthews' attorney, Kenneth Coghlan of Oxford, is the latest in a flurry of paper thrown back and forth in the Greenwood man's federal case.

During raids conducted by agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics in October, Matthews and three other Greenwood men were among the 36 total suspects arrested in a Delta drug sweep.

Matthews remains in jail on federal cocaine charges, and no bond has been set in the case.

Leflore County Sheriff Ricky Banks has identified Matthews as a longtime drug dealer and said he has tried unsuccessfully for the last 25 years to arrest Matthews on drug-related charges.

In court pleadings Matthews' attorney has argued that the judge should dismiss the case against his client because the conspiracy count against him doesn't state particular acts.

But prosecutors said the indictment meets all the criteria, charging that Matthews conspired with others to distribute cocaine base, or crack, between January 2000 and November 2005.

And, failing the dismissal, Matthews seeks the identity of the informants who lead DEA and MBN agents to him because they will have a key role as witnesses.

Prosecutors told the court in counter-pleadings that the informant "is fearful for his own safety" should his identity become known.

Coghlan also asked the court to allow him to interview Darrell Christian, who is expected to testify against Matthews.

Christian, whose street name is "D," was arrested by DEA agents in Bolivar County last summer with two others at the residence of Mary Sutton, according to court records.

DEA agents discovered about 22 pounds of cocaine and $200,000 cash at the scene.

In July 2005, Christian was indicted by a federal grand jury. He pleaded guilty in November to possession with intent to distribute.

Federal prosecutors have responded to Coghlan's request to interview Christian by saying that their witness fears for his life and that the defense doesn't really need the pre-trial interview to prepare its defense.

Christian was scheduled to be sentenced last week in federal court, but his sentencing date has been continued indefinitely.

Doping Probe Clears Armstrong (AP)

Associated Press

AP, June 1, 2006

AMSTERDAM -- A Dutch investigator's report cleared Lance Armstrong of doping in the 1999 Tour de France on Wednesday, calling the accusations against him "completely irresponsible" and raising the possibility of misconduct by anti-doping authorities.

The 132-page report recommended convening a tribunal to discuss possible legal and ethical violations by the World Anti-Doping Agency and to consider "appropriate sanctions to remedy the violations."

The French sports daily L'Equipe reported in August that six of Mr. Armstrong's urine samples from 1999, when he won the first of his record seven straight Tour titles, came back positive for the endurance-boosting hormone EPO when they were retested in 2004.

Mr. Armstrong has repeatedly denied using banned substances.

"Today's comprehensive report makes it clear that there is no truth to that accusation," Mr. Armstrong said in a written statement. "I have now retired, but for the sake of all athletes still competing who deserve a level playing field and a fair system of drug testing, the time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks before they destroy the credibility of WADA and, in turn, the international anti-doping system."

The International Cycling Union appointed Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman last October to investigate the handling of urine tests from the 1999 Tour by the French national anti-doping laboratory, known by its French acronym LNDD. Mr. Vrijman said Wednesday his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely with respect to alleged use of doping in the 1999 Tour de France."

The report said tests on the samples were conducted improperly, and fell so short of scientific standards that it was "completely irresponsible" to suggest that the results "constitute evidence of anything." It said no proper records were kept of the samples, there had been no "chain of custody" guaranteeing their integrity, and no way of knowing whether the samples had been "spiked" with banned substances.

The report said WADA and the LNDD may have "behaved in ways that are completely inconsistent with the rules and regulations of international anti-doping control testing," and may also have been against the law. It accused WADA of putting pressure on the LNDD to summarize the results of the tests, and said both agencies violated rules of confidentiality by openly discussing them.

It said neither Mr. Armstrong nor any of the other riders that were tested retroactively could fairly be accused of violating anti-doping regulations based on the LNDD's examination.

WADA chief Dick Pound said he hadn't received the report yet but, based on what he had read in news accounts, was critical of Mr. Vrijman's findings. "There was no interest in determining whether the samples Armstrong provided were positive or not," he told the Associated Press by telephone from Montreal. "We were afraid of that from the very beginning."

Mr. Pound reiterated his claim that the UCI had leaked the forms to a reporter from L'Equipe and was responsible for the doping samples being linked to Mr. Armstrong.

"Whether the samples were positive or not, I don't know how a Dutch lawyer with no expertise came to a conclusion that one of the leading laboratories in the world messed up on the analysis. To say Armstrong is totally exonerated seems strange," Mr. Pound said.

The UCI said it was upset with Mr. Vrijman for commenting on the report before all parties involved in the case were informed. "Upon reception of the document, the UCI will study in details the content before publishing it in its whole," the UCI said in a statement.

In a separate statement, WADA expressed "grave concern and strong disappointment" over Mr. Vrijman's reported comments. "Elementary courtesy and professionalism would have dictated that WADA should have been provided with a copy of the report before interviews were given to the media," the statement said.

Mario Zorzoli, the doctor who gave copies of Armstrong's doping control forms to L'Equipe, was suspended by the UCI for one month earlier this year. He has since been reinstated.

Mr. Vrijman, who headed the Dutch anti-doping agency for 10 years and later defended athletes accused of doping, worked on the report with Adriaan van der Veen, a scientist with the Dutch Metrology Laboratory.

EPO, or erythropoietin, is a synthetic hormone that boosts the oxygen-carrying capacity of the blood. Testing for EPO only began in 2001.

Doping Agency Challenges Probe That Clears Armstrong (KR)

By Elliott Almond

Knight Ridder, May 31, 2006

An investigator's report clearing Lance Armstrong of taking drugs during the 1999 Tour de France was challenged Wednesday by World Anti-Doping Agency officials, indicating the case against America's greatest cyclist might not be over.

The 132-page report, written by the former chief of the Netherlands' anti-doping agency, called the accusations against Armstrong "completely irresponsible."

The investigator, Emile Vrijman, examined test results taken from the year Armstrong won his first of seven consecutive Tour de France titles. The cyclist won all those races after surviving testicular cancer.

The investigation was initiated after the French sports newspaper L'Equipe reported last August that six of Armstrong's urine samples from 1999 were positive for the blood-boosting drug EPO when retested in 2004.

There was no valid test for EPO until 2001. French testers froze specimens from the 1999 Tour to check when they had developed one. But the re-tests were not meant to be used to punish anyone.

While Armstrong hailed the report's conclusion, officials from the World Anti-Doping Agency said in a statement they were concerned that the investigation had focused on how the retired cyclist's urine tests were leaked to a newspaper and not whether the results were valid.

A WADA spokesman declined further comment Wednesday.

But the group's president, Dick Pound, told The Associated Press: "There was no interest in determining whether the samples Armstrong provided were positive or not.

"I don't know how a Dutch lawyer with no expertise came to a conclusion that one of the leading laboratories in the world messed up on the analysis. To say Armstrong is totally exonerated seems strange."

The investigator's report said the French laboratory did not follow accepted scientific standards. It dismissed the results as lacking credibility.

"Today's comprehensive report makes it clear that there is no truth to that accusation," Armstrong said in a statement.

He blamed Pound, WADA, the laboratory, L'Equipe and Tour de France organizers for trying to discredit him.

"For the sake of all athletes still competing who deserve a level playing field and a fair system of drug testing, the time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks," said Armstrong, who has never publicly failed a drug test.

Sean Petty, USA Cycling's chief of staff, said Wednesday the sport has continued to grow despite years of rumors about Armstrong.

"I hope that is the last we hear of it," he said. "We just want it to be not a lot of rhetoric and based on facts."

The report, however, surfaced amid a growing drug scandal in Spain that has implicated some elite cyclists and team officials.

With a code name "Operacion Puerto," Spanish police last week raided the homes of a Spanish team manager and physician to collect evidence of blood doping. They arrested five individuals connected to the sport, according to Spanish news accounts. On Wednesday, a newspaper reported that the team Comunidad Valenciana might lose its wild-card place for next month's Tour de France because one of its officials was targeted in the investigation.

The action echoes the BALCO Laboratories scandal involving Barry Bonds, Marion Jones and other American sports stars. Jose Enrique Gutierrez, who finished second last week at the Giro d'Italia, is one of a handful of elite cyclists connected to the investigation.

Jim Ochowicz, USA Cycling president, said he welcomed the inquiry, although it comes at the height of the summer season. He said Spain used to be an "outpost where the doping issue was concerned." The recent action shows the country is redoubling its efforts to stop drug use in the sport, he said.

Although Armstrong's case has no relation to the Spanish investigation, the two events underscore the sport's struggle with drugs.

"Cycling has a long, rich colorful history of doping," said Chuck Yesalis, a Penn State health professor who has written books about steroid use in sports. "It's no surprise cycling is involved."

Report Reopens Doping Debate Over Armstrong (LAT)

By Alan Abrahamson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

A Dutch investigator's report that purports to clear Lance Armstrong of using performance-enhancing substances in the 1999 Tour de France ignited a controversy that roared through Europe and across the Atlantic on Wednesday, spotlighting the complexities and schisms that have riven a sport awash in allegations of doping.

The report, commissioned last year by the International Cycling Union after a French news account that six Armstrong urine samples from 1999 had tested positive in 2004 for the blood-booster EPO, asserted those tests were conducted so improperly it would be "completely irresponsible" to suggest they amounted to "evidence of anything."

The 132-page report, made public Wednesday, was not immediately available. But according to news accounts, Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman said his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely" with regard to the 1999 allegations. Armstrong, who has repeatedly denied the use of banned substances, said in a statement that Vrijman's report "confirms my innocence."

But the World Anti-Doping Agency, in Montreal, issued a statement expressing "grave concern and strong disappointment." WADA, the statement also said, "continues to stress its concern that an investigation into the matter must consider all aspects," including "the question of whether anti-doping rules were violated by athletes."

WADA Chairman Dick Pound, who has long asserted the cycling federation, which goes by the acronym UCI, leaked the 1999 doping forms to the French newspaper L'Equipe, questioned how Vrijman had reached the conclusion that one of the top anti-doping labs in the world -- the French national lab, near Paris -- had so thoroughly botched tests. The lab is known by its French acronym, LNDD.

Vrijman's report, for instance, asserts there is no way to know if the samples had been spiked with a banned substance, according to news accounts, which also said the report raises the possibility of misconduct by WADA and LNDD.

In a telephone interview, Pound said of the cycling federation, "They weren't interested in what happened, only in how the information became public and -- surprise, surprise -- cleared the only organization that made it possible for this thing to happen. To say that UCI had no role -- that's nuts."

Swiss-based UCI also issued a statement. It said its officials had "learned with great surprise" the "declarations conveyed to the Dutch press by Mr. Emile Vrijman," making clear the report's release was "prematurely voiced" and the UCI was still "waiting to receive the definite version."

UCI, the statement went on to say, "firmly deplores the behavior of Mr. Vrijman," a former head of the Dutch anti-doping lab. He has since been active in defending athletes accused of doping.

The release of Vrijman's report comes as cycling grapples with a doping scandal in Spain, which has the potential to rival the scandal that shook the sport amid the 1998 Tour de France, when police nabbed a Festina team employee with drugs. Some Tour riders were ejected; others quit; the Tour almost collapsed.

Police in Madrid, in a raid last Tuesday, reportedly seized steroids, EPO and dozens of bags of frozen blood. Among those questioned was Manolo Saiz, director of the Liberty Seguros cycling team. The Boston-based Liberty Mutual insurance company responded by canceling its sponsorship of the team.

It has long been known in cycling circles -- as in other endurance sports -- that transfusing one's own blood can increase oxygen-carrying red blood cells, thereby boosting endurance. Detecting such transfusions can be problematic, if not impossible.

EPO, or erythropoietin, is a synthetic hormone. It too can boost the oxygen-carrying capacity of the blood.

In 1999, though EPO was on the banned list, there was no effective test to detect it; UCI would not begin using such a test until 2001.

On Aug. 23, L'Equipe reported that six of Armstrong's 1999 samples had come back positive for EPO when re-tested in 2004. The 1999 Tour marked the first of Armstrong's seven straight Tour wins.

The French newspaper's investigation was based on what doping authorities call the "B sample," the second half of urine samples used in doping tests. The A samples were used up in 1999. The B samples at issue were among those hauled out of deep freeze in 2004 to perfect the French lab's EPO testing procedures.

To make a typical doping case, then and now, authorities must prove a positive A and B sample. However, decisions issued in December involving U.S. track and field stars Tim Montgomery and Chryste Gaines, sparked by the BALCO matter, have made plain that a wide range of evidence can be used to build a doping case.

Armstrong's critics maintained the L'Equipe story offered evidence pointing to doping but acknowledged that the B samples alone could not make a formal doping case against him. Armstrong, as he did again in his statement Wednesday, said he was the target of a "witch hunt."

Report Says Lab Mishandled Armstrong's Samples From '99 (NYT)

By Juliet Macur

Lance Armstrong received a boost yesterday toward clearing his name of doping allegations connected with his triumph in the 1999 Tour de France, the first of his record seven victories in the race.

Emile Vrijman, a Dutch lawyer hired by the International Cycling Union, issued a report that said drug testers had mishandled Armstrong's urine samples, so any positive results fail to "constitute evidence of anything."

Vrijman, the former head of the Dutch anti-doping organization, said the French national anti-doping laboratory did not follow proper procedures when retroactively testing the samples from the 1999 Tour. He also said the laboratory, the French Ministry of Sport and the World Anti-Doping Agency had refused to cooperate fully with his investigation.

In the 130-page report, Vrijman stated that there was no proof that Armstrong had used EPO, a synthetic version of a naturally occurring hormone that increases oxygen-rich red blood cells, because there was no way to prove that Armstrong's urine samples had not been tampered with or tainted. In turn, Vrijman wrote that the cycling union should "refrain from initiating any disciplinary action whatsoever."

"The report confirms my innocence," Armstrong said in a statement, which also criticized a number of involved parties, including the World Anti-Doping Agency's chairman, Dick Pound.

Pound told The Associated Press in Canada: "Whether the samples were positive or not, I don't know how a Dutch lawyer with no expertise came to a conclusion that one of the leading laboratories in the world messed up on the analysis. To say Armstrong is totally exonerated seems strange."

Armstrong, a 34-year-old Texan, retired from cycling last July after winning his seventh Tour de France. Even as a spectator, he has continued to dispute accusations that he used performance-enhancing drugs. The murmurs began with his fairy-tale victory in the 1999 Tour de France after he beat testicular cancer.

Recently, Armstrong has attacked those cheating accusations through lawsuits, including a case he filed against SCA Promotions, a Dallas-based insurance company. That case was closed in February, after a state district judge in Dallas awarded him $5 million, and $181,327.87 interest.

In the suit, Armstrong claimed that the insurance company owed him a $5 million bonus for winning his sixth Tour, but withheld payment after the book, "L.A. Confidential, the Secrets of Lance Armstrong," alleged he had used performance-enhancing drugs. The company had asked for Armstrong's medical records to find out if he had cheated.

Armstrong, who was in Los Angeles filming a commercial yesterday, has two other ongoing cases. Both are defamation suits involving the "L.A. Confidential" book: one is against the book's authors and its publisher, the other is against a London newspaper that printed excerpts of the book. Bill Stapleton, Armstrong's agent, said that both cases are in their initial stages and that trial dates have not been set.

"I can't help but think that an independent investigation exonerating him can't do anything but help his case," Stapleton said, regarding the report released yesterday.

The issue of doping has been a cloud over cycling for decades. Most recently, in a case thought to involve cyclists and perhaps other athletes, the police in Madrid raided three apartments and seized large amounts of steroids, hormones, EPO and nearly 100 bags of frozen blood and equipment for treating blood.

Another high-profile case began at the 2004 Olympics, when the American Tyler Hamilton won a gold medal but was barred from the sport for two years for testing positive for a blood transfusion that would increase red blood cells and, in turn, endurance.

Armstrong has repeatedly denied using performance-enhancing drugs. In his statement yesterday, he called the retroactive testing of his 1999 urine samples a "witch hunt," and he placed the blame on Pound, the French lab, the French Ministry of Sport, the Tour de France organizers and L'Équipe, the French sports newspaper that shares its parent company with the Tour. He said they "ignored the rules and broke the law."

L'Équipe reported last August that Armstrong's urine samples from the 1999 Tour tested positive for EPO in tests conducted in 2004. EPO tests were not available in 1999.

Vrijman, the investigator, was hired last October to investigate the handling of those urine samples from 1999. In his report, he wrote that the analyses of those and other urine samples were supposed to be for research purposes only, not to implicate an athlete. He wrote that the World Anti-Doping Agency and the French laboratory were unethical because they had not followed anti-doping testing procedures and, among other things, had violated confidentiality rules.

Vrijman also wrote that the anti-doping agency forced the French laboratory to generate a report using identification numbers on the sample, promising that "it would treat the research data as confidential and that they would not be the basis for any sanction against any athlete." But the agency did not keep its promise, Vrijman noted.

The International Cycling Union was not available for comment about the case, but posted a comment on its Web site. The statement said it "deplores the behaviour" of Vrijman because he "prematurely voiced" the report.

"The UCI underlines its deep displeasure with regards to the regrettable development of this case," the statement said.

Armstrong Cleared Of Doping At 1999 Tour De France (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Sam Sheringham

Bloomberg, May 31, 2006

(Bloomberg) -- Lance Armstrong was cleared of taking banned drugs at the 1999 Tour de France by independent investigators who said the World Anti-Doping Agency may be guilty of misconduct in its handling of the case.

``There is no basis for disciplinary action against any rider," Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman said in his 132-page report today. The International Cycling Union ``is recommended to refrain from taking any disciplinary action whatsoever."

Armstrong's maiden seven-minute win at the 1999 Tour led to persistent whispers in the French press that he boosted his performances with drugs because he'd only returned to cycling in the previous year after recovering from cancer. Vrijman's probe began after French newspaper L'Equipe last August said six of Armstrong's urine samples from the race showed traces of the banned hormone erythropoietin, or EPO.

Armstrong denied ever using illegal substances during a career that ended last year with a record-extending seventh Tour de France title. The 34-year-old Texan said he was considering suing L'Equipe after its story appeared.

The rider today accused the French drug-testing laboratory, Tour de France organizers, L'Equipe, the French Sports Ministry and WADA President Dick Pound of a ``witch hunt."

``Pound, along with the French lab and the French ministry, have ignored the rules and broken the law," Armstrong said in an e-mailed statement. ``The time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks before they destroy the credibility of WADA and, in turn, the international anti-doping system."

Tribunal

A tribunal should be convened to examine possible legal and ethical violations by WADA in its treatment of the rider, Vrijman's report said. After the L'Equipe report, Pound said the allegations were ``pretty serious" if they could be proven.

``WADA violated applicable rules on athlete confidentiality by commenting publicly on the alleged positive findings, especially in relation with a particular rider, Lance Armstrong," Vrijman concluded.

Montreal-based WADA said it had ``grave concern" about Vrijman's findings, because his probe was too narrowly focused.

``An investigation into the matter must consider all aspects -- not limited to how the damaging information regarding athletes' urine samples became public -- but also addressing the question of whether anti-doping rules were violated," WADA said in an e-mailed statement.

Criticism

WADA, the UCI and L'Equipe criticized Vrijman for releasing the report before first informing them of his findings. The UCI, cycling's ruling body, in October appointed the lawyer from the Hague-based firm Scholten C.S. to investigate the handling of urine tests from the 1999 race.

``The UCI firmly deplores the behavior of Mr. Vrijman, who has spoken prematurely," the UCI said.

L'Equipe's journalist Damien Ressiot, the author of the Aug. 23 report, declined to comment before Vrijman's findings are fully disclosed. L'Equipe, France's main sports daily, is one of the main organizers of the Tour de France.

Armstrong won two more Tour de France titles than the most prolific former winners -- Jacques Anquetil, Eddy Merckx, Bernard Hinault and Miguel Indurain.

His exoneration comes a week after Spanish police said 200 riders may be guilty of blood doping following the discovery in Madrid and Zaragoza apartments of notes about drug-taking and bags of athletes' blood. Five men were arrested, including Manolo Saiz, manager of the Liberty Seguros team, who was released after two days.

Bans

Spanish cyclist Roberto Heras was banned for two years and stripped of his record fourth Tour of Spain title in February for testing positive for EPO. Two days later, U.S. Olympic cycling champion Tyler Hamilton lost his appeal against a two-year ban for doping.

Armstrong said the current scandal in Spain could be more serious than the so-called Festina affair of 1998, when Richard Virenque's squad was thrown off the Tour de France after drugs were found in a team car. At the 2001 Tour of Italy, 40 riders were charged with drug possession.

Report Clears Lance Armstrong Of Drug Allegations (FOR)

By Parmy Olson

Forbes, May 31, 2006

London - WADA loada baloney: Remember those swirling assertions back in 1999 about seven-time Tour de France winner Lance Armstrong and his apparent penchant for performance-enhancing drugs? Well according to a new 132-page report from a clutch of independent Dutch investigators, those allegations, made via certain press reports, were unfounded. The finger of blame is now being pointed squarely at anti-doping authorities including France's LNDD and the World Anti-Doping Agency, otherwise known as WADA.

It was in August last year that the French sports newspaper L'Equipe first brought the allegations to the fore after obtaining leaked test results of urine samples taken in 1999. It prompted the Texan cyclist to announce, tongue-in-cheek, that he might do the Tour again, just to "piss [the French] off". Mr. Armstrong, who ranks 15 on the Forbes Celebrity 100 list and counts AMD (nyse: AMD - news - people), Bristol-Myers Squibb (nyse: BMY - news - people) and Sirius Satellite Radio (nasdaq: SIRI - news - people) among his sponsors, can now stay in retirement and let cycling's governing body, the UCI, study the Dutch report before deciding its course of action.

One little hitch though. The UCI is reported to be rather miffed that the investigators and in particular the Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman, had announced their findings without going through the proper channels--namely, the UCI. The group said in a statement that it "firmly deplores the behavior of Mr. Vrijman." WADA also expressed "grave concern" in a statement posted on its Web site, over Vrijman's criticisms of anti-doping authorities.

It seems hard to condemn the lawyer for his zeal, though. He seems confident that his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely with respect to alleged use of doping in the 1999 Tour de France," and told The Associated Press that Wada and the LNDD may have "behaved in ways that are completely inconsistent with the rules and regulations of international anti-doping control testing."

Vrijman is now suggesting that a tribunal be created to "provide a fair hearing" to the people and organizations suspected of misconduct and decide on sanctions, if warranted. The full report was sent to the UCI, the LNDD, the French sports ministry, WADA and Armstrong's lawyer. The International Olympic Committee also had requested a copy.

Innocent Armstrong Quick To Attack (CNN)

CNN, June 1, 2006

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands -- An independent investigation has cleared seven times Tour de France champion Lance Armstrong of doping during the 1999 event and strongly criticised the World Anti-Doping Agency (WADA).

"The report confirms my innocence, but also finds that (WADA president) Mr (Dick) Pound along with the French lab and the French ministry have ignored the rules and broken the law," the American said in a statement.

"They have also refused to cooperate with the investigation in an effort to conceal the full scope of their wrongdoing."

He added: "I have now retired, but for the sake of all athletes still competing who deserve a level playing field and a fair system of drug testing, the time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks before they destroy the credibility of WADA and, in turn, the international anti-doping system."

Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman, assigned by the International Cycling Union (UCI) to investigate newspaper allegations, said on Wednesday testing procedures were insufficient to label Armstrong's sample positive.

He also referred to "misconduct" by WADA and the French national doping laboratory LNDD.

Armstrong had been accused by the French sports paper L'Equipe of using the endurance-boosting drug EPO on the way to the first of his seven victories.

And in an strongly-worded press release on Wednesday, the UCI said that they 'deplored' the behavior of Vrijman, claiming that he had released the report without their permission to the Dutch press and before all "interested parties" could comment.

"The UCI underlines its deep displeasure with regards to the regrettable development of this case," read a statement.

The 132-page report by Vrijman and his panel comes down firmly in favor of Armstrong, who has strenuously denied using banned substances. Possible violations

It recommended convening a tribunal to discuss possible legal and ethical violations by the World Anti-Doping Agency (WADA) and to consider "appropriate sanctions to remedy the violations."

L'Equipe reported in August 2005 that six of Armstrong's urine samples from 1999 came back positive for EPO when they were retested in 2004.

It claimed they were able to match the doping control forms attached to his old samples with alleged positive tests.

But Vrijman said on Wednesday that his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely with respect to alleged use of doping in the 1999 Tour de France."

The report also said the UCI had not damaged Armstrong by releasing doping control forms to the French.

Armstrong had challenged the validity of testing samples frozen six years ago, and how they were handled.

On his personal Web site he described the reports as part of a "witchhunt."

The aftermath of the report saw a string of accusations and counter-arguments.

WADA chief Dick Pound accused former ICU president Hein Verbruggen of leaking documents about the alleged positive tests to a reporter from L'Equipe.

Pound also questioned the union's willingness to fully investigate the allegations against Armstrong.

The French anti-doping laboratory at Chatenay-Malabry where the tests were carried out has been accused of violating confidentiality regulations.

While Mario Zorzoli, the doctor who gave copies of Armstrong's doping control forms to L'Equipe, was suspended by the UCI for one month earlier this year. He has since been reinstated.

Guardian, June 1, 2006

Lance Armstrong yesterday repeated his accusation that he was the victim of a "witch-hunt" after the appearance of a report into allegations made last August in the French newspaper L'Equipe that the blood-booster erythropoietin was found in urine samples provided by the seven-times Tour de France winner during his first win in the race in 1999.

The report from the Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman, who used to head his country's anti-doping agency, is yet to be published by cycling's governing body, the UCI, but was seen yesterday by the Guardian. In it Vrijman and two other investigators were unable to confirm whether proper procedures had been followed when samples from the 1999 Tour were re-tested in France's top anti-doping laboratory for erythropoietin, which was undetectable until 2000

Article continues

The report is also highly critical of the World Anti-Doping Agency and its head Dick Pound for his reaction that the revelations in L'Equipe needed investigating .

Armstrong said: "Although I am not surprised by the report's findings, I am pleased they confirm what I have been saying since this witch-hunt began: Dick Pound, Wada, the French laboratory, the French Ministry of Sport, L'Equipe and the Tour de France organisers (ASO) have been out to discredit and target me without any basis. The report confirms my innocence but also finds Mr Pound along with the French lab and the French ministry have ignored the rules and broken the law."

Pound said: "I don't know how a Dutch lawyer with no expertise came to a conclusion one of the leading laboratories in the world messed up the analysis. To say Armstrong is exonerated seems strange."

Cyclist Lance Armstrong Cleared Of Doping Charges (VOA)

Voice of America, May 31, 2006

Six-time Tour de France champion Lance ArmstrongIndependent Dutch investigators have cleared seven-time Tour de France cycling champion Lance Armstrong of the United States of doping in the 1999 race, and have blamed anti-doping officials for misconduct in the case.

In a 132-page report, the Dutch investigators recommended convening a tribunal to discuss possible legal and ethical violations by the World Anti-Doping Agency in the case.

The International Cycling Union had appointed Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman to investigate a French laboratory's handling of Armstrong's urine tests from the 1999 Tour.

Vrijman said his report "exonerates Armstrong completely." The cyclist has never tested positive for drugs and has vehemently denied using performance-enhancing substances.

DOJ_NMG_0030812

Last year, the French newspaper L'Equipe had accused Armstrong of using the banned endurance-booster EPO in 1999. L'Equipe based its story on alleged analyses of Armstrong's samples.

The International Cycling Union and the World Anti Doping Agency have criticized Vrijman for making his report public before they had a chance to read it.

Armstrong Cleared In Drug Inquiry (BBC)

BBC, May 31, 2006

Armstrong retired after his record seventh straight win in Le Tour Independent Dutch investigators have cleared Lance Armstrong of doping in the 1999 Tour de France.

French sports newspaper L'Equipe had claimed that Armstrong's samples on the 1999 Tour later tested positive.

But investigators exonerated him in a 132-page report on Wednesday and blamed anti-doping authorities for misconduct in dealing with the American cyclist.

"The report confirms my innocence," said Armstrong, who has repeatedly denied using banned substances.

Armstrong said the case amounted to a "witch-hunt" that was designed to "discredit" him.

"I have now retired, but for the sake of all athletes still competing who deserve a fair system of drug testing, the time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks before they destroy the credibility of WADA and, in turn, the international anti-doping system."

Cycling's governing body, the UCI, said it would make a full statement after studying the report.

If you look at how the result was obtained it was so different from the analysis procedure required by Wada... it doesn't even qualify as a finding

Emile Vrijman

Inquiry chairman L'Equipe reported last August that six of his urine samples from 1999, when he won his first Tour title, came back positive for the endurance-boosting hormone EPO after they were retested in 2004.

The UCI then appointed Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman last October to investigate the handling of urine tests by the French national anti-doping laboratory, known as LNDD.

But Vrijman, who headed the Dutch anti-doping agency for 10 years and later defended athletes accused of doping, said on Wednesday that his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely with respect to alleged use of doping in the 1999 Tour de France".

The report added that the UCI had not damaged Armstrong by releasing doping control forms to L'Equipe.

But it said Wada and the LNDD may have "behaved in ways that are completely inconsistent with the rules and regulations of international anti-doping control testing", and their actions may also have been against the law.

Vrijman said the laboratory had analysed the samples only as part of a research programme for the detection of EPO, so there was no way of confirming the tests.

Wada will respond in due course once it has fully reviewed the report

A World Anti-Doping Agency statement

"If you look at how the result was obtained it was so different from the analysis procedure required by Wada... it doesn't even qualify as a finding," he said.

"It may suffice for research purposes but as a valid doping result - no way."

He said samples may be used in research programmes only on the condition that all information tracing them to an individual is removed, but this was not the case.

Vrijman added: "Sometimes with doping cases you can say it was a technicality.

"These are not technicalities, these are fundamental issues which should have been done completely differently."

Five Live: Have your say However, the UCI (International Cycling Union) and the World Anti-Doping Agency (Wada) both criticised Vrijman for making the report public.

"The World Anti-Doping Agency expresses grave concern and strong disappointment," said an official Wada statement.

"Wada is not in a position to comment at this time other than to state that elementary courtesy and professionalism would have dictated that Wada should have been provided with a copy of the report before interviews were given to the media."

The UCI added in a statement: "Still waiting to receive the definite version of the said report written by Mr Vrijman, the UCI underlines its deep displeasure with regards to the regrettable development of this case."

Fentanyl Made In Illegal Labs (DN)

By Brad Heath And Joel Kurth

Detroit News, June 1, 2006

Doses of the painkiller fentanyl, thought to be the cause of dozens of drug overdose deaths in Metro Detroit in the past two weeks, appear to have been made illegally in underground laboratories, people familiar with an expanding police investigation said Wednesday.

The findings are based on chemical tests that indicate the fentanyl -- a powerful pain medication -- was not made the same way as the prescription forms of the drug, said Calvin Trent, director of the Detroit Bureau of Substance Abuse. He and others said investigators laid out those findings at a meeting with health officials Wednesday morning, though they offered few details.

"They've confirmed it's being clandestinely manufactured, but not in the Detroit or Wayne County area," Trent said. "It appears that the fentanyl was not made here or mixed here, but it was brought here and sold here."

Authorities suspect the painkiller, mixed with either heroin or cocaine, is to blame for a spike in drug overdose deaths involving 50 people in Wayne County during the past two weeks, including two on Wednesday.

They will not be able to definitively link the deaths to fentanyl until they complete toxicology tests, which can take several weeks. Since January 2005, the county has confirmed 130 fentanyl overdose deaths.

Other cases have been confirmed from Philadelphia to Chicago; a handful have been reported elsewhere in Michigan.

"There's still a lot of questions, but all evidence points to it being a mix that came onto the street from illegal networks," said Dr. Mark Greenwald, a Wayne State University psychiatry professor who is part of a task force of health officials and others assembled to respond to the overdoses.

Police seizures of the lethal cocktail in Detroit indicate it comes in varying strains, Greenwald said. Some drug mixes contained mostly fentanyl and some heroin; in others, the ratio was reversed.. Experts said prescription versions of fentanyl are chemically different from illegally produced versions and that tests can tell the two apart.

Carolyn Gibson, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said investigators won't say conclusively the drugs were illegally manufactured until all their tests are complete.

"We'd be premature in saying it's 100 percent definite, but that's what it's looking like," she said. Police in Philadelphia, where fentanyl has been blamed for about 40 deaths over two months, said they also suspect the drug was made illegally and that it was mixed into packets of heroin before reaching the city. They think all originated from one shipment of tainted heroin that was distributed to cities in the Northeast and Midwest, Philadelphia Police Lt. Pat Quinn said.

Illegal fentanyl labs have been around for at least 20 years, but are exceedingly rare because the process requires advanced knowledge of chemistry, said Tom Abercrombie, an Oakland, Calif., crime laboratory criminalist supervisor, who has investigated two such labs.

152 Nabbed During Blitz On Fugitives (BUFFNEWS)

By Vanessa Thomas, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, June 1, 2006

Murder suspect prominent among arrests over 5 days

A 26-year-old man wanted in a Rochester slaying was one of 152 dangerous fugitives and sexual predators arrested in Erie and Niagara counties during a five-day blitz that ended Saturday.

Mario Collier, arrested in Buffalo, is accused of shooting an accused drug dealer to death in January after luring him to the meeting place by dousing his friend with gasoline. He had been a fugitive for the last four months. A team of officers searched for him for three straight days, at the homes of relatives and friends, from Buffalo to Cheektowaga.

Teams of local, state and federal officers from 20 law enforcement agencies fanned out across the two counties to apprehend fugitives wanted on felony warrants for assault, rape, burglary, narcotics, parole and probation violations and failure to register as a sex offender. During the operation, 213 outstanding warrants were executed.

The sweep was part of Operation Rolling Thunder, a statewide initiative that began in November to capture the state's worst fugitives.

"This was our attempt to hunt down fugitives - the most dangerous fugitives - to take them off the streets in Rochester, Syracuse, Albany and Buffalo," U.S. Marshal Peter A. Lawrence said during a news conference Tuesday in Buffalo Police Headquarters.

"It's been extremely successful," said Lawrence, standing at a lectern and flanked by 12 of the region's top law enforcement officials. "This was great cooperation of every law enforcement agency in the area."

Saturday, police traced Collier to a home on Janet Street. But when officers knocked on the door, a woman spoke through the door, saying, "I'm naked. Come back tomorrow." Police negotiated with the woman, who eventually opened the door, clothed, and officers saw Collier, who surrendered without incident.

Across the state, 619 fugitives have been arrested so far during Operation Rolling Thunder stings in Rochester, Syracuse and Albany, according to Chauncey G. Parker, director of criminal justice for the state Division of Criminal Justice Services.

"Collier, without a doubt, was our No. 1 priority," said Daniel Larish, supervisory deputy for the U.S. marshals. "Any time you take a suspected murderer off the street, you help to make the streets safer." Collier, aka Marlo Allen Jr., was the last of four men arrested in the slaying of Josue Marrero, 23, in Rochester on Jan. 18.

The four men were trying to rob Marrero of his drugs and money, but when they could not find him, they kidnapped his friend, Terry Holmes, 23, and coerced him to set up a meeting with Marrero, and then shot and robbed Marrero when he arrived, according to Rochester police.

During the blitz in Erie and Niagara counties, officers seized three handguns and an assault rifle at a Hewitt Avenue address.

They also arrested Anthony Colon, 17, of Busti Avenue, who was wanted for violating parole from a sex-assault charge for abusing a girl, 8, police said.

Police said Colon is an active member of the 7th Street gang, a violent street gang that is battling the 1015 gang, whose turf warfare led to a double slaying April 17.

Also arrested was Marisa A. Battle, 36, on a Family Court violation, police said, and she faces more charges after officers found an illegal check-printing operation on Emerson Place.

The joint initiative was led by the Western District Office of the U.S. Marshals and the New York/New Jersey Regional Fugitive Task Force, assisted by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the FBI, the U.S. Immigration & Customs Enforcement, the State Police, the New York State parole officers, the Erie and Niagara county sheriff's departments, the Erie County Department of Probation, and local police departments - Buffalo, Niagara Falls, Cheektowaga, Amherst, the City of Tonawanda, the Town of Tonawanda, West Seneca, and Lewiston - and the U.S. attorney's office for the Western District of New York, and the Erie and Niagara county district attorney's offices.

Neither Federal Officer Nor Gentleman, Women Say (NYT)

By Vivian S. Toy And Julia C. Mead

Richard S. Kudlik enjoyed regaling his girlfriend with tales of his life as a United States marshal: of his dangerous assignments hunting fugitive criminals and of being so close to Hillary Rodham Clinton that she would request that he and his team provide for her security on certain occasions.

He would show up at her Long Island home with his gun and badge, Pam Brown recalled yesterday, wearing his blue raid jacket with "U.S. Marshal" emblazoned across the back. The license plate on his pickup truck read, "OFF2HUNT," and there was a United States marshal sticker on the windshield.

But after they had been dating for eight months, Ms. Brown said, Mr. Kudlik told one story too many, and what turned out to be his fictional life as a federal law enforcement officer quickly unraveled.

Ms. Brown set up a Web site last month to expose Mr. Kudlik as a 43-year-old heating and ventilation worker from Port Jefferson who is married and has two teenage children. She then reported him to the Marshals Service — as did several others, according to the agency — and he was arrested on Tuesday on charges of having a counterfeit marshal badge, a misdemeanor punishable by up to six months in prison.

Mr. Kudlik, who was freed on $5,000 bail, would not come to the door of his ranch house in Port Jefferson yesterday, but his wife, Denise Kudlik, fiercely defended him. She called Ms. Brown "a vindictive person" who is out to hurt her family "because she had an affair with my husband and she got burned," she said. "I have a 17-year happy marriage, and I'm not letting him go."

But Ms. Brown said her Web site, off2hunt.com, was about more than just Mr. Kudlik, as stated on its home page: "Our mission: Exposing married liars and cheaters! Do you think your man is cheating? Think he is lying to you?" It continues, "We'll expose him for you!" In the background, the pop singer Shaggy sings, "It Wasn't Me."

The site is among the latest in a series of Web sites with the goal of exposing cheating paramours.

"I didn't do any of this to get even with him," said Ms. Brown, a Web designer from Mattituck. "I did it because women need to be made aware that you have to be careful, and that even the best can turn out to be losers."

The Web site includes what it says are e-mailed testimonials from other women who say that Mr. Kudlik duped them with the same story: that he was a divorced father of two and that his work as a marshal meant irregular hours and an inability to meet on weekends and holidays.

Ms. Brown said that she met Mr. Kudlik several years ago through a mutual friend, but that he met most of his other lovers in a chat room for Long Island singles over 40. One wrote: "He told umpteen stories of all the 'missions' he was on in such great detail he could write a book."

Ms. Brown said she started dating Mr. Kudlik in September, but became suspicious in March, when he told her that he would be working at a Mississippi concert to protect Jennifer Nettles, a singer with the country band Sugarland and a childhood friend of his. Ms. Brown and three friends decided to go to the concert, and he promised to get them in.

"I went down there on his word," she said, but once she arrived, he was nowhere to be found. One of her friends was able to talk to Ms. Nettles. "She said, 'I have no clue who he is,' " Ms. Brown said. "That's when it all started to blow up."

Back on Long Island, Ms. Brown said, Mr. Kudlik apologized profusely and said that he had been unreachable in Mississippi because he had been too busy working. Ms. Brown said she believed him. "I wanted to believe him," she said.

A few weeks later, she said, she received an anonymous online instant message saying that Mr. Kudlik was not who he claimed to be and that he was married. That is when Ms. Brown decided to find a home phone number for him and wound up on the phone with his wife.

Ralph Rosado, a spokesman for the United States Marshals Service, said the service first learned of Mr. Kudlik more than a year ago, when marshals confiscated a badge and other marshal paraphernalia from Mr. Kudlik in April 2005 after a tip from the Nassau County police.

Mr. Kudlik told marshals that he had purchased the counterfeit items on the Internet and promised to stop masquerading as a marshal, so the marshals did not press charges.

But when he was arrested on Tuesday, marshals found several marshals' badges and money clips, five rifles, five handguns and two starter pistols. Mr. Rosado said the weapons were legal under a sports permit.

"We don't see this kind of thing too often," Mr. Rosado said. "I'm sure a lot of guys say a lot of things in bars, but to have all the paraphernalia to go with it — that's pretty unusual."

As for the Web site, Ms. Brown said that Mr. Kudlik had pleaded with her to take it down. "But that Web site is staying up," she said, "until a judge tells me to take it down."

Fake Fed Is A Chat Room Phony (NSDY)

By Christine Armario, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 1, 2006

Girlfriend finds beau neither an officer nor a gentleman, but rather a married mechanic's helper at Plum Island

The women he met on a "Long Island Over 40" America Online chat room knew him as U.S. Marshal Rick Kudlik. And he had everything to prove it: pewter badges, jackets and caps with the marshal's emblem, and detailed stories about busting fugitives and providing security for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"You couldn't even question his stories because you could see emotion in his face as he told them," said Pamela Brown, 39, of Mattituck, who dated Kudlik until recently. "He was real, he was kind, he cared about his work, but he also cared about people, no matter what they had done."

But the marshal's service says Kudlik was a fraud, and that the only federal entity he worked for was the Plum Island Animal Disease Center of the Department of Homeland Security, where, according to officials, he was a mechanic's helper.

The 34-year-old Port Jefferson man was arrested Tuesday by the real U.S. marshals, for allegedly possessing counterfeit marshal gear, after several women, including Brown, discovered they'd been duped and reported him.

"He was using the marshals service as a way to get girls," Deputy U.S. Marshal Ralph Rosado said. "He's really married with kids."

Kudlik did not return several calls to his home for comment.

Rosado said Kudlik had his first brush with the law in April of last year, when a Suffolk police officer spotted a marshal's jacket in Kudlik's car. Federal agents tracked him down and confiscated a fake badge. After he apologized, surrendering two marshal's emblem stickers and a jacket, the service agreed not to press charges and settled on a warning.

"But after information was received that he was continuing in his impersonation of a federal agent, we continued [to investigate]," said Rosado, referring to the complaints filed by Brown and other women.

Officials recovered an assortment of fake marshal paraphernalia in Kudlik's car when they arrested him as he embarked on an Orient Point ferry: patches, duffel bags, memo pads and three laminated "Fraternal Order of the U.S. Marshals" cards listing him as president.

Rosado said they were uncertain how Kudlik obtained the goods, but that he had a receipt from a German company that made him replica badges.

Kudlik was arraigned in federal court in Central Islip, where he pleaded not guilty and was released on a $5,000 unsecured bond on Tuesday, Rosado said.

Brown said that since someone anonymously informed her online that Kudlik wasn't who he claimed to be, she has encountered up to 10 other women with similar stories.

"He let people believe he was a man of integrity," Brown said. And his work as a marshal "was all he spoke about. It was like his being a marshal was his entire existence."

Brown said Kudlik often described his missions to her. Once, he told her he could not spend Christmas with her because he had to apprehend a fugitive in Wisconsin. "The guy was sitting in his kitchen eating dinner and Rick portrayed himself as the telephone repairman to supposedly gain access," she said of the story.

Brown said she ended their relationship in April when she discovered he was married, and confronted his wife, who told her he wasn't a marshal. She then created a Web site, www.off2hunt.com, after one of his chat-room names, to let others know her story and encourage more women to report him.

Christopher Kelly, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, said Kudlik works for a contract agency, Field Support Services, hired by the agency, and was suspended this week from all DHS facilities.

Brown said Kudlik often said "Semper Fi" in passing conversation, meaning "always faithful."

"Always insisted on honesty, loyalty," she said. "All the things that seem to be so important to him was everything he isn't."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Agency Head Slams Senate's Alien Bill (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

The Senate immigration bill makes the same mistake as the 1986 amnesty by restricting the ability of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services to share information on illegal alien guest-worker applicants who are criminals and terrorists, the agency's director said yesterday.

Emilio T. Gonzalez, whose agency would have to administer a guest-worker program, said not allowing the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to share information on someone who applies means they cannot begin the process of removing criminals and national security threats, even after they are rejected from the guest-worker program.

"It is important for us to be able to act on what we get when we run a background check on somebody," Mr. Gonzalez said in a briefing with reporters in which he weighed in on the Senate immigration bill, which would offer a chance for citizenship to millions of illegal aliens, expand legal immigration and start a new foreign-worker program.

Mr. Gonzalez said he hasn't seen any deal breakers in the bill, but said moving forward policy-makers will have to answer key questions about eligibility, types of acceptable documents, information-sharing and limits to judicial appeals.

"If we don't ask those hard national security questions, shame on me," he said.

The Senate passed its bill 62-36 last week, and now must work out differences with the House, which in December passed a bill that focuses mainly on securing the borders and cracking down on employers who hire illegal aliens.

Yesterday was the second time Mr. Gonzalez met with reporters since taking over as director on Jan. 4, and he is juggling an ongoing backlog reduction at the same time he is preparing his agency for new instructions from Congress. He said much press attention has been given to the guest-worker program, but the Senate bill also includes a major increase in legal permanent residents, or "green card" holders, which his agency will also have to process.

Mr. Gonzalez, a naturalized citizen himself, has established a new tone that national security should be foremost in employees' minds at the agency. He said his agency will need at least six months and maybe as much as a year to register current illegal aliens for a foreign-worker program -- far longer than the Senate bill envisions.

On the issue of information sharing and confidentiality of applications, Mr. Gonzalez said the law usually allows his agency to share information when its employees come across an application that raises questions. But he said the 1986 amnesty included confidentiality provisions that prohibited sharing information from those applications, and he said the Senate bill makes the same mistake.

"We ought not to be kept from using that information," he said.

The issue has already been fought out in the Senate, when Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, offered an amendment to change the confidentiality requirements. His amendment failed on a tie vote, 49-49.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and a key backer of the Senate bill, fought Mr. Cornyn's amendment. He said the underlying bill struck a balance that still allows law enforcement to go after cheaters, while at the same time not discouraging illegal aliens from coming forward.

"Our bill removes criminals and those trying to game the system. But it also protects the confidentiality of honest people applying to stay here and work. Otherwise they will remain in the underground economy and never apply, and that hurts American jobs and wages," he said.

His main worry was that sharing information would discourage some aliens from coming forward because they would fear making an innocent mistake that would hurt them later.

But Mr. Cornyn said his amendment only waived confidentiality at the end of all appeals, when the person would have been finally deemed ineligible.

"If you've exhausted all your appeals and you haven't played by the rules your information should be shared so that the same alien can't commit fraud elsewhere," said Don Stewart, a spokesman for Mr. Cornyn.

He said Mr. Gonzalez's statement should be a boost as they head into negotiations on a final bill.

"The director who has to actually implement many of the programs people are proposing is an important voice in this, and his guidance should inform this debate," Mr. Stewart said.

Immigration Bills Curb Court Reviews (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Immigration legislation now before Congress is threatening a long-standing safeguard to keep politics out of final decisions about who becomes an American, legal experts and immigrant rights advocates say.

The House and Senate have passed immigration bills that would reduce or eliminate federal courts' ability to intervene when immigration officials decide that applicants for citizenship lack "good moral character," a legal requirement. Critics of the proposed change contend the final say of a subjective standard should not be left to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, whose director is a presidential appointee.

"Should you have a political branch of the government deciding who gets to vote?" Seattle immigration lawyer Robert Gibbs said.

Current law allows immigrants denied citizenship to request a court review of their cases.

The House bill would eliminate that possibility. Under the Senate bill, authority of the courts would be "severely limited," says David Leopold of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. American Bar Association President Michael Greco says it "would take away meaningful judicial review."

Emilio Gonzalez, director of the immigration service, said his agency is already straining to eliminate backlogs and keep up with 7 million applications a year for visas, work permits and other benefits. "You should have some limit on the review process."

Last year, the immigration service approved 594,260 citizenship applications and denied 108,058. Of the denials, 10,151 requested new hearings before a different immigration adjudicator; 6,367 obtained citizenship.

Immigration attorneys insist court review is needed. Gibbs won a class-action case last year over the denial of citizenship to Washington state immigrants. "Our poster-child plaintiff had a misdemeanor ticket for being eight over the limit of oysters permitted to be picked up from the beach," he said.

Many Hondurans, Nicaraguans Failing To Renew TPS Permits (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

Tens of thousands of Honduran and Nicaraguan immigrants nationwide risk losing their legal status in the United States today because they have not renewed their temporary work permits under a program to help victims of natural disasters, some in the mistaken belief that they will soon be on the path to becoming U.S. citizens.

With the deadline approaching by the end of today, about half the eligible applicants have yet to apply for renewal. They could lose their jobs and face deportation, jeopardizing the livelihoods of thousands of relatives here and in their homelands who depend on their salaries.

About 75,000 Hondurans and 4,000 Nicaraguans got the permits, issued under the Temporary Protected Status (TPS) Program, after Hurricane Mitch in 1998. The permits, if renewed, would allow them to live and work legally in the United States for another year.

According to the latest numbers available as of Friday, only 37,870 Hondurans and 1,778 Nicaraguans nationwide have renewed, U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services said.

Spokesman Shawn Saucier said the agency hopes the other eligible applicants would renew by the end of today. But so far the numbers are far less than at this time in previous renewal years.

"We feel that these numbers are very low," Saucier said. "We're very concerned."

Many Hondurans and Nicaraguans have not yet renewed because they think they will soon benefit from immigration reforms, including a guest worker program and other measures that could pave the way for citizenship, immigrant advocates said. Many are reluctant to spend the $250 TPS renewal fee, preferring to save their money for future citizenship applications.

"We still believe there's a lot of confusion over the immigration reforms," said David Hernandez, counselor for immigration affairs at the Honduran Embassy. "Many appear to be waiting for the new rules.

"They think it's going to cost a lot," he said. "They believe they will pay double if they renew."

The confusion is being fueled by various factors, ranging from hope raised by the creation of a national immigrant rights movement to a misunderstanding about the way the U.S. political system works. Spanish-language media have also been predicting the passage of immigration legislation now winding through Congress.

Last week, the Senate approved legislation that would establish a guest worker program and allow illegal immigrants who have been here five years or longer to stay and apply for citizenship, as long as they pay back taxes, learn English and have not committed any serious crimes. The bill still faces tough opposition in the House.

"We're hopeful that people will realize that there is no temporary guest worker program at this time and will not take a chance of being deported from the United States," Saucier said.

There are other reasons, too, according to immigration advocates, diplomats and TPS applicants. Some Hondurans and Nicaraguans have run out of money because people with TPS had to pay federal income taxes in April.

Others are concerned that the United States might stop the program or give preference to other immigrant populations. If they renew, they fear that authorities will know their whereabouts and deport them. Others are concerned that if they have the permits, they might not be eligible for a future guest worker plan.

TPS is intended to help immigrants who have difficulty returning to their homelands because of civil conflict or natural disaster. The current permits expire July 5 and must to be renewed by the end of today.

In recent weeks, senior Honduran and Nicaraguan diplomats have traveled to cities with large populations from their countries, giving radio, television and newspaper interviews urging people to renew. In Honduras, the government has called upon citizens, through commercials and posters, to urge their relatives in the United States to renew their permits, Hernandez said.

U.S. immigration officials rejected an official request for an extension of today's deadline, he said. Yesterday, Honduran consulates across the nation were advised to find post offices that closed late today. Consular officials say they are expecting a last minute rush.

But the question on many minds is: How many?

The Rev. Brian Jordan of the Franciscan Immigration Center in New York City has urged Hondurans and Nicaraguans to renew their permits for weeks. Yesterday, four Hondurans and five Nicaraguans turned up at his center to get help.

"It's not a lot, but it's better than a month ago, when there was none," Jordan said.

Today, he's praying for more applicants.

"On this last day, I hope they realize this false optimism needs to be pushed away and be replaced with a reality check," Jordan said. "I just hope they get their facts straight and not get swayed about what TPS is or is not."

Between A Rock And 'Reform' (WP)

By George F. Will

"Why should we bother to reply to Kautsky?" Lenin asked. "He would reply to us, and we would have to reply to his reply. There is no end to that. It will be quite enough for us to announce that Kautsky is a traitor to the working class, and everyone will understand everything." The immigration debate, which is mostly among, and dangerous primarily to, Republicans, is becoming like that.

Rep. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, denounces as "selling American citizenship" the provision in the Senate bill that requires illegal immigrants to pay back taxes and fines, a provision that its supporters, such as John McCain, call "earned citizenship." And last week McCain said that denying illegal immigrants Social Security and other entitlements is akin to forcing them to "ride in the back of the bus." Regardless of what one thinks of his immigration policy and his aggressive rhetoric in its defense, one must admire his willingness to undo, by teaming with Ted Kennedy to pass "earned citizenship" provisions, much of what he has assiduously done to ingratiate himself with conservatives.

As members of the House and Senate head for a conference to try to reconcile the stark and probably irreconcilable differences incorporated in their two immigration bills, Republicans are between a rock and a hard place. And another rock. And another.

First, if the conferees agree to anything like the Senate bill, the House will reject it -- if it comes to a vote. Speaker Dennis Hastert has a "majority of the majority" rule: Nothing comes to the floor that does not have the support of a majority of Republicans. Probably 75 percent of House Republicans -- including Sensenbrenner, who will probably be the lead House negotiator -- oppose the two pillars of the Senate bill, a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already here. Actually, there are three paths: one for those who have been here five or more years, one for those who have been here between two and five years, and a path away from citizenship and the country for those who have been here less than two years. This plan, which is a huge incentive for the sort of traffic in fraudulent documents that is already pandemic, is to be enforced by a government that will not or cannot enforce existing immigration laws.

Second, if the conference agrees to anything like the House "enforcement first and, for now, only" bill, it will be rejected or filibustered to death in the Senate. All but six Democrats voted for the Senate bill, which a majority of Republicans opposed, so it has no momentum for respect among House Republican conferees.

Third, if any legislation is passed that contains any provision that can be stigmatized as "amnesty," come November some of the Republican base, which is already boiling, will emigrate from the political process by not voting.

Fourth, if no immigration legislation is enacted, voters of various stripes may say, as voters said of congressional Democrats who were in disarray over a crime bill in the summer of 1994, that these people cannot govern and should be given, like unruly 8-year-olds, a timeout. The timeout is now in its 12th year.

But if Congress fails to pass immigration reform, that will not really deserve to be called a failure, for two reasons. First, the moment may not be ripe for reform, because the country is of two minds -- actually, more than two -- about the issue. Second, the system the Framers created, with two legislative bodies having different dynamics because their constituencies have different characteristics, is in this instance performing approximately as the Framers intended.

Senators, only one-third of whom are ever facing imminent elections, are somewhat insulated by six-year terms from the public's fevers. And senators represent larger, less homogenous, more complex constituencies than most House members do.

There is more to democracy than government by adding machine -- merely counting numbers. There also should be institutional ways of measuring, venting and accommodating the intensity of factions. The Senate does that by permitting filibusters. In the House, two-year terms guarantee that intensities are registered. As Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R-Minn.) recently told The Post, "House members' elections are not periods with us, they're just commas. We keep our finger on the public pulse all the time, not just every six years."

The House is supposed to be the barometer that measures the political weather of the moment. It is not failing to do that.

Have Republicans Forgotten? (WT)

By Gary Bauer

Would Republicans regret the day they stood against amnesty for illegal immigrants?

In the New York Times, columnist David Brooks asked of conservatives, "Do they think the GOP can have a future if it insults even the Hispanics who are already here [by opposing amnesty proposals]?"

Mr. Brooks was echoing the sentiment of more than a few normally clear-sighted conservatives who suggest that unless the Republican Party gets behind liberal immigration reform plans it will alienate Hispanics and soon be relegated to minority status.

Former Republican National Committee Chairman Ed Gillespie recently warned: "Anti-immigration rhetoric [read: border-security-first legislation] is a political siren song, and Republicans must resist its lure by lashing ourselves to our party's twin masts of freedom and growth or our majority will crash on the shoals."

But as lawmakers consider various immigration reform measures, they should take a hard look at the reams of polling data that show that standing strong on conservative values, not giving in on amnesty, is the key to winning the hearts, minds and votes of Hispanic Americans.

First off, Hispanics are much more conservative on immigration than is commonly believed. An August 2005 Time poll of Hispanics revealed 61 percent considered illegal immigration either an "extremely serious" or "very serious" problem. In addition, 41 percent thought the U.S. was not doing enough to secure its borders against illegal immigration, while 19 percent felt it was doing "too much." Moreover, a 2005 Pew Hispanic Center poll showed a majority of both American-born and foreign-born Hispanics opposed increasing the flow of legal immigrants from Mexico and Latin America.A majority of Hispanics (53 percent) even supported building vast border fences and stiffening penalties for illegal aliens.

As an alternative to amnesty, Indiana Rep. Mike Pence recently presented the Border Integrity and Immigration Reform Act, which would require all illegal citizens to leave the country, obtain a visa and re-enter legally. Essentially, the bill includes all of the important border security measures of the House bill passed last year, and adds a provision — allowing illegals to obtain guest worker visas for a duration of two years. Mr. Pence's plan would also create private worker placement agencies to link specific workers to specific jobs for specified time periods in the United States.

Mr. Pence's "rational middle ground approach" is a breath of fresh air in the immigration debate, because it recognizes the economic need for additional workers while also addressing the security issues at stake. This non-amnesty solution would be acceptable not only to conservatives, but also to American Hispanics who oppose illegal immigration and "reform" proposals that reward delinquency. After all, many Hispanic Americans did things the right way — enduring a long legal process to enter the country and pursue citizenship. For these immigrants, calls for amnesty by their former compatriots mock the laws and values that made America so appealing in the first place.

So, what can Republicans do to win the allegiance of Hispanic voters? Simple: Stand up for conservative values. A recent Time poll found that 72 percent of Hispanics considered "moral values issues" as either "extremely" or "very" important, while 87 percent felt similarly about homeland security.

Hispanics' cultural conservatism is well established. On abortion, a plurality of Hispanics (45 percent in the Time survey) wants to see Roe v. Wade overturned, even as Roe maintains majority support (65 percent) among the population at large. Hispanics also oppose homosexuality and homosexual marriage. A 2002 Pew Hispanic Center and Kaiser Family Foundation poll found 72 percent of Hispanics said they felt homosexual sex between adults is "unacceptable," compared to 59 percent for whites. Polls also routinely show much less support among Hispanics for same-sex "marriage."

Republicans have a distinct advantage with Hispanics on national security, too. A 2004 pre-election survey of Hispanics revealed that 40 percent planned to vote for President Bush mainly because of his solid stance on national security issues.

Republican lawmakers must recognize that Hispanics are conservative in a fundamental way. In fact, it was on the strength of his conservative positions on values issues that George W. Bush doubled the Republican share of the Hispanic vote for president in just eight years. No small feat.

Clearly, reaching out to the burgeoning Hispanic electorate has become a matter of political necessity for Democrats and Republicans alike. Not only are Hispanics the fastest growing ethnic group in America, but they are, politically speaking, a relatively untapped resource — only 47 percent of eligible Hispanics voted in 2004, compared to 64 percent of the population at large.

But if, in attempting to capitalize on these powerful electoral realities, Republicans capitulate on amnesty, not only will they give their conservative base reason to stay home on Election Day, but they may alienate a growing constituency that shares those core conservative values of family, hard work, respect for the rule of law and patriotism.

In Defense Of Familia (USAT)

By Ruben Navarrette

USA Today, June 1, 2006

As a Mexican-American, I'm hearing from a lot of U.S.-born Hispanics who are convinced that the immigration debate is a proxy for an assault on them, their language and their culture. The Senate fed that perception last month when it voted to declare English the "national language," and turned the debate over immigration into a debate over language.

Correction: This was always a debate about language — and culture and ethnicity. The Senate just made it official.

For many Americans, the problem isn't just that people are coming into the country illegally. It's that once they get here, these folks change their surroundings, maintain their Spanish and transform Main Street into Little Mexico. Those changes terrify many Americans, who complain about feeling like visitors in their native land.

And how do they respond? A recent report by the Southern Poverty Law Center found that tension over illegal immigration has contributed to a spike in hate groups and hate crimes. In fact, says a spokesman for the center, the immigration issue is a recruitment tool for racists and reactionaries.

Heated reactions

I could have told them that. As one of the few Hispanic syndicated columnists, I'm treated like a piata. There was the reader who accused me of supporting "the Mexican invasion because you're Mexican" and the gentleman who suggested that by supporting comprehensive reform, I was probably "protecting some relatives."

There was even a woman who called to complain about a column I had written and ended up screaming into the phone about how "you people never understand" the immigration issue.

I understand this much: As the national mood on immigration reform turns vile and even in some cases violent, there is the very real possibility of a backlash by assimilated, U.S.-born Hispanics.

It makes sense. There is so much bad out there — from death threats received by California Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, to the deliberate burning of a Mexican restaurant near San Diego, to the beating and sodomizing of a Hispanic youth in Houston by two young thugs who, according to police, yelled racial slurs — that it is bound to repel the good-hearted.

Recently, my cousin called me in a rage after stumbling on to a video game in which players shoot Mexican immigrants crossing the border. The game refers to some Mexicans as "breeders" and splatters blood when players hit their target. Even as an assimilated Mexican-American with limited exposure to Mexico, my cousin said, the ugliness of it made him want to defend Mexican immigrants just as he would a member of his immediate family.

Other Mexican-Americans tell me the same thing. A lot of them use the same word: defend. They want to defend immigrants.

Granted, 40 million Hispanics aren't monolithic. Note the emergence of You Don't Speak for Me, a group of Hispanics who oppose illegal immigration. Also note that in a poll last year by the Pew Hispanic Center, U.S.-born Hispanics were divided. Fifty-five percent said illegal immigrants help the economy by providing low-cost labor, while 34% said they hurt the economy by driving down wages.

Shifting attitudes

Here's the deal. The U.S-born Hispanic community is no different from the American community. There are the extremes, but the majority of folks are in the sensible center. Whenever someone does something dumb or hurtful, they recoil.

When protesters waved the Mexican flag, some folks in the middle moved to the right. But now that they've read about hate crimes and racist video games and English being declared the national language, some are likely to move to the left and toward a greater identification with immigrants.

That's what I saw at a taping in Los Angeles of the 2006 ALMA awards, which honor Hispanics in entertainment. In a 90-minute ceremony to be aired on ABC on Monday, there were at least a dozen references to immigration and many references by presenters to Mexican immigrants as familia (family).

Actor Jimmy Smits noted the irony of playing, on NBC's The West Wing, a Hispanic who gets elected president while, as he put it, "out in the streets, my people were yelling si se puede (yes, we can)."

I got stuck on the "my people." Smits isn't Mexican-American. His father was born in the Dutch Suriname, in South America, and his mother is Puerto Rican. No matter. In this fight, he identifies with Mexican immigrants.

Something significant is happening in the Hispanic community. People say the immigration issue woke the Sleeping Giant. But mark my words: It's not just the giant whom immigrant-bashers should worry about. It's his familia.

TAX:

Death And Taxes (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0030823

By Edward C. Prescott

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

You can't take it with you. Too bad, because it would sure be convenient to set up an eternal rollover account for financial assets. Just think of all the time and resources that would be saved if people didn't have to hire expensive lawyers and clever accountants to get around the government's attempt to grab a share of their earthly bounty. Not to mention the better use of those accountants' and lawyers' time.

And while we're at it, our public employees have better things to do than construct estate tax codes, design Web sites with FAQs and answer phones to explain how those taxes work, and then penalize those who unwittingly or otherwise skirt the law. Those costs are real and must be part of the equation when considering the efficacy of estate taxes.

These and other issues loom large as Congress grapples with how to deal with coming changes in estate tax law. Under the Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act of 2001, the estate tax is slated to expire in 2010 -- for one year -- and return in 2011 with personal exclusion rates that are below current levels. Today, Americans can transfer $2 million to beneficiaries federal tax free, with that rate increasing to $3.5 million in 2009 before the big switch in 2010. The House has already passed a bill to make the repeal of estate taxes permanent and the ball is now in the Senate's court.

Putting aside the inefficiencies of such inconsistent rule making, the point remains that people cannot take their IRAs with them, and the fundamental question is this: Who gets it? It's a simple question that deserves a simple answer, but when a certain little word -- tax -- gets involved, things are never very easy.

Economists like simplicity. It's one of our most endearing traits. As soon as you complicate things by getting between a man and his intentions you create all sorts of distortions that are often suboptimal (and are the devil to model). Taxes excel at these shenanigans. And those distortions don't end when the grim reaper comes calling. Ashes to ashes, dust to trust.

In the end, though, all those opportunity costs -- both private and public -- would be worth absorbing if we were really getting a good return on our estate taxes. From what I can tell, there are two main arguments in favor of an estate tax: the increased revenue that government receives to go about the people's business; and the desire to somehow balance life's unfairness by limiting the amount of capital assets that "the rich" can leave their kids.

On the second point, there is little to say except that what's fair for one is often penalty for another. What is fair, for example, about telling someone that he will be unable to distribute his hard-earned money, which has already been taxed once, to his heirs as he sees fit? Such a person has zero incentive to accept an estate tax for which he sees no justification. He will do his best to try to avoid this tax through every legal means necessary, after which he may be inclined to consume more than he otherwise would, or just quit working sooner than otherwise. And while there's nothing wrong with consuming one's assets, if such consumption comes at the expense of capital that would otherwise be put to better use, such consumption is suboptimal. Recent empirical work on the disincentive effects of estate taxes has proven these phenomena true.

And that gets to our first point about the supposed budgetary benefits of such a tax. Since an estate tax is really just another name for a tax on capital income, then there is certainly no justification for such a tax. I, and others, have written before in these pages about the inefficiency of capital income taxes, and there's no need to revive those arguments here, except to say that we can only grip the neck of our vibrant economic goose so tightly before it eventually dies and quits laying those golden eggs. And many of those golden eggs come in the form of capital that allows descendents to keep family businesses intact, or to begin new businesses that fuel our economy.

Besides, even if estate taxes were not inefficient and could be construed as fair, they would still do little to address the budget deficit. In 2003, net estate taxes accounted for $20.7 billion, a drop in the bucket of an $11 trillion economy. Clearly, we are not going to balance the budget by grave robbing.

Yet what about all the money that is left in bequests to fund university alumni buildings, art museum wings and public broadcasting? If we abolish the death tax, won't charitable organizations be hurt? I admit to a soft spot for this argument, but the fact is that people will still give to charity. In 2003, charitable contributions reported on 1040 income tax forms totaled $ 145 billion, which is roughly 10 times the $14.6 billion charitable contributions reported on the estate tax forms. This indicates that people are motivated to give to their favorite causes for a variety of reasons and will not cease such philanthropy if estate taxes are abolished; also, fundraisers will not lose their incentives.

The old maxim says that there are only two things in life that we can't avoid, death and taxes, but why pile on by combining the two? The Senate should join the House in permanently repealing the estate tax.

An Accidental Tax Boon (WP)

By Robert H. Nelson

Sometimes in Washington, good things are more likely to happen by accident than by congressional or executive design. Treasury secretary nominee Henry M. Paulson Jr. is no doubt aware of this fact, but it's one worth keeping in mind in the continuing debate over tax reform, which is sure to command a good deal of the new secretary's attention. I'm thinking of one program in particular: the alternative minimum tax, or AMT.

The AMT is viewed by many as a bad thing. Yet, consider this: There is wide agreement among economists on the benefits of a federal "flat tax" on income that would apply a uniform rate to every taxpayer and eliminate most current deductions and tax credits. A flat tax would get rid of a large number of economic distortions resulting from the many tax "subsidies" that often benefit narrow interest groups. This is tax "pork," and Congress is as addicted to it as to the ordinary spending kind.

In places around the world, including Eastern Europe, governments creating new tax systems have been turning to a flat tax to avoid this sort of thing. What does this have to do with the AMT? Just this: As Post business reporter Albert B. Crenshaw has noted, the AMT "approaches a modern-day flat tax." It imposes a uniform rate of 26 percent up to $175,000 in income, and above that 28 percent.

Tax revolutions are few and far between. Taxes are so important to the economy that major changes in tax law are best achieved incrementally, giving notice well in advance and avoiding potentially large disruptions from big surprises. That's part of the genius of the AMT. If it is left alone, it will move us gradually but steadily toward a flat tax on income as inflation brings more people within its ambit.

Some leading Republican conservatives have long advocated a flat tax. Yet few of them are speaking out vigorously for retention of the AMT. In fact, many are joining the clamor in Congress for its repeal or limitation. It would seem that they were either hypocritical in advocating a flat tax or have somehow failed to recognize that the AMT is in essence a new, evolving form of flat tax.

Many Democrats are joining the calls for drastic cutbacks in the AMT. This shows a certain disregard for the fact that the existing system of tax subsidies is most generous to higher-income groups and does less for the bottom half of the income distribution -- their supposed constituency.

The alternative minimum tax dates to the 1960s -- and in its present form, to the 1980s. It was never intended as a major tax reform but rather was simply a political expedient to provide some cover when a few very rich people were revealed to be paying little in income taxes. But as Americans' incomes have risen, more and more people have been finding that their tax payments are now determined by the AMT.

Congress has already taken steps to reduce the AMT's impact. The recently enacted tax bill raises the special AMT "standard exemption" to $62,550 for a couple filing jointly and to $42,500 for a single filer. At these levels, some 5 million taxpayers will be subject to the AMT for their 2006 taxes. But these changes are for one year, and absent new congressional action, the exemption will fall back to $45,000 for couples and $33,750 for individuals in the 2007 tax year. If that happens, as many as 25 million taxpayers might be affected by the AMT. We would be moving toward a nationwide flat tax.

If we wait long enough, and with some continuing degree of inflation, the AMT flat tax eventually will apply to most taxpayers. The AMT will, in effect, have become the federal income tax system. And unlike most other important policy changes, this is one in which Congress need do nothing, although at some point it would probably be desirable to modify details of the current AMT that limit its effectiveness as a flat tax.

If the present AMT rates were applied as a universal flat tax -- and especially if the AMT exemption were reduced and certain remaining AMT exclusions eliminated -- the resulting federal revenue might even come to exceed current expenditure levels. The solution would then be to reduce the flat tax rate (the AMT rate) so that revenue and expenditures were brought back into balance.

In the longer run, the AMT could open the way to more radical reforms that might even change the basic nature of Washington spending habits. One option would be as follows: Each year the president would submit his budget proposal, and Congress, in response, would enact final appropriations. A neutral expert commission would then estimate the resulting federal revenue requirements, and a new flat tax rate, calculated to balance the budget, would be set for the forthcoming tax year. If Congress wanted to go on a spending spree, taxpayers would see the consequences directly and immediately in their pocketbooks.

The Social Security system is another area in which the AMT might facilitate radical change. Social Security taxes could be abolished and the flat tax adjusted upward to compensate for the lost revenue. The Social Security trust fund is largely an accounting fiction, and it is time to integrate the Social Security tax with the income tax system. Alternatively, Social Security tax payments could become a deductible credit from the required AMT payment.

Such major changes in tax law, and some needed refinements to the existing AMT, can be debated and discussed. Right now, the most important step is to keep Congress from ruining a good thing. If it can be persuaded to leave the AMT alone next year and in future years, Congress will continue progress toward a flat tax revolution that has been in the works for many years. Such a gradual process is probably the only way the United States will ever adopt such a major change. The AMT is a tax policy windfall that ought to be protected and preserved.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Gives CIA's New Director A Boost (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, May 31, 2006

President Bush gave the embattled Central Intelligence Agency his vote of confidence on Wednesday, saying the spy outfit will succeed at its mission and make Americans safer with new director Gen. Michael Hayden at its helm.

Bush made the quick trip from the White House to CIA headquarters in suburban Virginia for a ceremonial swearing-in of Hayden. The former head of the National Security Agency who served as the United States' No. 2 intelligence official for the last year was officially sworn in Tuesday and had already had his first day on the job when Bush arrived.

"He's such a good man we're going to swear him in twice," the president joked.

While the CIA once was pre-eminent among the U.S. intelligence community's 15 other spy agencies, the 2004 intelligence reform law made it equal to other organizations including the NSA and Defense Intelligence Agency.

Bush, seeking to both reassure CIA employees and spur them on to additional changes, said he had tasked Hayden with further developing the agency's old-fashioned spy capabilities and improving its analytical skills.

"America's leaders are going to have the best possible intelligence and Mike Hayden is going to work with you to see that that's the case," the president said. "Mike understands the CIA must transform to confront new dangers and do so without slowing the high tempo at which it already operates."

Bush appeared warmly welcomed by the several hundred employees gathered in the CIA's main lobby despite his White House's tussles with the CIA and the agency's tradition of remaining distant from politics. He said he is confident a Hayden-led CIA can deliver.

"In Mike Hayden, you have a leader who recognizes your talents, who understands your challenges and will ensure that you remain the finest intelligence agency in the world," Bush said.

The president was briefed privately on unknown topics for about 45 minutes before the short public event.

After taking the oath for a second time, Hayden spoke briefly to the CIA's officers in his blue Air Force uniform, four stars on each shoulder. This week marks the first time since 1953 that the agency has been headed by an active duty military officer.

"Let's just go to work," he said.

Hayden Takes Oath As CIA Director (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

New CIA Director Gen. Michael V. Hayden yesterday drew 1,500 rank-and-file agency employees to the halls of the spy agency's Langley headquarters for his second swearing-in this week, telling his co-workers in clipped military parlance, "Let's just go to work."

The Air Force general was officially sworn in Monday at the agency, but returned to the same site yesterday for a ceremonial swearing-in.

"He's such a good man, we're going to swear him in twice," President Bush joked.

The president lavished praise on the general, who wore his blue Air Force uniform, four stars on each shoulder, for the ceremony.

"Mike is a patriot; he's a reformer. He's one of our nation's finest intelligence professionals. I know firsthand how good this guy is," Mr. Bush said. "He brings more than two decades of experience in the intelligence field. He is going to be a superb leader for the dedicated men and women of the CIA."

For his part, Gen. Hayden told the president and the employees now working under him: "I could not be more grateful."

The oath was given to Gen. Hayden by Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, who oversees more than a dozen spy operations, including those at the CIA.

Gen. Hayden, 61, was confirmed last week by the Senate by a vote of 78-15, even though Democrats initially questioned his past leadership at the National Security Agency, which oversaw a controversial domestic wiretap program. He replaces Porter J. Goss, a former congressman who resigned after 18 months as the agency's director amid criticism that he had failed to push the agency into the 21st-century war against terror.

The president sought to reassure the rank-and-file at the CIA that their new boss was the right man for the job.

"America's leaders are going to have the best possible intelligence, and Mike Hayden is going to work with you to see that that's the case," Mr. Bush said. "Mike understands the CIA must transform to confront new dangers and do so without slowing the high tempo at which it already operates. ... In Mike Hayden, you have a leader who recognizes your talents, who understands your challenges and will ensure that you remain the finest intelligence agency in the world."

After taking the oath for the second time, Gen. Hayden, the first active-duty military officer to head the spy agency since 1953, spoke briefly to the CIA staff.

"To my new friends and partners here at the Central Intelligence Agency, thank you for the warmth of your welcome over the last 24 hours. ... Mr. President, thank you for the honor of placing your confidence in me, and for all of us here and around the world, thank you for the faith you have placed in this agency," the general said.

Bush Hails Role Of C.I.A. As New Chief Takes Oath (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

WASHINGTON, May 31 — President Bush delivered a pep talk to employees of the Central Intelligence Agency on Wednesday, assuring them that the beleaguered agency played a critical role in the nation's security and remained "vital" to the work of the White House.

Addressing the employees after Gen. Michael V. Hayden was sworn in as C.I.A. director, Mr. Bush praised the agency's work, which he called "essential to understanding the plans and intentions of dangerous regimes and terrorist organizations around the world."

"I cannot do my job without the Central Intelligence Agency," Mr. Bush said, addressing employees inside the main lobby of the agency's headquarters at Langley, Va.

The event was the second swearing-in for General Hayden in two days. The general officially became director at a private ceremony on Tuesday, and Wednesday's public event seemed largely intended to lift morale inside an agency that has lost its place as the cornerstone of the American intelligence community.

In contrast to the private White House ceremony 20 months ago, when Porter J. Goss was sworn in as director, the speeches on Wednesday were also an effort to portray calm after several rocky years at the C.I.A.

Standing alongside General Hayden and John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, Mr. Bush praised both men and predicted a more streamlined intelligence community.

Earlier this month, Mr. Goss resigned as C.I.A director after fierce turf battles with Mr. Negroponte over the agency's role in intelligence collection and analysis.

Mr. Bush praised Mr. Goss on Wednesday, saying the former director "leaves behind a C.I.A. that's stronger than the one he found."

General Hayden, who addressed C.I.A. employees on Tuesday and received a standing ovation, refrained from a lengthy public address on Wednesday.

He thanked the president and his family and said, "Let's just go to work."

General Hayden wore his blue Air Force uniform at the ceremony, and has indicated that he has no immediate plans either to retire from the military or to begin dressing in civilian clothes as head of the C.I.A.

At his confirmation hearings, he said that his military career had shaped his worldview, and that deciding to wear civilian clothes would change little.

"The fact that I have to decide what tie to put on in the morning doesn't change who I am," he said.

But the general said that if he believed that being in the military was hindering his ability to bond with the C.I.A. work force, he would consider retiring his military commission.

The choice of a military officer to lead the civilian spy agency initially drew criticism from several lawmakers, who suggested that the C.I.A. might surrender its independence as the Pentagon was expanding its intelligence gathering operations.

But after the confirmation hearings, several senators said he had convinced them that he would act independently of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld while in charge at the C.I.A.

Yet the issue remains sensitive on Capitol Hill. Last Thursday, the Senate Intelligence Committee approved language in the 2007 authorization bill that future C.I.A. directors be civilians and that General Hayden was "not subject to the supervision or control of the secretary of defense" so long as he ran the C.I.A. as an active duty officer.

Spies Are Called Essential (WP)

By Walter Pincus

President Bush, at the public ceremony swearing in Gen. Michael V. Hayden as director of the CIA, yesterday urged continued development of human intelligence, calling it essential in determining the intentions of "dangerous regimes and terrorist organizations."

In focusing his brief remarks on the CIA's need to recruit spies "to penetrate closed societies and secretive organizations," the president hit on an agency problem highlighted last week in a Senate Select Committee on Intelligence report. The committee said it was concerned that the CIA had not resolved issues that made it difficult to place new officers abroad under "non-official cover," a status that puts them in covert civilian roles and outside U.S. embassies where they lack diplomatic protection.

At his confirmation hearing last month, Hayden pledged increased use of such covert operations. This emphasis has been underway at the CIA since then-Director George J. Tenet began, after the Sept. 11 attacks, to move more case officers in the agency's clandestine service out of embassies and into undercover roles that would allow them to meet and attempt to recruit individuals who could penetrate terrorist circles. That movement continued, though more slowly, during the past 18 months that former representative Porter J. Goss (R-Fla.) ran the agency.

Placing U.S.-born covert officers abroad is difficult and dangerous, present and former CIA officials said. Recently, an Italian magistrate publicly identified what he said were 13 CIA officers operating in that country. And agency aircraft used to transport suspected terrorists have been spotted by civilian airport watchers.

All are a sign that the CIA is not doing enough to keep its covert officers' identities secret, especially in the Internet age when so much personal information can be easily searched, said one congressional aide familiar with the Senate report.

"We understand how difficult it is, and they are working to fix it, but the agency doesn't seem yet up to the task," the aide said.

An agency official with clandestine experience said such protections are essential. "Because cover exists to protect our people and assist our operations, its strength and improvement are a constant concern for CIA," the official said. "We have been enhancing our cover tradecraft to meet the challenges of the Internet age, when personal data is more easily accessible than ever before. To be sure, there is more to be done, and no one here underestimates the complexity and difficulty of the task," he added.

But even more important than such security is recruiting the right person, said a former CIA station chief with experience in the Middle East. The right person must be able to live the life of the cover assignment as well as operate as an intelligence gatherer, often in a difficult foreign environment. One classic past cover for such covert officer was with American businesses doing work abroad. But because the officers had to be identified to the top company officials, there was always fear of exposure.

"Not many Americans want to do this, and most Americans, who are terrible with foreign languages, do not do it very well," the former station chief said. He cited examples where Arab-speaking Americans from Detroit's Arab population were sent to the Middle East and were easily identified because of their accents or dialect.

Another official, still working for the agency, recalled that Cuban intelligence quickly identified Spanish-speaking CIA officers who infiltrated that country because of their manner of speaking. "They could even tell where they learned their Spanish," the official said. Even easier to identify were African Americans sent to African countries who could not hide their lack of knowledge of tribal dialects or history.

"The Hollywood version of a 'Mission Impossible' team, where people somehow mystically integrate themselves into a society, has taken hold. In real life, it does not work that way," the former station chief said. The CIA "ought to go back to basics and stop believing there mystically is some new kind of cover for placing officers abroad."

Stolen Data On Vets Include Addresses, Phone Numbers (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

WASHINGTON — The Veterans Affairs Department lost more personal data on 26.5 million veterans than it first acknowledged last week, according to a memo released Wednesday. In addition to Social Security numbers and birthdates, files stolen from a VA analyst's home last month included addresses and phone numbers in many cases, the memo said.

One file containing more than 6,700 records pertaining to veterans exposed to mustard gas was lost, said the memo, which was written by a VA privacy officer. The VA gave the memo to the House Veterans' Affairs Committee at the request of Rep. Bob Filner of California, the panel's acting ranking Democrat. USA TODAY obtained the memo from the committee.

Privacy experts say the Social Security numbers could be used to open fraudulent credit cards or bank accounts.

“These types of data contain more than limited financial information. The codes contain information about veterans' medical conditions,” Filner said in a statement.

Joe Davis, a spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said the VA needs to do a better job of reaching out to affected veterans. He said it's particularly important for the department to contact older veterans and their families to encourage them to monitor their bank and credit card accounts.

“It's maddening that the VA is not more forthcoming,” Davis said.

Matthew Burns, a spokesman for the VA, said the department has taken aggressive steps to secure its data, including personnel changes in the department from which the data were lost.

“VA's initial and primary efforts have focused on notifying veterans and some spouses whose most sensitive and identifiable information … may have been compromised,” Burns said.

The VA said it was dismissing the analyst, and his supervisor has resigned. Dennis Duffy, the acting head of the division in which the analyst worked, has been placed on administrative leave.

DOJ_NMG_0030829

Also Wednesday, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson named former Maricopa County, Ariz., prosecutor Richard Romley as his new special adviser for information security.

A department analyst had taken the data home on computer disks and an external storage device, the memo said. On May 3, burglars stole the disks, memory device and a laptop computer from the analyst's suburban Washington home. Nicholson has said that the crime appeared to be random and that the data were not a target.

The memo noted that the information was written in a code that requires training and software to access. The VA says it has not received reports of stolen data being used for fraudulent purposes.

VA Data In Format Not Widely Used (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The sensitive personal information of 26.5 million veterans that was stolen from a Department of Veterans Affairs data analyst last month was stored in a format that could make it difficult for thieves to use, according to an internal VA memo.

In the May 5 memo, VA privacy officer Mark Whitney wrote that the critical data "may not be easily accessible" because most of it -- including names, birth dates and Social Security numbers -- was stored in a specialized, standard format used for data manipulation and statistical analysis.

The format "requires specialized application software and training" to write computer code "to access and manipulate the data for use," Whitney wrote in the memo, obtained yesterday by The Washington Post.

Ari Schwartz, deputy director of the nonprofit Center for Democracy and Technology, a privacy group, said Whitney is generally right that the information would be hard to extract.

It would be easier, however, if the laptop stolen along with an external hard drive and several data disks has the software needed to view the data, he said. "This is not nearly the type of protection they would have had if they had followed basic security procedures and encrypted this," Schwartz said.

The Whitney memo, dated two days after the burglary at the analyst's Aspen Hill home and distributed to several high-ranking VA officials, provides the first public indication that some addresses and telephone numbers were among the stolen data; it refers to such information being part of electronic files of a national survey of about 20,000 veterans in 2001.

Also stolen was an electronic spreadsheet with 6,744 records about "mustard gas veterans" -- generally, veterans who took part in chemical warfare tests during World War II. Another stolen file contains as many as 10 diagnostic codes from the treatment file of one veteran who visited the VA health-care system on 57 dates.

"These type of data contain more than limited financial information, the codes contain information about veterans' medical conditions," Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) said in a statement. "It is not appropriate for this information to ever enter the public domain."

Matthew Burns, a VA spokesman, said the department has been "focused on getting notification to veterans that some of the most sensitive data was out there."

Also yesterday, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson announced that he had named Richard M. Romley, a former prosecutor from Maricopa County, Ariz., as his new special adviser for information security. Romley, a Marine Corps veteran, will evaluate the department's computer security procedures and recommend improvements.

The move follows the resignation last week of Michael H. McLendon, a VA deputy assistant secretary who learned of the May 3 burglary within hours of the crime but did not immediately tell top-ranked officials.

Nicholson announced Tuesday that the employee will be fired and that Dennis M. Duffy, who has been acting assistant secretary for policy and planning, had been placed on administrative leave. The employee worked in McLendon's office, and Duffy was in charge of the division in which both worked.

Nicholson learned of the information breach on May 16 and told the public on May 22, nearly three weeks after the crime.

Treasury Pick Draws Praise, Policy Doesn't (AP-Y2)

President Bush's selection of a savvy Wall Street veteran to be his third treasury secretary is winning widespread praise, but Democrats say it will take a change in policies — not just personnel — to deal with budget and trade deficits and other economic problems.

With his approval rating at record lows despite strong economic growth and low unemployment, Bush announced Tuesday that he was turning to Henry Paulson, chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs, to become the administration's chief economic spokesman.

By choosing a 32-year veteran of one of Wall Street's premier investment houses, Bush is hoping for the same economic credibility that Bill Clinton gained when he picked Robert Rubin, one of Paulson's predecessors at Goldman Sachs, as his treasury secretary.

Paulson, whose Senate confirmation seems assured, would succeed John Snow, the former head of CSX Corp. Snow had followed Alcoa chief executive Paul O'Neill, who was forced to resign in late 2002.

While both Snow and O'Neill came from corporate America, the administration decided it needed someone with high standing on Wall Street to be a more effective salesman for its economic program.

"Mr. Paulson's experience in running Goldman Sachs, a global financial firm involved in all kinds of sophisticated corporate and financial activities, makes him a near-perfect appointment," Allen Sinai of Decision Economics said in a typical Wall Street reaction.

Snow had been rumored to be on his way out for more than a year, but the selection of Paulson, 60, came as a surprise because of recent administration signals that it had failed to lure a big Wall Street name as a replacement.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush met with Paulson on May 20 and Paulson accepted the job the next day. He said White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten, who used to work at Goldman Sachs, was the matchmaker, and the president sealed the deal after Paulson expressed reservations.

"I know that there had been some conversations, and that he expressed reluctance — I'm not sure it was a flat `No,'" Snow said Wednesday. "I do know that the final answer was yes and I do know that Josh Bolten continued to speak with him."

Snow did not elaborate on how the president convinced Paulson to do the job. "It is safe to say that he (Paulson) had some reluctance about doing it, and was insistent on a series of conditions, and apparently his concerns were addressed," Snow said.

While Paulson was chosen to bolster confidence on Wall Street about the administration's policies, investors on Tuesday ignored the initial news to focus instead on worries about higher oil prices and sliding consumer confidence, pushing the Dow Jones industrial average down by 184 points.

Analysts said the sell-off, one of a number of recent steep slides, highlighted the challenges Paulson faces at a time when inflation is threatening to accelerate and economic growth is slowing.

Given this administration's past practice of using its treasury secretary chiefly as a salesman for policies set inside the White House, some analysts questioned how much impact Paulson will have.

"Will the new treasury secretary have any more influence than his two predecessors did, and will this administration be able to get anything through Congress with just 2 1/2 years to go?" said David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's in New York.

Bush's top second term domestic priority, Social Security overhaul, is currently dead, his drive to overhaul the tax code is in the deep freeze, and Democrats are massing to defeat the president's effort to make permanent his first-term tax cuts, charging they are unaffordable in light of huge budget deficits.

"The Bush administration must use its remaining years in office to right the fiscal wrongs of its first term," said Rep. Charles Rangel (news, bio, voting record), top Democrat on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee.

"It is essential that Mr. Paulson provide a realistic viewpoint of the serious issues facing the American economy," said Sen. Jack Reed (news, bio, voting record), D-R.I.

Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y., said Paulson's long experience in dealing with China should help in the administration's campaign to get the Chinese government to allow its currency rise in value against the dollar as a way of dealing with a record $202 billion U.S. trade deficit with China.

In his writings and speeches, Paulson has been a strong supporter of the administration's tax cuts and its free-trade agenda. He also gave a pivotal speech in 2002 in support of a crackdown on corporate crime in the wake of the Enron Corp. and other business scandals.

A strong environmentalist and devoted bird watcher and fisherman, Paulson has supported the need to attack global warming, a stand that could put him at odds with Bush's environmental views, although treasury does not have responsibility for those issues.

Paulson, a Christian Scientist who does not drink or smoke, has used a fortune estimated at well over $500 million to make generous contributions to Republican candidates, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a campaign watchdog group.

During a brief White House announcement ceremony on Tuesday, Paulson called the American economy "truly a marvel, but we cannot take it for granted. We must take steps to maintain our competitive edge in the world."

2 New Captains Of The Economy Face Volatile Global Markets (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

WASHINGTON, May 31 — One reached the pinnacle of wealth and prestige as a dealmaker on Wall Street. The other was an academic superstar, brilliant but somewhat shy and more at ease in Bermuda shorts than suits.

But now they find themselves side by side in confronting a stiff new test: helping to guide the economy from a period of fast growth and cheap money through one of higher interest rates, jittery markets and a falling dollar.

Henry M. Paulson Jr., the chief executive of Goldman Sachs and President Bush's choice to become his new Treasury secretary, is expected to arrive at his post at a time when global financial markets are suddenly more volatile and investors are more risk-averse than they have been in years.

Ben S. Bernanke, the former Princeton economics professor who became chairman of the Federal Reserve on Feb. 1, has already endured a baptism of fire as the Fed has struggled over when to stop raising interest rates.

Just a few weeks ago, bond prices dropped and critics complained that Mr. Bernanke lacked "manhood" or at least "Street cred" as an inflation fighter. In more recent days, investors have been rattled by the opposite fear: Mr. Bernanke might be too tough and push interest rates higher than they had thought, potentially slowing or reversing the liquidity-driven investment boom of recent years.

Mr. Paulson provoked speculation about the dollar even before he left Mr. Bush's side at the announcement of his nomination on Tuesday morning.

Mr. Paulson called for "steps to maintain our competitive edge in the world," a bland remark that some investors nonetheless interpreted as code for using a weaker dollar to make American exports cheaper in other countries.

"These two captains are forced to navigate in some very choppy waters," said Richard Yamarone, chief economist at Argus Research. "The message that the Fed is sending is that they don't have a clear grasp on the goings-on of the economy, and the same could be said of the Bush administration."

At first glance, the pairing of Mr. Bernanke and Mr. Paulson looks like an attempt to recreate the celebrated collaboration between Alan Greenspan and Robert E. Rubin in the 1990's, when the economy and the stock market soared and the federal budget swung from deficits to surpluses.

Mr. Greenspan, who ran the Fed, was not an academic but shared Mr. Bernanke's penchant for poring over economic data and challenging conventional wisdom.

Mr. Rubin, Treasury secretary under President Bill Clinton, had, like Mr. Paulson, been a chairman of Goldman Sachs. He teamed up with Mr. Greenspan to champion tough restraints on government spending, employed his credibility on Wall Street to assure financial markets that Mr. Clinton was serious about dealing with the budget deficit and played an influential role in shaping foreign policy.

Mr. Paulson, whose nomination has been praised by Democrats as well as Republicans, is almost certain to win easy Senate approval and become a central player on Mr. Bush's team.

But analysts say both he and Mr. Bernanke need to establish their credibility in financial markets at a time when the economy is in a major transition.

For the first time in nearly two decades, inflation is on an upward rather than downward trend. Energy prices remain near historic highs, even though oil prices dropped on Wednesday as immediate fears of a confrontation with Iran eased. Long-term interest rates — the fuel that powers the housing market when they are low — are on the rise.

Meanwhile, the economy faces structural budget deficits that will not disappear without major changes in taxes and spending, and the Fed could find itself in a clash with the Bush administration if budget deficits remain high.

Perhaps most important, however, investors around the world have become more anxious about the United States' huge trade deficits and its ballooning foreign debt. That is pushing down the value of the dollar, a trend that would help reduce trade imbalances but has also elevated worries about a more painful crash for the American currency.

Much of the uncertainty stems from a shift at the Federal Reserve and other central banks. After propping up economic growth by keeping interest rates far below normal levels, the central banks are removing the cushion of cheap money.

"The marketplace over all is being forced to reabsorb risk that formerly had been underwritten by the big three central banks — the Fed, the Bank of Japan and the People's Bank of China," said Paul McCulley, managing director of Pimco Advisers, the giant bond management firm. "When you've got all three taking away the punch bowl, the partyers at the party are not going to be happy."

Mr. Bernanke arrived at the Fed when monetary policy was already at a tipping point. Having raised short-term interest rates under Mr. Greenspan's guidance for nearly two years by the time Mr. Bernanke took over, Fed officials knew they were nearing the point where they could stop. But because there is such a long lag time between changes in monetary policy and their impact, inflationary pressures were on the rise and economic growth was still torrid.

In late April, Mr. Bernanke confounded markets even as he struggled to explain that the Fed needed to keep its options open by basing decisions on incoming economic data rather than maintaining monetary policy on automatic pilot.

Testifying before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress on April 27, Mr. Bernanke set off a rally by announcing that the Fed might pause in its rate increases to assess the impact of its previous increases.

What startled bond investors was Mr. Bernanke's added twist: that the Fed might pause even if "the risks to its objectives are not entirely balanced" meaning that it might take its foot off the monetary brakes, at least temporarily, even if there were signs of slightly higher inflation risks.

Bond investors, suspecting that Mr. Bernanke might be soft on inflation at a time when energy prices were shooting up, began demanding higher yields on long-term Treasury bonds.

Pundits began accusing Mr. Bernanke of vacillating.

"In jest, I've been saying that Mr. Bernanke needs to regain his monetary manhood," Larry Kudlow, an economist and talk show host, recently told viewers on CNBC. "He was people-pleasing Wall Street. Now he has got to go back on message."

Barry Ritholtz, an economic consultant and operator of an economic blog, the Big Picture, went further and called Mr. Bernanke the "Neville Chamberlain of inflation fighters."

"I got the sense that Mr. Bernanke was appeasing the stock market," Mr. Ritholtz said in an interview. "It's not that he has to go out and prove his manhood and his street-fighting cred. It's just that he has to navigate at a particularly perilous moment in the economy, and he has to navigate absolutely flawlessly."

Two days after raising the prospect of a pause, Mr. Bernanke compounded the confusion by venting his frustration about being "misunderstood" during an off-camera conversation with Maria Bartiromo, a correspondent for CNBC.

Word of the comments set off another round of feverish trading on April 29. Last week, Mr. Bernanke told lawmakers at the Senate Banking committee that his remarks to Ms. Bartiromo had been a "lapse in judgment" and that in the future, he would communicate only through formal channels.

Despite the bumpy path, Mr. Bernanke's first few months have been far smoother than Mr. Greenspan's arrival in August 1987. Bond investors, convinced that Mr. Greenspan could not match the inflation-fighting prowess of his predecessor, Paul A. Volcker, quickly pushed up interest rates on long-term Treasury Bonds.

Yields on 10-year Treasury bonds shot up from 8.8 percent to more than 10 percent during Mr. Greenspan's first two months as Fed chairman. The stock market, plagued by a host of uncertainties, fell 22.6 percent on October 19, 1987.

By contrast, rates on 10-year Treasury bonds have climbed modestly since Mr. Bernanke took office, from about 4.5 percent to about 5 percent today. One crucial indicator of inflation expectations, the difference in price between regular Treasury bonds and special inflation-protected Treasury securities, are not much higher today than when Mr. Bernanke took over in February.

Edward McKelvey, an economist at Goldman Sachs, said Mr. Bernanke's message had in fact been clear even if that left investors unsure about the Fed's next move.

"He is sending a fairly consistent message that says we're going to evaluate the data insofar as they affect the outlook," Mr. McKelvey said. "This is child's play compared to what Greenspan had in the first two or three months of his term."

Mr. Paulson may face his own trial by fire. As Treasury secretary, Mr. Paulson would have authority over the government's policy on exchange rates and the value of the dollar.

Mr. Paulson is likely to continue the policy of his predecessor, John W. Snow, in supporting a "strong dollar" but insisting that its value be determined by market forces. In practice, the administration has been content to let the dollar drift down in value for the last two years, a trend that makes American exports cheaper and imports more expensive.

Mr. Snow did not have to grapple with any major currency disruptions, but Mr. Paulson may not be so lucky.

"There are fewer certainties," said Lou Crandall, chief economist at Wrightson ICAP. "He is walking into an environment where the dollar is widely perceived to be at risk."

Paulson Has The Tools But Needs Bush's Support (FT)

By Stephen Cecchetti

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

The announcement of Hank Paulson's nomination as US Treasury secretary is good news for everyone. In many ways he is the perfect complement to Ben Bernanke, the new Federal Reserve chairman. A giant among monetary policy thinkers is being joined by one of the most important financiers in the world. We now have the essential combination of a theorist working with a practitioner.

The big question is what will President George W. Bush do with his new top-quality team? Will the White House finally promote high-quality economic policy above pure politics? Or will Mr Paulson be frustrated in the way that past Bush economic advisers have been?

We will at least see the benefit of having a highly placed government official who knows how to communicate with Wall Street. Having spent nearly his entire professional life in the financial markets, Mr Paulson is fluent in the language of traders and investment bankers. He knows the concerns of the markets and how to respond to them using an efficiency of language that comes only from experience.

As we have seen recently, it can be very difficult to communicate economic policy. Small missteps can create large movements in stock and bond prices – movements that are potentially damaging. Since the retirement of Alan Greenspan as Fed chairman, no one on the Bush economic team has had the ability to soothe the markets in the face of minor problems of language. It is amazing how important it is to get the adverbs and adjectives exactly right when speaking to financial markets. Now we have someone who knows how to do it, leaving the Fed to concentrate on making interest rate policy. The benefits are likely to be enormous.

But we can expect much more than just words from a person of Mr Paulson's experience and accomplishments. We now have someone who has the tools to face the country's big economic problems head on. Those challenges are huge. A successful Paulson Treasury must put the relationship of capital markets and economic growth on a more solid footing. This means facing three separate, but related issues: the relationship of the federal government to the economy, the interactions between the US economy and the rest of the world's economies, and the problems associated with financing retirees.

The job of fiscal policy is to provide the underlying foundation for a growing economy. That is a very complex job involving not only security, but ensuring that capital flows to its most productive uses. The ideal Treasury secretary is a successful advocate for fiscal policies that maximise economic efficiency. This is a matter of implementing the right combination of tax and expenditure policies. In recent years, tax law has become riddled with special provisions that both distort incentives and leave most people feeling it is unfair. The solution is fairly simple: we need to simplify the tax system and, of course, find a way to reduce the fiscal deficit at the same time. This requires a good relationship with the US Congress – something few recent Treasury heads have had.

In an increasingly globalised economy, the Treasury secretary has taken on an ever bigger role as the facilitator of international capital flows. This is more than just running US exchange rate policy, which the secretary does in conjunction with the Federal Reserve. It includes working to ensure that global imbalances are kept under control, reducing the threat of large, sudden movements in exchange rates, or abrupt reversals of the flow of capital. Again, a steady hand (and voice) at the Treasury can help to reassure foreign governments and investors, thereby reducing harmful volatility.

We can be optimistic that there will be an improvement in the relationship between the US and China. Economic policy towards China is about much more than just exchange rates. It is about how to integrate emerging Asia into the modern economic system. Here, Mr Paulson seems likely to excel, assuming that he is given the appropriate independence to make policy.

Finally, Americans are consuming all that they earn, saving nothing. Foreigners are providing all of the 7 per cent of gross domestic product that makes up investment net of depreciation. As a result, it is hard to see how Americans will be able to finance their retirement years. Something has to be done about this. We need someone with the stature to lead a national debate on this subject, culminating in a course of action that is agreed by all parties.

Solving these problems means negotiating the co-operation of groups with disparate interests. Mr Paulson will have to negotiate tax reform and deficit reduction; find a way to convince people that trade creates low-priced goods that benefit everyone and that international capital flows allow us to grow faster. He must persuade younger workers to save while convincing the relatively well-off elderly to give up some of their government-supplied pension benefits.

Among the hardest to convince of any of this will be Congress. Paul O'Neill and John Snow, the previous two Bush Treasury secretaries, surely understood the economics of everything that I am saying. But they lacked the full support of the White House to push for good economic policy in the face of political unpopularity, and the ability to articulate the message using the language that markets understand. Mr Paulson will definitely provide the second of these. Let us hope that President Bush gives us the first.

Paulson Of The Treasury (WSJ)

By Lawrence Kudlow

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

In spearing a big-fish successor for departing Treasury Secretary John Snow, our first MBA president finally turned to Wall Street for another MBA: Goldman Sachs CEO Henry Paulson. According to all news accounts, Mr. Paulson was a tough man to recruit -- but it's a bullish sign for the fate of the president's supply-side agenda as well as the U.S. dollar.

In the Rose Garden this week, President Bush said Mr. Paulson "has an intimate knowledge of financial markets and an ability to explain economic issues in clear terms." Wall Street would agree. But more importantly, the president said that "As Treasury secretary, Hank will be my principal adviser on the broad range of domestic and international economic issues that affect the well-being of all Americans."

There's a change going on here, probably a big one. Under the new Josh Bolten-run White House, Mr. Paulson is essentially being appointed deputy president for economic policy -- a mandate not given to his two predecessors. This is a bigger shakeup than meets the eye.

Up to this point of the Bush presidency, economic policy has emanated from the West Wing. The spokesmen at Treasury and OMB have been designated as communicators to sell that policy. My hunch is that the Henry Paulson appointment marks a power shift in policy making.

As Mr. Bush noted, Treasury has the play on taxes, financial markets, federal spending, trade and currency policy. So if Mr. Paulson -- the astute and highly successful financial man from New York -- has any new ideas, he will have an opportunity to forcefully present them, even if they represent a new policy direction. Mr. Paulson's formidable background will serve him well in D.C. He won't hear the phrase "You don't know what you're talking about" in the Oval Office, the Senate or the House. He has been an engaged, hands-on, sharp-elbowed Wall Street operator; a man who brought Goldman Sachs and its share price to the loftiest levels in the storied firm's history.

Surprisingly for a CEO, Mr. Paulson has a considerable paper trail of economic and political opinions. He is a confirmed free-trader who has cultivated an expanding economic and business relationship between the U.S. and China. He is also a tax-cutter, one who strongly supported Mr. Bush's broad-based tax cuts of 2001 and the economic-growth-igniting tax incentives of 2003. In the Rose Garden, Mr. Paulson echoed the supply-side message of these tax cuts, just as he has in op-ed pieces on this page and elsewhere: "Put capital behind people and ideas."

Yes, he is a capitalist. And yes, there is a "green" environmental component to the man. He was chairman of the Nature Conservancy, and some critics believe he shouldn't have used Goldman money for certain transactions regarding that venture. But this seems a trifle. Former Goldman insiders say he is no Al Gore.

Perhaps more important, Mr. Paulson has been a staunch supporter of Mr. Bush in the upper reaches of the Goldman executive suite, not easy ground to hold according to several sources. But Mr. Paulson is a religious man of strong character who does not change his principles on the basis of polling data. Ah-ha . . . yet another connection between him and Mr. Bush.

On the policy front, Mr. Paulson could resurrect the tax-reform agenda that fell through the White House cracks last year. If broad-based reform doesn't work politically, he could take the advice of Loews CEO James Tisch and push to equalize the 35% tax rate on corporate capital gains with the 15% charge on individuals.

Mr. Paulson might also zero in on reducing the 35% corporate income tax, move toward full cash expensing for the depreciation of plant and equipment, or work in general to strike down the double tax at home and abroad on the increasingly globalized U.S. business sector. The U.S. has fallen behind other major industrial countries in terms of the level of corporate taxation. All of this would make our firms more competitive in world-wide trade and also help offset some of the unnecessary regulatory costs imposed by Sarbanes-Oxley.

At the beginning of his tenure, however, Mr. Paulson will hopefully look at the falling state of the dollar, a trajectory that has caused great angst in the stock markets and threatens higher inflation and interest rates. Statutorily, Treasury has the play on the dollar through its control of the $43 billion Exchange Stabilization Fund, which can be used to buy and sell currencies in order to send important signals to world-wide forex markets. These interventions have no permanent dollar impact. That's left to the Fed's $760 billion in government securities. The Fed uses these holdings to buy and sell in the open market and thus add or drain cash from the financial system. This is the ultimate driver on dollar value and inflation.

But Mr. Paulson can lend a helping hand to Fed chairman Ben Bernanke. Mr. Paulson could signal that the U.S. wants a harder greenback as part of its inflation-fighting arsenal, while over at the Fed the FOMC could take additional steps to drain reserves and raise its target fed funds rate.

It is worth remembering that predecessor Treasury secretaries hailing from Wall Street have opted for a hard dollar in order to promote the price stability that is so necessary for sustained economic expansion. Robert Rubin (also a Goldman alum) during the Clinton 1990s and Donald Regan (the former Merrill Lynch CEO) during the Reagan 1980s chose dollar strength over weakness in order to support durable economic growth. Mr. Regan has passed away, but Mr. Rubin is alive and well at Citibank. It wouldn't surprise me if Mr. Paulson got on the phone a few times with his old confrere to talk about a hardening of the wartime dollar -- a development that would instill economic and financial confidence and thus serve the nation's bipartisan best interest.

The Bush administration may claim otherwise, but it has exercised a policy of benign dollar neglect which now could be reaching a dangerous tipping point. The solution is a Treasury-Fed hard-dollar operation. As the new deputy president for all things financial, Mr. Paulson has a golden opportunity to do Wall Street and Main Street an enormous favor.

The Greening Of The Treasury? (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

The official flag of the U.S. Treasury has an eagle on a mint-leaf green background. It's an appropriate emblem for Henry Paulson, who is expected to be the greenest Treasury secretary ever.

Mr. Paulson is an environmentalist, not only in his private and charitable life, but as chief executive. Goldman Sachs Group has an eight-page "environmental policy framework" that declares "a healthy environment is necessary for the well being of society, our people and our business, and is the foundation for a sustainable and strong economy," and the firm walks the talk. So will that make a difference at Treasury?

Among those with big titles and ornate Washington offices, there's sometimes a temptation to equate avoiding mistakes with accomplishments. It's easy for a Treasury secretary -- whose utterances can move the dollar or embarrass the president of the United States -- to end a day of briefings, congressional testimony and tête-à-têtes with other impressively titled officials with a sigh that says, "Another good day. I didn't screw up."

Any competent Treasury secretary should be able to devise and communicate the U.S. government's stance on the dollar, swat away politically attractive but economically foolish ideas and prepare for a financial crisis, whatever it may be. That's playing defense. Another test is how well a Treasury secretary plays offense. Why leave a powerful perch on Wall Street for Alexander Hamilton's post if all you do is avoid mistakes and sign dollar bills?

Mr. Paulson is said by colleagues to be less prone to reflection and more prone to action than Robert Rubin, who also went from the top job at Goldman Sachs to Treasury. Mr. Paulson did play on the offensive line on the Dartmouth football team. He seems to think he has wrested from the White House -- and Vice President Dick Cheney -- some of the power to coordinate administration economic policy that was seized from Treasury when President Bush took office.

We probably won't know about Mr. Paulson's offense until after the November congressional elections. But given his record in using Goldman's power and money toward environmental ends, he just might use his clout to push the administration toward dealing with climate change or even -- don't mention it before the elections -- considering an energy tax.

Christie Whitman, administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency early in the Bush years, says just having a sympathetic voice at Treasury can be a big deal. "One of the biggest raps against some environmental proposals is that they're not economically sound," she says. "One of the things that his kind of advocacy can do is put a lie to that."

Fred Krupp, a Paulson fan who heads advocacy group Environmental Defense, says the best-case scenario is that Mr. Paulson "gets the administration to be for a climate and energy policy that uses the power of markets to reduce our emissions of greenhouse gases and improve national security at the same time." Mr. Krupp has in mind expanding the existing "cap and trade" system that limits emissions of sulfur dioxide and allows companies to buy and sell the right to pollute under that limit.

If the Bush administration decides it needs to raise revenue to cut a compromise with Congress that also slows spending growth, Mr. Paulson's role could be key. Paul Portney, former head of think tank Resources for the Future and now dean of the University of Arizona's management school, speculates that Mr. Paulson might be more inclined than former railroad executive John Snow to suggest that Mr. Bush consider taxing the carbon content of fuels or raising the tax on gasoline or auctioning permits for a cap-and-trade system if the alternative were boosting capital-gains or income-tax rates.

Of course, Mr. Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill, also had a greenish tinge. But he accomplished little. "O'Neill taught environmentalists that the Treasury is not the place to push those kind of policies," says Fred Smith, of the Competitive Enterprise Institute, an anti-regulation think tank.

But Mr. Paulson presumably knows of Mr. O'Neill's frustrations, and believes he has negotiated a deal that gives him more say. And times have changed. Mr. Bush recently expressed regret that his position on global warming was defined "early in my presidency when I told the world that I thought Kyoto [the global warming treaty] was a lousy deal for America." He told a questioner in March, "I guess I should have started differently when I first became president and said we will invest in new technologies that will enable us to use fossil fuels in a much wiser way."

Perhaps some day, the conversation between Mr. Paulson and his new client will turn to global warming. "If you had somebody in the Treasury who says there's a way we can put together a solution in a way that makes sense and isn't going to hamstring our economy, people are going to listen," says Ms. Whitman. Maybe even Mr. Bush.

CAPITAL EXCHANGE: Bernanke's Challenges

Here are some of the reader responses to last week's Capital column6 on challenges facing the new Fed chairman.Some of these comments have been edited. Thanks to all who wrote. You can contact me at capital@wsj.com7. * * *

Victor Kincannon writes: I think Mr. Bernanke is far more like Mr. Burns that Mr. Volcker. The Chairman seems far more inclined to look for excuses for not doing than Mr. Volcker. Mr. Volcker was the exception; the rest of them are just the norm. What's your assessment?

David Wessel responds: I think that judgment is extremely premature. Mr. Bernanke has been chairman since the end of January. He has presided over a single meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee at which rates were raised by one-quarter percentage point.

Russell Van Zandt writes: I think one key point in your column was incorrect, which could change the conclusion. The oil shortage ended before and independently of Mr. Volker's bringing interest rates under control. After nearly a decade of shortages, manufacturers moved us into an oil surplus. Oil stocks crashed in 1980 because of it.

So I don't think we can assume that all Mr. Bernanke has to do is raise rates to solve the problem. (First of all, I doubt if someone so dovish would ever have the will to do what it takes.) The Fed would need to bring the country to recession or near it to temporarily stop the commodity bubble. It would very likely come back once the economy revived because the supply problem is still there.

I think we will see that Mr. Burns is exactly right that the oil and commodity futures market are running the economy, not the Fed. Oil is still over $70 a barrel after this selloff and scare -- and will soon move to $80, $90 and $100 a barrel, stopping only when it slows the economy enough that oil profits would be reduced at the higher price. Inflation will feed through and continue increasing, and the Fed will be able to do nothing about it.

Paul DeRosa writes: You might have been a hair too hard on Mr. Burns. There's little doubt he was a flop as a central banker, but the 1974 fiasco wasn't entirely his fault. He was the victim of a massive data revision. I was a staff economist at FRBNY at the time, and I recall the data on the real economy looking surprisingly strong well into spring of 1974. All measures of the money supply, which mattered a lot more then, were headed to the moon. The data as currently measured say the economy already was in recession. Mr. Burns was trying to engineer a softer real side in hopes of restraining the price effects of the higher crude. Given the information he had, he kept tightening. My own guess is had it not been for FDIC insurance, he'd have produced a replay of 1933. As it is, he didn't miss by much. No wonder he was sour on central banking.

David Wessel responds: I wasn't judging Mr. Burns as much as quoting him judging himself.

Dwight D. Overholt writes: It is an unfortunate time for a change of Fed chairman. Mr. Bernanke will need excellent brinkmanship skills to steer through this storm.

The lure of low interest rates and accelerating housing prices fueled extremely strong consumerism in the U.S. This fed improved financial conditions throughout the world (such as India and China).

How many of those same U.S. consumers are now feeling the pain of mortgage interest rates that have risen (via ARM, options mortgages, etc.) to a point where their buying power has been compromised? Further, how many are nearing default? Several good articles in The Wall Street Journal indicate that this portion of the storm is still on the horizon.

The S&L "crisis" of the 1980s shows how normally well intentioned people can choose to ignore the signs of a problem until it becomes unmanageable. Are we entering a similar period? Are banks truly setting aside enough reserves to cover the bad loans? How accurate are their projections? Other articles advise that banks have eased lending terms in the past year to maintain a level of business. Uncertainty in these areas breeds uneasiness of a type that is not healthful for financial markets.

Perhaps not a perfect storm, but high seas are likely until the low interest rate/refinance "exuberance" aftermath works through the market.

Andy Marchus writes: On the subject of the government providing money for research in areas such as alternative energy sources, I'd like your comments on how much the government should get involved as opposed to letting private money flow to where the opportunities are. I'm an extremist on the subject of free markets and have wondered if there are any past examples where government money facilitated a new development where private money alone might not have been sufficient. Let me throw out one possibility: the Internet.

David Wessel responds: Although there are those few who would get the government entirely out of financing research, a very wide swatch of the political spectrum sees a need for government investment in research, development and education. The differences have to do with how much money, where it should go and how much the government should direct its use. The case for a significant government role is very strong -- and the Internet is one very good example. Basic research in medicine and in physics also have paid off handsomely for the society, and there is a strong case that business would have underinvested in such basic research.

Don Schwinn writes: I'm a retired engineer and a novice at understanding interest rate economics. Why not use eighth-point rate increments as the growth rate begins to slow? What is the rationale behind the quarter-point increment?

David Wessel responds: I'm aware of no technical reason that the Fed couldn't, if it chose, move the federal funds rate in eighth-point increments. Indeed, the practice of a publicly announced target for the federal funds rate (at which banks lend to each other overnight) began well into the Greenspan years. At some times in the past, the Fed's approach to monetary policy had the effect of moving the federal funds rate in much less pronounced increments. I'm not sure, though, that the difference to the economy of moving up an eighth or quarter percentage point is all that great; a lot seems to depend on what the markets expect the Fed to do with short-term rates in the future.

Bob Wade writes: Why don't you just predict from your publicly accessible and widely read forum the total collapse of the world economy, thereby helping to start the panic and the accomplishment of the worst possible doom and gloom self-fulfilling prophecy. Of course, your investments will suffer, your paycheck will become worthless, your property values will plunge, and your family will suffer, along with everyone else. Maybe you'll even be laid off as the economy plunges. Keep writing those great columns. Maybe they'll prove to be true, and just think, you will have helped make it happen.

David Wessel responds: I always thought the public -- and the readers of The Wall Street Journal -- counted on us to call it as we see it, and not to shelter them from the truth, however painful.

Reid Acknowledges Misstating Ethics Rules On Free Tickets (LAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid's spokesman acknowledged Wednesday night that Reid misstated the ethics rules governing his acceptance of free boxing tickets and has decided to refrain from taking such gifts.

The Nevada senator still believes it was "entirely permissible" for him to accept ringside seats for three professional boxing matches in 2004 and 2005 from the Nevada Athletic Commission but has decided to avoid doing so in the future, spokesman Jim Manley said.

"In light of questions that have been raised about the practice, Sen. Reid will not accept these kinds of credentials in the future in order to avoid even the faintest appearance of impropriety," Manley said.

The announcement came after the Associated Press presented Reid's office Wednesday with conclusions from ethics experts that the Senate leader misstated congressional ethics rules in trying to defend his actions.

The AP reported Monday that Reid accepted the free seats from the Nevada commission as it was trying to influence his support for legislation to create a federal boxing commission. The state agency feared the legislation would usurp its authority to regulate fights and wanted to convince Reid that there was no need for a federal body.

Reid voted to set up a federal commission, but Congress never enacted the legislation.

Fear Of Failing (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, May 31, 2006

May 31, 2006 - A good therapist, we know, can sometimes help a person who's lost his confidence or mental balance. But what do you do when an entire party needs therapy?

You'd think the Republicans would be the ones in need of professional help. This is a party burdened with a president so unpopular he barely has a base to stand on—Bush seems to be bypassing the lame-duck stage and heading straight for dead duck: a Vietnam-scale quagmire in Iraq and a post-Katrina rot of incompetence and corruption that is infecting the very foundations of the presidency and the GOP's control of Congress. Not surprisingly, the Republicans are at each others' throats over this loss of prestige and popularity. Neoconservatives and traditionalists are fighting bitterly over foreign policy. Moderates and conservatives are battling over immigration and deficits. And when the maverick John McCain declares his candidacy for 2008 sometime in the next year, the Republicans will be shrieking at each other in public over abortion and other social issues.

But at least the GOP is engaged in a war over real policy choices. It is an emotional debate, often a hysterical and ill-informed one, but it is a fight among adults who know what they believe in and who have the guts to battle for it. By contrast the Democrats, ostensibly the party poised to exploit this GOP civil war, don't seem to remember what it is like to behave as adults. They resemble nothing so much as ill-adjusted adolescents, afraid of their own shadows, much less the presidency. What are they afraid of? Themselves, essentially: their past, their own left, the populist rhetoric of their leaders (Nancy Pelosi, Harry Reid, Howard Dean, Al Gore), the left-wing loony stigma represented by "Fahrenheit 9/11" filmmaker Michael Moore (every Dem's favorite bugaboo). Above all they fear seeming and looking soft. They are all afflicted with varying degrees of megalophobia, a fear of assuming power. Even Dr. Melfi of "The Sopranos" wouldn't take this case.

This psychological disability has been long in the making, of course. When it comes to national security, it has been eating at the heart of the Democratic Party since its biggest debacle, Vietnam, which destroyed the Dems' prideful self-image formed during World War II and the cold-war containment consensus. But never has this Democratic dysfunction been so apparent as now, the moment when the Dems should be striding confidently into the limelight to seize control of the national agenda. And none are more pathetically afflicted than those who purport to be the "new" Democrats, the "strong" ones, the ones who want to "resurrect" the gloried intestinal fortitude and moral fiber of FDR, Harry Truman and JFK.

The "strong" ones are actually the most timid. They are the ones who so fear that a leftie like Nancy Pelosi will become speaker of the House, they actually question whether it would be a good idea for the Dems to take control in 2006. They are the ones who think they can outhawk Bush on Iraq and promotion of democracy around the world, but they are mainly driven by a fear of criticizing the premises of his foreign policy, which is to say, his war on terror. While nitpicking and nattering over Bush's "errors of execution," they still embrace his fundamentals. In other words, they all continue to sound like unreconstructed John Kerrys, frightened of seeming soft. When they get together, this fear is virtually all they talk about. It is a fear that reeks from the party's new draft platform for 2006, causing Leslie Gelb, the former president of the Council on Foreign Relations, to crack to liberal hawk Peter Beinert recently: "If you have to say you're tough, you're not."

The champion of this "new" breed of Dem tough guys, of course, is Hillary Clinton, who every week, it seems, finds some new way of pandering to the right in her long, stealth march to the 2008 nomination. All in an apparent effort to escape her own shadow, her supposed liberal excesses from the early '90s.

One reason for the persistence of these Democratic phobias has been the party's abysmal inability, a year and a half after the fact, to reckon with the real reason for Kerry's loss in the 2004 campaign: once again, fear. Kerry's campaign was driven by a fear of his shadow (his antiwar activism after Vietnam), of seeming too strident by attacking, even when he himself was being attacked (first by Karl Rove's "senator flip-flop" campaign, then by the Swift Boat veterans). How else can one explain the inexplicable—the spectacle of a Silver Star winner made to look wimpy by two men who avoided combat? Simple: He was terrified of speaking out. His campaign even toned down the convention speech of that most mild-mannered of presidents, Jimmy Carter.

I hold no brief in this fight, being neither Democrat nor Republican. But here is a message to those few Democrats who retain their self-confidence and sanity (I'm not sure who you are, but there must be some): Come back from the shadows. If you can look past your fears, America's entire national-security apparatus is out there making your case for you.

Talk to any responsible official or officer in the military, intelligence or diplomatic community. Most will tell you that Bush got most of the war on terror wrong (at least after the Taliban fell), that he invented a war of choice in Iraq and failed to finish the war of necessity against Al Qaeda. The toughest hombres in the country—not least some recently retired generals—are saying the "war president" has no clothes, that he has been, in effect, a disastrous war president. This is what I hear every week now as a reporter, from officials who identify themselves as Republican, Democrat or independent. It is what the facts, sadly, bear out: look at where the precipitous war in Iraq has brought us, and the new violence that is arising out of the unfinished business against the Taliban and Al Qaeda in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Yet the vast majority of Democratic leaders cannot bring themselves to say this—Hillary most prominently of all.

Sift through the wreckage of the neoconservative program that Bush adopted. Its central tenets—pre-emptive attacks on rogue regimes, unilateralist disdain for international legitimacy and institutions, the cavalier attitude that war and military solutions should be the primary, or default, approach to foreign problems—are all gone with the wind. What's left? Effectively the foreign policy of pragmatic global leadership invented by such Democrats as FDR, Truman, JFK and Scoop Jackson, and largely endorsed by Republicans such as Dwight Eisenhower, Richard Nixon and, yes, even Ronald Reagan.

To oversimplify, its tenets are: Stand up for democracy and freedom, yes, but keep the international system on your side. Make use of the United Nations whenever you can, though not necessarily bending it to your needs when possible. Create as many allies as you can. Listen. Accommodate. Be magnanimous. Above all, make sure you have more guys on your side than your adversaries have on theirs. It is the policy that Bush, chastened and weakened by Iraq, has followed on Libya and North Korea, and it is the policy he now appears to be pursuing on Iran, having agreed to talk to Tehran. And it is largely Democratic in origins and practice.

But to get to the point where they can hark back to this simple program, and confidently embrace it without protesting too much about how tough they are, Democrats must first have the courage to strip bare the GOP's failures. They must believe they're every bit as good on national security as their rivals. This courage is frankly not in evidence. Five and half years on we see the Republicans, as brazen and full of self-confidence as ever about their national-security credentials, and the Democrats, as timid and full of self-doubt as they ever have been over the same issue. Hence, the need for a good therapist, one with a very large office.

No one looks like a wimp when he or she tells the truth. And the public is crying, pleading for someone to tell the truth. The Democratic hawks seem to think that if they confront Bush over the fundamentals of his foreign policy, they will be forced to admit it was wrong to go into Iraq at the moment and in the way we did. And if they have to admit that, then they must back immediate withdrawal from Iraq. Nonsense. Most Americans now know, without being told, that American prestige is on the line in Iraq. And that any withdrawal will be slow and painful. This is now settled U.S. policy, and it will be followed by whoever the next president is, Democrat or Republican.

The country is desperate for adult leadership, for competence and authority—above all, for an honest reckoning with all that's gone wrong. And the country isn't getting it. Maybe that helps to explain the Al Gore revival under way. Here, at least, was someone who can remember what adulthood was like—what it was like to hold power. Most of his Democratic colleagues appear to have forgotten.

The Seer And The Scandals (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

In its September 2004 issue, Washington Monthly magazine invited 16 smart political observers -- a mix of Republicans, Democrats and independents -- to write short essays predicting what would happen if George Bush won a second term.

The answers, understandably enough, were all over the lot. But no one suggested that one-third of the way through his second term Bush would have suffered the political and policy reverses that he has actually experienced.

Last week was unfortunately typical for an administration that cannot seem to catch a break. The once-compliant House of Representatives, which in 2005 began its defiance with a refusal to bring Bush's signature Social Security plan to a vote, dug in its heels against the top priority on his 2006 agenda, a comprehensive immigration reform bill.

And in the latest example of administrative incompetence, following the Hurricane Katrina fiasco, the Department of Veterans Affairs was unable to explain how the confidential files of as many as 26 million veterans were stolen from the home of a department employee -- or why the loss went unreported for weeks.

Even as Bush and his most loyal international partner, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, met to celebrate the (partial) formation of a permanent government in Iraq, a wave of violence swept across Baghdad, taking the lives of two members of a CBS News television crew, among others. And details began leaking out about an alleged massacre last November of Iraqi civilians by U.S. Marines who were said to be retaliating for the death of one of their buddies in one of the countless roadside bombings.

As if to mock further the complications of superpower life, a traffic accident in Kabul, Afghanistan, was all that was needed to trigger an outburst of anti-American violence in a country we had "liberated" but now cannot find a way to leave.

This second-term swamp is a far cry from what most of the Washington Monthly experts predicted -- and from what I would have guessed had I indulged in a crystal-ball exercise. Grover Norquist, the conservative activist, said Bush and the Republicans would send the Democrats into permanent political exile. Paul Begala, a Democratic political consultant, said Bush would exact vengeance on his political enemies. Several people predicted that he would usher in a new era of good feelings, tackling global warming and avoiding divisive social issues. Wrong, wrong, wrong.

The one commentator who got it exactly right was Kevin Drum, who runs the magazine's blog. "What do we have to look forward to if George W. Bush is elected to a second term?" he asked. "One word: scandal."

History backed that forecast. Almost every reelected president in modern times has been victimized by scandal, from Eisenhower's losing his chief of staff, who resigned over the gift of a vicuña coat, to Clinton's facing impeachment.

But Drum found additional reasons that led him to conclude that Bush and the Republicans might be particularly susceptible. For one thing, he said, "both Bush and the current Republican Party leadership have already demonstrated a ruthlessness and disregard for traditional political norms." He cited the lengthy roll calls in the House of Representatives during which arms were twisted to produce favorable votes; the redistricting in Texas to gain five Republican House seats; and the hard-line secrecy imposed by the White House on executive decisions.

Second, he said, the culture of lax supervision of executive agencies by the Republican Congress encouraged misbehavior on Capitol Hill -- and made it likely the malfeasance would reach aromatic heights before it was finally detected. Look at the time it took for the Jack Abramoff-Tom DeLay network to be exposed, the number of times the House ethics committee flinched from fully exposing it -- and you see how right Drum was.

And, finally, he said, the lack of major policy initiatives would leave a vacuum in the news that would make scandal look like the most prominent feature of the political landscape. The near-impasse in Iraq, the painfully long and ultimately unproductive debates about Social Security and immigration, the impasse on energy and health care, and the unwillingness to come to grips with budget deficits -- all this background noise makes the stories of Duke Cunningham's Rolls-Royce and William Jefferson's freezer full of marked bills that much more vivid.

Drum concluded his essay by saying that 2006 would be likely to provide "the perfect breeding ground for a major scandal, and George Bush is exactly the right guy, with exactly the right personality, to step right into it."

So far, the scandal has not involved the president personally, but the stench of corruption is all around the city -- too close for comfort.

VERBATIM (WP)

White House press secretary Tony Snow responded to a question Tuesday by Helen Thomas, a Hearst Newspapers columnist, about published remarks made by new domestic policy adviser Karl Zinsmeister :

THOMAS: Why did the president pick a man who is so contemptible of the public servants in Washington to be his domestic adviser -- saying, "People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings"? Why would he pick such a man to be a domestic adviser?

SNOW: You meant contemptuous, as opposed to contemptible, I think.

THOMAS: Pure contempt.

SNOW: Well, I'm not sure it's pure contempt. I know Karl Zinsmeister pretty well, and he is somebody who expresses himself with a certain amount of piquancy -- you're perhaps familiar with that, aren't you, Helen? And so, as a consequence, from time to time he's going to say -- he'll have some sharp elbows.

THOMAS: If this is his attitude toward public servants --

SNOW: No, I don't think it's his attitude toward public servants -- it may have been toward the press. Just kidding. No, I -- look, if you look at the bulk of what Karl Zinsmeister has done at the American Enterprise [Institute] and elsewhere, I think you're going to find somebody who's done some pretty meaty and interesting research on a variety of topics. The reason he's being brought in is that he's --

THOMAS: Do you agree with his assessment of Washington?

SNOW: I'm not -- there's one sentence the guy wrote, and perhaps you may recall -- yes?

THOMAS: Arrogant, morally repugnant, cheating, shifty -- come on.

SNOW: That's a lot in one sentence, isn't it? He just packed it right in.

Hijacking Harry Truman (WP)

By Peter Beinart

No matter how polarized Washington becomes, there is still one Democrat Republicans love: Harry Truman. Last December, on this page, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice declared the Bush administration's democracy promotion efforts "consistent with the proud tradition of American foreign policy, especially such recent presidents as Harry Truman." Last weekend President Bush devoted his West Point commencement address to an extended analogy between himself and the 33rd president, invoking Truman no fewer than 17 times. Conservative commentators are fond of the analogy, too. Indeed, it is a virtual article of faith on the contemporary right that today's conservatives -- not today's liberals -- are the true heirs of the anti-totalitarian tradition with which we associate Truman's name.

The truth is rather different. Bush and Rice are correct that Truman saw tyranny as a threat to world peace and believed in resisting it, by means that included force. At West Point, Bush quoted Truman's famous declaration in his March 1947 speech proposing military aid to the besieged governments of Greece and Turkey: "It must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures."

But there are other Truman classics that Bush conveniently overlooked. For instance: "We all have to recognize, no matter how great our strength, that we must deny ourselves the license to do always as we please." Truman did not believe merely in promoting democracy and peace; he believed that doing so required powerful international institutions, which could invest American power with the credibility that the Soviets lacked.

In the years immediately after World War II, the United States encased itself in a web of such bodies -- from the United Nations and NATO to the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (now the World Trade Organization). And Truman was frank in recognizing that such institutions gave weaker countries an influence over American actions. As the historian John Lewis Gaddis has written, "It was not that the Americans lacked the capacity to force their allies into line . . . [but] what is surprising is how rarely this happened; how much effort the United States put into persuading -- quite often deferring to -- its NATO partners."

Bush, by contrast, more than any president in recent history, has sought to liberate the United States from international treaties and institutions -- from the Kyoto global warming treaty to the International Criminal Court to the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. To be sure, even Bill Clinton sometimes had trouble getting international agreements through Congress. But in the Bush administration, opposing infringements on U.S. sovereignty has become a cardinal foreign policy principle. In Bush's view, American power legitimizes itself -- we don't need to listen to other countries, because sooner or later they will realize that we were right and they were wrong. Had Bush been around in the late 1940s, he might well have accused Truman of seeking a "permission slip" before defending the United States. Indeed, some conservatives said almost exactly that at the time. It is they -- not Truman -- who are Bush's true ideological forefathers.

Truman also believed that spreading democracy required combating economic despair. He allocated between 2.5 and 5 percent of U.S. national income over four years to the Marshall Plan, in the belief that unless Europe's fragile postwar democracies improved their people's lives, they were likely to fail. Then, in his 1949 State of the Union address, he went further and proposed a Marshall Plan for the Third World. In fact, while Truman increased military spending, he and his advisers repeatedly described economic development as more important to the anti-communist cause. In 1947 his defense secretary, James Forrestal, noted that "at the present time we are keeping our military expenditures below the levels which our military leaders must in good conscience estimate as the minimum which would in themselves ensure national security. By so doing we are able to increase our expenditures to assist in the European recovery." Try to imagine Donald Rumsfeld saying that.

Indeed, while the Bush administration has boosted foreign aid over its appallingly low pre-Sept. 11, 2001, levels, such increases have been trivial compared with the massive new allotments for defense. And one of the primary reasons for mounting anti-American sentiment in Afghanistan is America's failure to fulfill our promises to help rebuild that country after we toppled the Taliban. As The Post's Barton Gellman and Dafna Linzer reported in October 2004, "The president and his most influential advisers, many officials said, do not see those [economic] factors -- or U.S. policy overseas -- as primary contributors to the terrorism threat."

Again, there is a Cold War precedent for this view. But it lies in the arguments of conservatives such as Barry Goldwater, who ridiculed claims that Third World poverty aided communism's appeal. Harry Truman, by contrast, believed in fighting totalitarianism fiercely, but with more than just guns, and through international institutions that made U.S. power legitimate in the world. George W. Bush should remember that the next time he takes Truman's name in vain.

A Beautiful Sunset (WSJ)

Ronald Reagan used to quip that the closest thing to immortality in this life is a government program. We'd add one modern caveat, which is that under Beltway budget rules tax cuts automatically expire after five or 10 years, but spending programs and tax increases live forever.

The latter would change, however, if a group of House Republicans led by Texan Jeb Henserling and Mike Pence of Indiana succeed in pushing new rules to sunset out-of-date federal programs. Under their proposal that has been promised a vote this summer, Congress would have to reauthorize agency budgets every five years, or they would die. The legislation would also create a sunset commission to recommend program terminations, and Congress would vote up or down on the package. This procedure is modeled after the successful military base closing commissions.

Their new budget scrutiny would mean some taboo questions would suddenly get asked in Washington. To wit:

• Should the U.S. spend $300 million a year on bilingual education, when research shows that foreign language classes stunt English learning by immigrant children?

• Do we really need 15 different agencies to fund job training?

• Why give Amtrak nearly $1 billion a year in taxpayer handouts, when its financial performance deteriorates every year and as its share of the transportation market declines?

• Should farmers with incomes of more than $1 million a year be eligible for taxpayer subsidies?

In the private sector, worker productivity growth in 2005 hit its highest level in 50 years. What a contrast with government, where agency performance audits by the U.S. Government Accountability Office (GAO) have found enormous waste and financial mismanagement in every operation from the Pentagon to Medicare. (Here's just one outrage GAO uncovered: One in six foodstamp dollars goes to an ineligible recipient.) The private sector operates under Joseph Schumpeter's concept of "creative destruction." Mr. Henserling quips that in Congress "we get a lot of creation, but never destruction."

In Washington, "fiscal discipline" has become a code phrase for raising taxes, never for rolling back the $2.7 trillion annual federal budget. Yet a new analysis by Brian Riedl of the Heritage Foundation indicates that balancing the federal budget is possible within a few years with even modest spending restraint. Thanks to the surge in federal tax revenues in the past 18 months, if Congress were simply to hold federal spending to the rate of inflation over the next six years, the budget would be balanced without a penny of new taxes. Meanwhile, sunsetting useless agencies would mean that high priority services could be fully funded.

It will be instructive to see how many Democrats and Northeastern Republicans -- who like to pose as deficit hawks -- favor deficit reduction if that means sunsetting programs that have outlived their usefulness. Our guess is the number will be very close to zero -- which is the main reason Congress will spend $300 billion more than it raises in taxes this year.

Fed Minutes Show Concern About Inflation (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

WASHINGTON — Facing both higher-than-expected inflation and the possibility of slower growth, Federal Reserve officials at a May 10 meeting were unsure how many more interest-rate increases, if any, will be needed, according to minutes released Wednesday.

Underscoring the uncertainty, the central bank's Federal Open Market Committee debated a series of options at the meeting, from standing pat to raising the target for short-term rates by half a percentage point. The Fed ultimately voted unanimously to boost its target by a quarter-point to 5%. That was the 16th such increase since mid-2004, when rates stood at a low 1%.

"Given the risks to growth and inflation, Committee members were uncertain about how much, if any, further tightening would be needed after today's action," the minutes said.

Fed officials noted several times that core inflation — which excludes food and energy prices — had been stronger than expected. Core inflation has been running slightly higher than 2% in recent months, above the Fed's 1%-2% preferred range.

Adding to inflation concerns were surging energy and commodity prices; a falling dollar, which makes imports more expensive; and rising inflation expectations.

But Fed officials also saw potential for slower growth, including less-robust consumer spending and a cooling housing market. With "modest further policy action," including the May 10 rate increase, the economy should moderate gradually with core inflation remaining near recent levels, the minutes said.

Several economists called the minutes more hawkish than anticipated, especially after Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke in late April suggested the central bank might have to pause its rate campaign at some point to get a better reading on economic conditions.

"I don't know how you go from mentioning a pause and now a couple weeks later mention a (half-percentage point) move and not expect the market to be confused," says Rich Yamarone of Argus Research.

Mickey Levy, chief economist at Bank of America, says he expects the Fed to raise rates by a quarter-point at its June 28-29 meeting, ultimately pushing rates to 5.75% by the end of the year.

The minutes also show Bernanke appointed a panel to examine better ways to communicate policy, led by Fed Governor Donald Kohn. Financial markets have been jumpy recently, partly because of uncertainty as the central bank reaches a turning point in policy.

New York Fed President Timothy Geithner in a Wednesday speech cited a number of reasons, from economic developments to data limitations, for uncertainty in central bank policy, adding that a central bank "cannot provide more assurance about the likely future course of policy than it actually has."

Geithner also said the situation in the past two years, where the Fed was able to easily telegraph policy to the markets, was the exception, not the norm.

Fed Kept Options Open On Rates (WP)

By Nell Henderson

DOJ_NMG_0030845

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Federal Reserve officials were so concerned at their last meeting about rising inflation that they considered raising interest rates more aggressively than they had in six years.

The U.S. economy has grown briskly this year, despite signs of cooling in the housing market. Payrolls and wages have risen. Energy and other raw-materials prices have climbed. The dollar has weakened. And consumers say they expect prices to keep rising faster.

"In view of the risk that the outlook for inflation could worsen," Fed policymakers agreed to lift their benchmark short-term interest rate to 5 percent from 4.75 percent at their May 10 meeting, for the 16th consecutive quarter-percentage-point increase in nearly two years, according to minutes of the session released yesterday.

But Fed officials also considered whether to bump the rate up by a half percentage point, to 5.25 percent, or to leave it unchanged, the minutes said in an unusually explicit description of the options considered. A half-percentage-point increase would have been the biggest since the Fed ended its last period of credit tightening with a similar-size increase in May 2000.

Members of the Federal Open Market Committee, the central bank's top policymaking group, "were uncertain about how much, if any, further tightening would be needed" after the May 10 increase, the minutes of the meeting showed . The group issued a statement that day leaving the door open to more increases in the future.

The Fed's uncertainty, compounded by reports of higher inflation, has roiled financial markets in recent weeks. The Dow Jones industrial average hit a six-year high May 10 and has been choppy since. Major international stock indicators have also fallen, reflecting anxiety over how high global interest rates may rise and how much economic growth may slow. Hedge funds and other big investors have pulled back from riskier global investments, fund managers said.

The Dow and other major U.S. stock indicators fell sharply yesterday after the Fed minutes were released at 2 p.m., as their hawkish tone led many traders and analysts to conclude that more Fed increases were likely. Stocks rallied to close the day with small gains, as many investors applauded the Fed's concern about inflation.

"This is good for stocks for them to sound more hawkish," said James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist for Wells Capital Management, who attributed much of the markets' recent jumpiness to inflation worries.

Global markets will remain volatile and the big traders will probably retreat further from risky investment strategies as long as the outlook remains clouded for inflation, interest rates and economic growth, analysts and fund managers predicted.

"You've got a Fed that's not sure what they're going to do," said Larry Kantor, managing director of Barclays Capital Inc. The minutes, he said, are "not going to calm anyone down or reduce market volatility."

The minutes' implication that interest rates are likely to keep rising contrasted with recent comments by Fed officials, including Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, said Richard Yamarone, director of research at Argus Research Corp. "This is another in a series of confusing messages from the Bernanke Fed."

Bernanke told Congress in late April that he and his colleagues might pause after 15 consecutive interest rate increases. Such a pause would be based on the Fed's forecast that the economy will slow this year as higher interest rates cause the housing market to cool, prompting consumers to ease up on spending and tamping down inflation pressures. Some Fed officials have worried about raising interest rates too high, or "overshooting," and triggering a sharper economic downturn.

The economy grew at a rapid 5.3 percent annual rate in the first three months of the year, and many analysts forecast it to slow to a pace closer to 3 percent for the rest of the year. Several Fed officials believe an annual growth rate of 3 to 3.5 percent would be "sustainable" over the long term without fanning inflation.

Fed policymakers noted at the May meeting that the housing market had lost steam. Sales have fallen from their peaks last year, inventories of unsold homes are rising, and price appreciation is slowing. The Mortgage Bankers Association reported yesterday that mortgage applications fell last week to a level 22.4 percent lower than the corresponding week last year.

But FOMC members also noted that their desired slowdown had not arrived. Instead, exports were rising. Business spending on plants and equipment was robust.

The economy "had been growing quite strongly, and whether economic growth would moderate to a sustainable pace was not yet clear," said the minutes, which summarize the discussion without identifying participants by name.

Moreover, the officials agreed "inflation pressures appeared to be somewhat greater than the committee had anticipated" at its previous meeting in March. Fed officials "expressed some concern about recent price developments."

And if the Fed officials worried about overshooting at the May meeting, there was no mention of such concerns in the minutes -- in contrast to the previous meeting.

"Not one inflation gauge is trending [down] in a way that would support a pause," said Yamarone, who predicted that the Fed will raise its benchmark rate to at least 5.5 percent this summer. "They're all trending higher, and that has to be addressed by the Fed."

Fed Grows Uncertain Over Rates As Inflation Concerns Multiply (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials discussed leaving interest rates unchanged in May or raising them half a percentage point before settling on a quarter-point boost, evidence of their growing uncertainty over what rate action to take, the minutes from their deliberations show.

The minutes from the May 10 meeting of the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee, released Wednesday after the usual three-week lag, also show officials increasingly concerned about inflation and inflation expectations.

They also disclosed that Chairman Ben Bernanke had appointed a subcommittee on communications to be led by governor Donald Kohn and including Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis President Gary Stern, and San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen.

Officials discussed actions ranging from leaving rates "unchanged at this meeting to increasing the federal-funds rate 50 basis points," but all agreed a 25-basis-point move "was appropriate today to keep inflation from rising and promote sustainable economic expansion," the minutes said. (There are 100 basis points in a percentage point.)

The committee's vote to push the Fed's short-term interest-rate target up a quarter point -- to 5% -- was the 16th consecutive meeting with such an increase and was widely anticipated in markets. Nonetheless, it was the first time since the Fed began to raise rates in June 2004 that, according to minutes, anything other than a quarter-point increase was discussed, other than soon after Hurricane Katrina last summer, when one member preferred no rate increase. Future meetings also are likely to feature divergent opinions and, perhaps, dissenting votes on the rate action. That would reflect the different weights officials put on their concerns about rising inflation and slowing economic growth.

Officials "were uncertain about how much, if any, further tightening would be needed." Excluding food and energy prices, "consumer inflation had lately been a little higher than expected," and fresh increases in energy prices might be "reflected to a greater degree" in other costs "in coming months," the minutes said. In addition, consumer surveys and the behavior of inflation-indexed Treasury bonds suggested the public also was expecting higher inflation.

Indeed, officials debated whether they could continue to call such expectations "contained" in their postmeeting statement. They ultimately did, judging that the "pickup in longer-term expectations, while worrisome, was relatively small."

On the other hand, officials saw "downside risks to economic activity," in particular a bigger-than-expected slowing in housing as long-term rates rose. They predicted "growth in activity would moderate" and "core inflation would stay close" to recent levels.

Data released since the May 10 meeting show inflation has remained worrisome, but housing construction and consumer spending have softened, suggesting the economy is slowing as Fed officials expected. Nonetheless, after release of the minutes Wednesday, futures markets boosted the probability to 72% from 58% that the Fed will raise its short-term rate target to 5.25% on June 29.

The minutes shed little light on what Mr. Kohn's subcommittee on communications will tackle. Mr. Bernanke is known to favor releasing more information on the Fed's goals and decision-making, such as a numerical inflation objective, more frequent forecasts and possibly longer, less-formulaic statements. Similar committees in the past have overhauled the structure of the Fed's statements from time to time, but no formula has yet reconciled the Fed's conflicting goals of transparency and simplicity.

John Engler (CSM)

By David T. Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

Manufacturing is not glamorous.

When I mentioned at a family gathering that the Monitor was hosting a breakfast for the head of the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM), the response was: why?

But while it lacks the sizzle of the software, music, or movie industries, the manufacturing sector remains a major economic force in the US. According to a recent speech by NAM president John Engler, manufacturing generates about $1.4 trillion, or 12 percent of our gross domestic product. Manufacturers fund nearly two-thirds of US research and development, account for three-fourths of our nation's exports, and despite recent employment woes, still provide more than 20 million high-paying jobs.

So it is worth listening to Mr. Engler on the challenges facing a key force in the economy.

Before moving to Washington to head the NAM, Mr. Engler was the governor of Michigan for three terms. He was something of a political child prodigy, elected at age 23 to the Michigan State House of Representatives. Here are excerpts from his remarks at Wednesday's breakfast: On the outlook for the US manufacturing sector:

"We are still the possessors of a substantial manufacturing sector. The demise of the manufacturing economy, the obituaries for that are a bit premature. 2005 was a record [year for] output in US manufacturing history, accomplished with fewer people, reflecting the incredible productivity that has been driving manufacturing.... It is a growth rate that makes us the envy of virtually all of old Europe. [The outlook is for] more modest growth this year than last, but still positive, with threats as a result of external factors [that are] hard for individual manufacturers to control." On Treasury Secretary designate Henry Paulson's opportunities:

"I think one of the things that is interesting about Secretary Paulson, which could be a huge advantage for him, [is that] he probably has been to China ... more than 70 times. He may have been to China more than ... the entire US Senate. So there is going to be an ability on his part hopefully ... to craft a China policy and a China relationship that can be more of a win-win. We obviously share the opinion of groups like the International Monetary Fund that there is an imbalance in terms of the under-valuation of the Chinese currency. We also worry a lot about the fact that there are significant subsidies allowed Chinese enterprises that are not enjoyed by US companies and that makes it hard to compete." On the lack of a US energy policy:

"It is pretty central to economic policy. I think America lacks an energy strategy and from a manufacturing perspective, where we use a third of the electricity generated in America, it is simply unacceptable and represents a threat to a strong manufacturing economy in America." On the outlook for the US automobile industry:

"It is to the point now where they simply, fundamentally, have got to be fixed. And that means they are going to get smaller in order to get better." On Congressional inaction on key national problems:

"I think there has probably never been less connection between the money people donate and the results they get than there is today, regardless of party. I think to the extent there is frustration, it is the seeming inability of Congress to find any time when it is able to do something that is in the interests of the country ... regardless of whether someone benefits more than somebody else or he or she wins.... Today the motivation so often seems to be that, 'I can't do this because if we did it and it worked, X would get credit for it. And I would rather have nothing happen than to have X get credit.' In that environment, how do you ever do anything? We are taking on, in a very tough global environment, countries that are focused on doing everything they can and whatever it takes to sort of capture investment and growth."

Stocks Enter June On Solid Gains (WSJ)

By Karen Talley

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

As stocks ended the month with a solid gain, shares of NRG Energy, ADC Telecommunications and ATI Technologies moved on deals, both in the works and contemplated.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 73.88 points, or 0.67%, to 11168.31, after losing 184.18 on Tuesday. For May, the Dow industrials lost 1.7%, the biggest monthly decline since June 2005 and first monthly drop so far this year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 14.14, or 0.65%, to 2178.88. For the month, the Nasdaq fell 6.2%. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 10.25, or 0.81%, to 1270.09. For the month, the S&P 500 declined 3.1%.

Stocks started out well as the price of oil fell and ended up building on those gains in a bit of a delayed reaction to the midafternoon release of minutes from the Federal Reserve's most recent meeting. "The minutes contained something for everyone," said Phil Dow, director of equity strategy at RBC Dain Rauscher. "Looking at them you could make an equally strong case for either a pause or a hike."

NRG Energy leapt $6.74, or 16%, to $49.75, the biggest percentage rise on the Big Board. Mirant said it made an unsolicited offer last month to acquire the fellow power generator for $7.85 billion, but in a rejection letter sent May 23, NRG called the cash-and-stock offer "the wrong deal at the wrong time." Mirant shed 37 cents, or 1.5%, to 24.88.

ADC plunged 4.46, or 20%, to 17.92 and Andrew added 34 cents, or 3.5%, to 10.12, both on Nasdaq. ADC agreed to acquire the Westchester, Ill., concern, merging ADC's wireline business with Andrew's wireless-infrastructure assets into a company with combined revenue of $3.3 billion.

ATI (Nasdaq) jumped 1.36, or 9%, to 16.51. RBC Capital Markets said Advanced Micro Devices could soon announce a strategic "tie-up" between AMD and the graphics chip maker or an outright acquisition of ATI. Advanced Micro rose 41 cents, or 1.4%, to 30.89.

Tiffany & Co. rose 1.69, or 5.2%, to 34.19. The upscale retailer's first-quarter profit rose 7.7% despite sluggish U.S. jewelry sales, as business in Japan and other markets overseas was better than expected.

Rambus lost 1.58, or 6.1%, to 24.26 on the Nasdaq. The memory-technology company said its board is investigating the timing of past stock-option grants.

Royal Caribbean Cruises rose 2.39, or 6.7%, to 38.08. The cruise ship operator expects to buy back 4.1 million shares as part of some financial transactions.

Freddie Mac dropped 1.54, or 2.5%, to 60.04. The mortgage-finance company reported a 27% drop in net income for 2005 to $2.13 billion, reflecting the costs of settling shareholder suits, losses on Hurricane Katrina and accounting changes.

Healthways (Nasdaq) advanced 2.52, or 5%, to 53.14. One of the country's biggest disease-management companies said it agreed to buy one of its largest rivals, closely held LifeMasters Supported SelfCare, for $307.5 million.

L-3 Communications lost 4.91, or 6.3%, to 72.96. CIBC World Markets cut its rating on the shares of the defense contractor to "sector performer" from "sector outperformer," citing uncertainty over option-grant timing, recent acquisitions and lack of visibility with succession planning.

Monsanto rose 1.98, or 2.4%, to 84.16. The biotechnology and agricultural-products company raised its fiscal 2006 earnings forecast, citing strength in its U.S. corn-seed and trait business.

Dell (Nasdaq) gained 36 cents, or 1.4%, to 25.38. The computer maker unveiled a set of personal computers it said would expand its moves into the consumer-entertainment market.E*Trade Financial gained 84 cents, or 3.6%, to 24.27. The online financial-services company plans to acquire Retirement Advisors of America, a Dallas investment adviser that E*Trade said was managing more than $1 billion of assets as of the end of 2005. Terms weren't disclosed.

Marvel Entertainment lost 72 cents, or 3.6%, to 19.10. The entertainment and licensing company announced newappointments in its studios division, with Avi Arad giving up the posts of chairman and chief executive of Marvel Studios but remaining involved with an independent production deal.

Oregon Steel Mills gained 3.22, or 7.4%, to 46.93. UBS upgraded its rating on the shares of the steelmaker to "buy" from "neutral," citing valuation and potential earnings from its energy-infrastructure business.

Applebee's International (Nasdaq) lost 82 cents, or 3.9%, to 20.22. The restaurant chain said May same-store sales, or sales from restaurants open at least a year, fell 1.9% system-wide, declined 2% at domestic franchise locations and dropped 1.9% at company-owned restaurants.

Expedia (Nasdaq) advanced 36 cents, or 2.6%, to 14.21. Credit Suisse said near-term downside is limited for the online travel agency, and so it upgraded its rating on the stock to "neutral" from "underperform."

Nasdaq-traded Altera rose 55 cents, or 2.9%, to 19.56. The maker of chips used in products such as Internet routers and flat-panel televisions said it still sees second-quarter sales growing 7%-10 % sequentially.

Costco Wholesale (Nasdaq) lost 63 cents, or 1.2%, to 52.93. The warehouse-club retailer said its fiscal third-quarter profit rose 12% on a solid sales increase, but the results fell slightly short of Wall Street's expectations amid a higher tax rate and thin margins on gasoline sales.

Medicare Drug-Cap Savings May Be Offset By Hospital Visits (WSJ)

By John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

Capping Medicare drug benefits results in more patient visits to emergency rooms and hospitals, offsetting savings from lower spending on prescription medications, researchers say.

The study, published Thursday in the New England Journal of Medicine, gives ammunition to critics of the new Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit, which includes payment restrictions.

Researchers at health-maintenance organization Kaiser Permanente in Oakland, Calif.; the University of California, San Francisco; and Harvard University examined the cost and clinical outcomes of 199,179 Kaiser beneficiaries in Northern California who were enrolled in a program called Medicare+ Choice in 2003.

Under that program, annual drug benefits were capped at $1,000. The study compared 157,275 Kaiser beneficiaries with caps to 41,904 who had unlimited benefits because of supplemental coverage from their employers.

The study, which received funding from federal agencies and the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation, found that a cap on drug benefits lowered pharmacy costs by 31%. But total medical costs, including drugs, were roughly the same.

Researchers said that was largely because patients with drug caps had a 9% higher rate of emergency-room visits, a 13% higher rate of nonelective hospitalizations and a 22% higher death rate.

The study found subscribers with capped drug costs were less likely to take drugs to lower blood pressure and cholesterol and to control diabetes -- chronic conditions for which medication can offer cost-effective drugs to prevent costly health problems later.

For example, the study found, 14.6% of those enrolled in plans without caps failed to take their blood-pressure medication as prescribed by their doctor, while 18.1% neglected to do so in plans with restrictions.

Researchers noted that the cap in the older Medicare plan differs from the terms of Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit. The benefit took effect Jan. 1, and more than 37 million senior citizens enrolled in the plan by the initial May deadline. Under the standard Part D plan, those who enroll pay a $250 deductible, after which they pay 25% of the next $2,000 in costs, or $500. Then, in what critics have called the "doughnut hole," seniors must pay 100% of drug costs for the next $2,850. After hitting $3,600 out of pocket, they pay 5% of drug costs above that level. Various private plans can offer richer coverage with different terms for monthly premiums that now range from less than $2 to about $40.

Kenneth E. Thorpe, a professor of health policy at Emory University, who wrote an editorial about the study in the journal, said the research shows cost saving through coverage caps is especially wrongheaded for treating chronic diseases. In terms of Medicare Part D, "we may very well be penny-wise and pound-foolish here," he said in an interview.

But Peter Ashkenaz, a Medicare spokesman, said Part D doesn't completely cut off coverage after $1,000 and is a vast improvement for most seniors, who previously had "no coverage whatsoever" for prescription drugs under the standard Medicare plan.

Low Payments By U.S. Raise Medical Bills Billions A Year (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Employers and consumers are paying billions of dollars more a year for medical care to compensate for imbalances in the nation's health care system resulting from tight Medicare and Medicaid budgets, according to Blue Cross officials and independent actuaries.

A new study commissioned by Premera Blue Cross, based in Seattle, has found a rapid acceleration in higher costs to private payers in Washington State, for example, as hospitals and doctors grapple with constraints in the federal health insurance programs.

The study found that in 2004, the most recent year for which full data are available, hospitals in Washington State charged an additional $738 million — or 14.3 percent of their revenue — to private payers to make up for Medicare and Medicaid underpayments. Similarly, doctors shifted $620 million, or 12 percent, said John Pickering, an actuary at Milliman Inc., a consulting and actuarial firm that conducted the study.

A similar Milliman study in California for 2004 said that health plans and consumers paid an additional $4.5 billion for hospital care in that state to compensate for Medicaid and Medicare constraints. Milliman's California study, commissioned by Blue Shield of California, did not include physicians' charges.

Will Fox, a Milliman actuary, said California hospitals had been hit particularly hard by Medicare payment policies in the last few years, "and there is no reason to think this has let up."

Other research has come to similar conclusions across the country. Unpaid hospital bills, largely for the uninsured, are costing about $45 billion nationally a year and adding about 8.5 percent to the cost of health insurance for those who do pay, said Kenneth E. Thorpe, a health care economist at Emory University.

Employers said the rising cost trends were, in turn, adding to the growing numbers of people without insurance. And when those people check into hospitals, they generate even higher costs for those employers and consumers who pay insurance premiums.

"This is a serious national problem, and it is only going to get much worse," said Helen Darling, president of the National Business Group on Health, a research and trade group for large employers. "There are more uninsured, the hospitals are inefficient, and every year, Medicare and Medicaid hold down on increases to cover rising medical costs," she said.

Rich Maturi, a senior vice president of Premera, said the report would show "employers and policy makers that they needed to address an unsustainable trend in the growth of cost-shifting." Business leaders, health plans and groups representing hospitals and doctors plan to meet in July to review the report and make policy recommendations.

Although many state budgets are overwhelmed by rising Medicaid costs, health care reforms intended to reduce the ranks of the uninsured that were recently enacted in Massachusetts and Vermont include more state money for Medicaid. Blue Cross Blue Shield of Massachusetts and Partners Healthcare, the largest hospital group in Boston, jointly supported the Medicaid increases.

"That was a real-world example of hospitals and insurers seeing that the had common interests," said Paul Ginsberg, a health economist who is president of the Center for Studying Health Systems Change, a nonprofit research group in Washington.

Hospitals across the country lost money on Medicare patients in 2003 after at least six years of declining profit margins, according to the latest report by the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission, which advises Congress and federal officials.

Glass Artists Face Off In Court (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

SEATTLE, May 31 — As an ever-moving maestro in the world where fine art and commerce converge, Dale Chihuly is perhaps the world's most successful glass artist.

His clients include Bill Gates and Bill Clinton, and his elaborate installations of sea gardens and flower clusters show that mere sand transformed by fire can elevate a casino ceiling to the level of gallery spectacle.

But now Mr. Chihuly is in the midst of a hard-edged legal fight in federal court here over the distinctiveness of his creations and, more fundamentally, who owns artistic expression in the glass art world.

Mr. Chihuly has sued two glass blowers, including a longtime collaborator, for copyright infringement, accusing them of imitating his signature lopsided creations, and other designs inspired by the sea.

"About 99 percent of the ocean would be wide open," Mr. Chihuly said in an interview. "Look, all I'm trying to do is to prevent somebody from copying me directly."

The glass blowers say that Mr. Chihuly is trying to control entire forms, shapes and colors and that his brand does not extend to ancient and evolving techniques derived from the natural world.

"Just because he was inspired by the sea does not mean that no one else can use the sea to make glass art," said Bryan Rubino, the former acolyte named in the suit who worked for Mr. Chihuly as a contractor or employee for 14 years. "If anything, Mother Nature should be suing Dale Chihuly."

The suit, rare in art circles, offers a sometimes unflattering glimpse at how high-powered commercial artists like Mr. Chihuly work. The two glass blowers say that he has very little to do with much of the art, and that he sometimes buys objects and puts the Chihuly name on them, a contention that Mr. Chihuly strongly denies.

He acknowledges that he has not blown glass for 27 years, dating from a surfing accident that cost him the full range of shoulder motion, an injury that struck three years after he had lost sight in his left eye in a traffic accident.

Still, Mr. Chihuly said, he works with sketches, faxes and through exhortation. Nothing with his name on it ever came from anyone but himself, he said.

Andrew Page, editor of Glass: The Urban Glass Art Quarterly, which is published in New York, said that Mr. Chihuly deserved a high place in the pantheon of glass artists, but that the suit could hurt his reputation by igniting countercharges and opening a window into how a celebrity artist works on a mass scale.

"I think Dale Chihuly is a pure original," Mr. Page said. "He has a tremendous sense of color and composition. And he has done a tremendous amount for the field. But this lawsuit may have been the worst thing he could have done."

A butcher's son from hardscrabble Tacoma, Mr. Chihuly, 64, operates out of a cavernous boathouse on Lake Union with a split-tree table inside that seats 200 and a lap pool with a riotous sprouting of glass objects beneath a clear floor.

The artist has 93 employees, part of a veritable fine art factory called Chihuly Inc. When celebrities like Robin Williams or Colin L. Powell visit Seattle, the boathouse is often the sole stop they want to make.

Mr. Chihuly said he had no choice but to use the courts to try to eliminate "knockoffs" by people trying to profit from his empire.

"This lawsuit is not about money," he said, puttering around the boathouse in paint-splattered shoes with a lawyer and publicity agent in tow. "It's about what is fair. There are a million forms you can make that don't look like mine."

In a 2003 copyright case involving glass art, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco, ruled against an artist who said another artist had used his design of jellyfish encased in glass. The two designs looked similar, but the court said no one could copyright nature.

"These ideas, first expressed by nature, are the common heritage of humankind, and no artist may use copyright laws to prevent others from depicting them," the court said. But the judges added that any artist might "protect the original expression he or she contributes to these ideas."

Mr. Chihuly said it was his original expression in deliberately off-centered bowls, baskets and vases, as well as sea forms and flowers that made his designs unique. His elaborate installations, often filmed and sold as DVD's, include "Chihuly Over Venice," a 40,000-pound ceiling installed in the lobby of the Bellagio casino hotel in Las Vegas, and a 48-foot-tall design at the Tower of David Museum in Jerusalem.

Karrin Klotz, a copyright lawyer and lecturer at the University of Washington School of Business, said there was precedent for Mr. Chihuly's claim, that Picasso was able to copyright a mere few lines on a pad because they were so distinct.

"I think his works are distinctive enough to be protected," Ms. Klotz said of Mr. Chihuly. "He is depicting things like flowers and sea forms that may be derived from nature, but the way he shapes them can be protected."

In court filings and at preliminary hearings where boxes of Mr. Chihuly's delicate multidimensional glass objects were presented as exhibits next to the work of Mr. Rubino, and the other artist named in the suit, Robert Kaindl, the similarities in the works are striking.

The case may turn on factors like whether a "lip wrap," a colored trim line around the edge of a design, or a certain ripple is the exclusive domain of Chihuly Inc.

Lip wraps and ripples, the glass blowers say in their counterclaim, "have been around for centuries" and are standard design elements.

Lawyers for Mr. Chihuly agreed that glass art was 5,000 years old, but said he created his own look and revolutionized the glass art world.

"Mr. Chihuly made an abrupt departure from the notion of centered works, making instead glass sculptures that appear to be collapsing, frozen in time," the lawyers wrote in a complaint in the fall.

One question unanswered by the suit is why Mr. Rubino and Mr. Chihuly would turn on each other so bitterly. By all accounts, they worked closely for nearly 20 years on Mr. Chihuly's biggest projects, a relationship not unlike partnerships through the ages between masters and the craftsmen who carry out their work.

In court filings, lawyers for the glass artists wrote that Mr. Chihuly would "often ask Mr. Rubino to come up with something for Dale Chihuly to review and purchase for Chihuly Inc."

"Chihuly is not the source of inspiration for a substantial number of glass artwork carrying the Chihuly mark," they wrote.

In an interview, Mr. Rubino said he did not understand why Mr. Chihuly went after him and said the suit could ruin him. He said it could prevent him from making the most basic of glass objects that are lopsided by gravity when pulled from an oven.

"I'm a technician," Mr. Rubino said. "I can make anything out of glass, and I can spin it any way."

For his part, Mr. Chihuly called Mr. Rubino a "gaffer," a term for a glassblower who labors around a furnace at the instruction of an artist. Asked to assess Mr. Rubino, Mr. Chihuly said, "He was an excellent craftsman" with little vision of his own.

"You think I would ever let Rubino decide what something looks like?" Mr. Chihuly asked.

Mr. Rubino's lawyer, Scott Wakefield, said Mr. Chihuly was in essence seeking a monopoly over a huge field of art.

"If the first guy who painted Madonna and Child had tried to copyright it," Mr. Wakefield said, "half of the Louvre would be empty."

Bush Pitches In To Help Ehrlich (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

BALTIMORE -- President Bush hopped over to Baltimore yesterday to raise money for the Maryland Republican Party, telling a high-paying crowd of several hundred to help re-elect Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and also send Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele to the U.S. Senate, although the latter was conspicuously absent.

"In our line of work there's a lot of big talkers, and sometimes you find a doer -- somebody who knows how to set an agenda and lead people to accomplish that agenda," Mr. Bush said. "Bob Ehrlich is a doer, he's a great leader, and he needs to be re-elected governor of the state of Maryland."

Mr. Bush stood on a stage in a ballroom at the BWI Marriott just feet away from Mr. Ehrlich, but the president also had brief kind words for Mr. Steele, the other major Republican statewide candidate on the ballot in November, even though Mr. Steele was not there.

"By the way, when you're getting him in as governor, make sure you put Michael Steele into the United States Senate," Mr. Bush said, in one of just two references to the Senate candidate in his speech.

Mr. Steele is one of the most senior black Republican officeholders in the nation and is one of the party's high-profile candidates in November. He has not been shy about disagreeing with Mr. Bush publicly in recent weeks, saying in particular that Mr. Bush mishandled the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Steele was in Las Vegas at another engagement yesterday, Republicans at yesterday's Maryland event said. But they dismissed talk of a rift, saying the two have campaigned together before. In December, Mr. Bush drew about 600 guests and netted about $500,000 at a Steele fundraiser at the Baltimore Ravens' M&T Bank Stadium.

The president praised Mr. Ehrlich for being "an education governor" who fought for charter schools and accountability, said he worked to clean up the Chesapeake Bay, and controlled spending and increased jobs. He said Mr. Ehrlich also deserves to be re-elected because he blocked a huge tax increase that would have happened had a Democrat won in 2002.

"I tell you what would have happened -- the legislature would have raised $7.5 billion in tax increases had you not had this man as the governor of the state of Maryland," he said.

Mr. Ehrlich will face one of two strong Democratic challengers -- Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan or Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley -- in his bid for a second term.

"This is about a competitive two-party state," Mr. Ehrlich said before introducing Mr. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0030853

Mr. Bush is stepping up his campaign schedule in the run-up to November, knowing that control of Congress -- and therefore his ability to pursue his agenda in the last two years of his presidency -- is on the line.

The Maryland Senate race could figure prominently in the battle for control of Congress. Democrats would need to net six seats to gain control of the upper chamber, and a defeat in a Democrat-held seat in Maryland could doom Democrats' chances.

Mr. Steele has distanced himself from Mr. Bush in other ways. According to columnist Robert Novak earlier this week, Mr. Steele "could not find anything favorable to say about the president" during an event at Prince George's Community College. Mr. Novak also said that Mr. Steele "was even tougher on Bush in talking to me: 'In the eyes of blacks, [Hurricane] Katrina was a 9/11 event. You didn't fly over 9/11. You got on the ground in the rubble. You should have been on the ground for Katrina.' "

Some of the Republicans in attendance last night said they were surprised by Mr. Steele's absence, but said there was no rift and he would benefit anyway from the event, which raised funds for Maryland Victory 2006, a get-out-the-vote operation that specifically targets state legislative races and Mr. Ehrlich's campaign, but which will benefit Mr. Steele as well.

Organizers wouldn't say how much tickets were or how much they took in, though they said it was the most successful event ever for the state party. Early reports had the event netting around $1 million. Couples who attended the VIP reception beforehand and had a photo taken with the president paid $10,000 a couple.

Several hundred people attended the main speaking event and heard Mr. Bush refer repeatedly to Mr. Ehrlich's record in specific detail.

The money raised goes to Maryland Victory 2006, a get-out-the-vote operation that specifically targets state legislative races and Mr. Ehrlich's campaign but which will benefit Mr. Steele as well.

Mr. Bush is still a giant draw for Republican candidates, and the White House says he is getting more requests than he can fulfill, but some incumbent lawmakers are choosing not to attend events with him.

Rep. Curt Weldon, Pennsylvania Republican, skipped a similar event last week for U.S. House Republicans from the Philadelphia area. Mr. Weldon told the Wall Street Journal that Mr. Bush is doing poorly in his state and said, "I've got to win this by myself."

For yesterday's event, Mr. Bush showed he had more than a passing familiarity with Mr. Ehrlich's campaign and accomplishments during his first term. The president touted the governor's record on the Chesapeake Bay and charter schools, and spoke in depth about Mr. Ehrlich's performance on tax cuts and the state budget.

He also said Mr. Ehrlich showed he can manage finances by cutting his own executive office by 7 percent.

Mr. Bush continued to sound themes popular with conservatives such as his pledge to veto the emergency spending bill for the war on terror and hurricane relief if Congress spends more than the president's target.

But Mr. Bush didn't mention another hot-button issue -- immigration, which divides his party deeply.

Steele Absent From Bush GOP Fundraiser (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

President Bush shuttled into Maryland last night to help the state Republican Party raise more than $1 million for a number of high-profile 2006 races, but only one of the state's two marquee Republican candidates joined him.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. stood on a riser shoulder to shoulder with the president, but the party's leading candidate for an open U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, was absent. Steele had a scheduling conflict, campaign spokesman Doug Heye said.

In a speech to 300 Ehrlich loyalists, Bush focused on what he said were the high points of the governor's first term, including initiatives to promote charter schools and the health of the Chesapeake Bay.

"I like Bob Ehrlich because he's not afraid to take on problems," Bush said. "Bob Ehrlich is a problem solver."

As they waited for the president to speak in a hotel ballroom near Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport, several Republicans in the crowd said they were not concerned about Bush's poll numbers in Maryland. His approval rating in the state has dipped below 30 percent, according to a recent poll.

Democrats were eager to promote Bush's appearance, figuring it wouldn't help Ehrlich politically.

"We encourage him to come back every day and spend more and more time with Governor Ehrlich," a grinning Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley said at a news event yesterday morning. O'Malley and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan are the two Democrats seeking to unseat Ehrlich this fall.

Democratic Party officials also were quick to spotlight Steele's decision to miss the event. Steele was in Nevada to attend a fundraiser in his honor, his campaign aides said.

Analysts disagreed over whether Steele was sending a message. The lieutenant governor has not been shy about appearing close to the president, having taken part in numerous events with Bush's close aides and relatives and a fundraiser headlined by Bush.

Jennifer Duffy, managing editor of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, said it is one thing for a candidate to pass on an event with the president if he has a clear conflict, such as a pending vote on Capitol Hill. "It's a lot harder to explain that you didn't attend an event with the president because you were going to an event hosted by a senator from another state," Duffy said. "I think you have to assume there is some element of him distancing himself not only from the president, but from the party."

In Maryland, any Republican running statewide will have to reach across the aisle for votes. The state's registered Democrats outnumber Republicans by nearly two to one.

Steele's candidacy, in particular, has been designed to draw support from black voters who may be disaffected Democrats but still disapprove of Bush in overwhelming numbers. One internal Democratic Party poll recently put Bush's support from black voters in Maryland at 8 percent.

Ehrlich aides said that for the governor, there was no question about whether he would attend last night's event.

"There was no ambivalence on the governor's part," said Shareese DeLeaver, a campaign spokeswoman. "We're onboard."

Ehrlich's political opponents said they didn't see that the governor had a choice. Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller (D-Calvert) recalled that in 1998, when then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening (D) canceled a fundraiser with President Bill Clinton, the decisions wound up looking petty and disloyal.

"I personally think Ehrlich's decision as a party leader is the right decision," Miller said. "But he is going to have to acknowledge that he's aligned with the president."

Silver Spring developer and political commentator Blair Lee, who is quick to praise Ehrlich, said not showing up would also be at odds with the governor's personal style. "He's a jock," Lee said. "It's part of the jock code. You don't turn your back on your teammates."

Whether it will hurt Ehrlich to be associated closely with the president is an open question.

When Jerry W. Kilgore (R) was running for governor in Virginia last year, some viewed the president's declining popularity, particularly in Northern Virginia, as a factor in Kilgore's loss.

Kilgore struggled visibly over how to handle appearances with Bush. Just weeks before the election, he declined to accompany Bush to an event in Norfolk, but the two appeared together on the eve on the election to try to turn out the Republican base.

Bush Helps Raise $1M For Md. Republicans (AP-Y2)

President Bush helped raise $1 million Wednesday to boost the effort to give a second term in the Maryland governor's office to a Republican for the first time in half a century.

Maryland's GOP governor, Robert Ehrlich, faces a difficult re-election battle in November. The first Republican elected governor of this traditionally Democratic state in 38 years, he has two potentially strong Democratic challengers: Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and Doug Duncan, county executive of Maryland's most populous county.

"Some people talk a good game," Bush said of Ehrlich before well-heeled supporters at a cocktail reception at an airport hotel. "This man has delivered."

The event raised $1 million for the state GOP.

DOJ_NMG_0030855

Notably absent was Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the Republican seeking the state's open U.S. Senate seat. With several Democrats vying to run against him, Republicans see the race as a good chance to pick off a Senate seat now held by Democrats. Five-term Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes (news, bio, voting record) is retiring.

Steele's campaign said he was in Las Vegas on Wednesday for a fundraiser that had been on his calendar for months.

As donors waited for Bush to speak, Ehrlich said the event and others like it are crucial to Maryland Republicans' hopes to turn the Democratic stronghold into a two-party state.

"It's about realignment," he said.

Clinton Opens State Campaign With Salvos At White House (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

BUFFALO, May 31 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton formally opened her Senate re-election campaign on Wednesday with a call to "take our country back" from the current Republican leadership, cataloging what she called the Bush administration's failures in a marquee appearance at the state Democratic convention that signaled how she might approach a presidential campaign.

Mrs. Clinton, virtually unchallenged within the party for her seat, accepted the nomination by first showing an 18-minute biographical film contending that as a senator, she has converted former skeptics into supporters. But in remarks that followed, Mrs. Clinton, who aides say is still deciding whether to run for president in 2008, quickly broadened her message into an argument for new leadership at the national level.

"I believe that we need a fundamentally new direction," Mrs. Clinton told several hundred convention delegates, who unanimously chose her as the party's Senate candidate.

"We are better than what is happening in America today," Mrs. Clinton continued.

She added that events like Hurricane Katrina's aftermath "show what happens when our leaders are not paying attention, when they're not making decisions based on the facts on the ground, when they just think they can get away with saying, 'You're doing a heck of a job.' " Her allusion was to President Bush's assessment of Michael D. Brown, who was the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency at the time of the hurricane..

Mrs. Clinton mentioned the war in Iraq — a contentious undercurrent throughout the Democratic gathering — just once. Rather than defend her decision to vote for authorizing the war, as she sometimes has in the past, Mrs. Clinton emphasized the need to rely on Iraqi security forces so American troops can come home.

Her comments came as the convention passed a resolution urging a troop withdrawal at the earliest practical date and as an antiwar activist, Jonathan Tasini, said he would seek the 15,000 signatures needed to enter a primary against Mrs. Clinton in September.

Heading into this election, Mrs. Clinton faces a divided Republican Party, whose delegates — holding their own convention Wednesday on Long Island — split their support between two candidates to challenge Mrs. Clinton, paving the way for a potentially bruising primary.

Mrs. Clinton's convention appearance, while predictable in political terms, held important symbolic meaning: Her advisers hope that a strong showing in New York, particularly in Republican upstate areas, will convince Democrats nationwide that she holds bipartisan appeal. In many ways her re-election campaign will be about beating expectations, or at least surpassing the 55 percent of the electorate she won in 2000.

That much was reflected in the biographical film that opened the event: Produced by the longtime Clinton media adviser Mandy Grunwald, it wove a narrative of Mrs. Clinton's short political life, starting with President Bush's prediction in July 2000 that her Republican opponent would win.

From there, it told of a larger-than-life senator (her husband, former President Bill Clinton, is among those interviewed) who has nonetheless paid attention to small, human tasks (like comforting an amazed Sept. 11 survivor in her hospital bed) and diligently worked across the aisle to get things done (another testimonial is from Maj. Gen. Thomas P. Maguire, the former adjutant general of New York and an ally of Gov. George E. Pataki, a Republican).

Still, it was Mrs. Clinton's speech after the film that captured her current political thinking and was sure to be interpreted in the context of speculation that she will run for president in the next campaign.

Iraq has been a vexing issue for Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats who voted for what has become an increasingly unpopular war. In her speech, Mrs. Clinton attacked the Bush administration for its "wrongheaded, short-sighted foreign policies" and made a pointed comment on the president's handling of the war.

"Stand with me as we push the Bush administration to take responsibility for the mistakes and misjudgments that they have made around the world," she said. "And stand with me as we put pressure on both the administration and the new Iraqi government to get behind a real plan for the Iraqis to assume a growing responsibility for their own security and safety, so that we can begin to bring our troops home."

Mr. Tasini, a former union official who acknowledged that his real purpose at the convention was to spur a debate on Iraq rather than to defeat Mrs. Clinton, said he was unsatisfied by her remarks about the war. "I don't think that's dramatically different than the administration's position," he said.

At times, Mrs. Clinton sounded determined to distinguish her views more forcefully. She repeated "I believe" at least a half-dozen times. "I believe in the chance for every person to pursue his or her dreams," she said. "I believe in the dignity of work that is fairly compensated."

At another point, she said: "I believe in a government that makes decisions based on facts — and, sadly, that seems to be an unusual idea in Washington these days."

Later, she repeated "Stand with me," or "Stand against" or "Stand up for" over and over. It was a rhetorical device that seemed destined for the campaign trail and was, her aides said, reminiscent of language she used in 2000.

She drew strong, if not passionate, applause from a crowd that chanted "Hil-la-ry" when she arrived. Her husband sat up front, watching her with a smile. When she pointed him out, praising him as an inspiration and a mentor, a friend and a partner, the audience cheered and rose for a standing ovation. Mr. Clinton joined her onstage for an embrace at the end, before the obligatory balloon drop that signaled a campaign under way. (Their daughter, Chelsea, had hoped to attend but was kept away by work, a Clinton official said.)

Dressed in an electric-blue pants suit, Mrs. Clinton stood out against the backdrop of the other New York Democrats nominated during the convention, some of whom seemed aware they were in the shadow of her celebrity. Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi joked during his uncontested nomination that he was "one of the opening acts"; Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, alongside Mrs. Clinton as she was mobbed by supporters after a breakfast, eventually wandered away from the preoccupied crowd.

Only Mr. Clinton could keep up: Even after Mrs. Clinton had fled the hotel ballroom, he lingered in a throng of reporters to answer questions, mostly about his wife. When aides tried to end the session, he kept talking, until finally, perhaps realizing he was the only politician left in the room, he turned to go.

Clinton Kicks Off Re-election Bid In N.Y. (AP-Y2)

By Marc Humbert

AP2, May 31, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, unanimously endorsed at her party's convention for a second term, repeatedly bashed the Bush administration Wednesday as she told cheering Democrats that the country needs "a fundamentally new direction."

Republican delegates, meanwhile, split their votes between two challengers poised for a bitter primary fight.

Clinton, kicking off her re-election bid while continuing to avoid talk of a 2008 presidential run, said that for the Bush administration "it is more important to say `mission accomplished' than actually accomplishing the mission."

"With hard work, we will take our country back," Clinton told the more than 400 delegates to the Democratic state convention who made her their official designee for the party's Senate nomination.

Former President Clinton was in the audience but didn't speak. He got a standing ovation when the former first lady singled him out as "an inspiration, a mentor, a partner." They hugged briefly when he joined her on stage following her speech, which was preceded by an 18-minute video praising her work in the Senate.

Clinton and Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who is campaigning to replace outgoing GOP Gov. George Pataki, are polling well ahead of their competition.

At the Republican convention on Long Island, delegates chose former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer as their official Senate nominee.

"We have the issues on our side. We are Republicans," Spencer said. "They (Democrats) do not have the issues on their side."

Spencer won 63 percent of the weighted delegate vote, but Kathleen Troia "KT" McFarland, a former Reagan-era Pentagon official, was able to secure 36.5 percent of the vote — enough to guarantee her a spot on the Sept. 12 primary ballot.

Clinton faces a possible Democratic primary in September from anti-Iraq-war activist Jonathan Tasini.

He would have won an automatic spot on the primary ballot with 25 percent of the convention vote, but delegates did not even place his name in nomination. He'll need signatures from at least 15,000 Democrats to force a primary.

Hillary Clinton Kicks Off US Senate Re-election Campaign (AFP-Y2)

AFP, May 31, 2006

Former first lady Hillary Clinton, viewed by many as the Democrats' best prospect for reclaiming the White House in 2008, kicked off her campaign for a second term in the US Senate.

At an event in the economically depressed city of Buffalo in northern New York, the former first lady said she was "honored" to accept the nomination for the November 2006 election.

While she trumpeted her accomplishments as a legislator at the end of her first six-year term, Clinton also took swipes at the Republican administration that she has criticized for undoing much of what her husband, former president Bill Clinton, achieved in eight years in the White House.

"We all need to stand up and demand new leadership that will once again put our country back on the right track," said the former first lady said, who is considered an early front-runner for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

"I believe that we need a fundamentally new direction, and we need to work toward solutions that help us meet our 21st-century challenges of expanding our economy, defending our security and preserving our values," she said.

"Stand with me against the wrong-headed, short-sighted foreign policies of this administration. Let's start building alliances instead of alienation around the world. Let's win back the respect that the people of the world should have for our country," the US lawmaker said.

Clinton has denied that she is seeking to use her Senate re-election bid as a dress rehearsal for the White House race.

Still, she is seen by many political observers as the only credible Democratic candidate with a big enough war chest and sufficient star power to win the US presidential race.

However, Clinton also is seen as a divisive figures who would have to overcome strong Republican opposition to win election to the top US political office.

Hillary Accepts Call To Run Again (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton officially started her re-election campaign yesterday, accepting the Democratic nomination for her New York seat with a promise of fighting for energy independence and fair wages while avoiding questions on her front-runner status if she chooses to seek the presidency in 2008.

"I know you took a chance on me back in 2000, and I have worked every day to earn your trust," the former first lady told the crowd at the New York Democratic convention in Buffalo.

Mrs. Clinton, 58, leads other possible Democratic presidential candidates by double digits, and many political insiders think she will capture her party's nomination easily. But she keeps the focus on the fall, talking about local issues to help boost the state Democratic ticket and acting as a national leader helping to win back the party's congressional majority.

Her acceptance speech included hints of her higher ambitions, however, as the senator asked New Yorkers to "stand with me" as she works to create well-paying jobs and to fund research for alternative energy. She also touched on economic and foreign policy and said: "We all need to stand up and demand new leadership that will once again put our country back on the right track."

Taking jabs at the "uncompromising" and "wrongheaded" Bush administration and Republicans who control Congress, the senator said the president is fiscally irresponsible, and called the response to Hurricane Katrina a "disgrace." She did not, however, mention some of the hot-button issues before Congress, including the recent immigration bill or an upcoming vote to define marriage as the union of a man and woman.

She touted her recently announced energy plan that, among other things, requires oil companies put a share of their profits toward alternative energy. She touched upon the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that struck New York just months after she had been sworn in, and praised the "united" spirit in the aftermath.

Mrs. Clinton asked convention participants to "stand for our troops" by making sure they have the body armor and other equipment needed for combat. The senator, who voted for the Iraq war, said Democrats must pressure the Bush administration and the Iraqi government to assume responsibility for their own safety, "so that we can begin to bring our troops home."

Anti-war candidate Jonathan Tasini plans a petition drive to get on the September ballot to challenge Mrs. Clinton for the nomination.

Mr. Tasini called Mrs. Clinton a "mediocre" lawmaker and sharply criticized her support for the war, saying her comments on bringing the troops home "had no meaning at all."

Still, he knows he is embarking on a very difficult campaign.

"I'm facing someone who has 99 percent name recognition and $25 million in the bank," he said.

Mrs. Clinton most likely will be the candidate to face former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer, a Republican, in November. Despite the competition, she is expected to cruise to re-election without spending much of her $20 million in campaign funding. She can use all of that money, up to date as of March 31, for a presidential bid, should she decide to pursue moving back to the White House in two years.

Pataki Courts Friends, Supporters In Iowa (AP-Y2)

By Mike Glover

AP2, May 31, 2006

New York Gov. George Pataki strolled through a teeming farmers market in Iowa, chewing on a giant radish and pressing the flesh with a few thousand people he'd like to be his closest friends.

"I grew up on a farm, so you learned to eat everything raw," said the Republican, a potential presidential candidate in 2008.

"I know you, I'm a transplanted New Yorker," gushed Isabel Osius. "I guess I don't have to ask why you're here."

Within the hour, Pataki had donned dark robes and was delivering the commencement speech to medical graduates at Des Moines University, the multitasking required for a White House hopeful 19 months before Iowa caucus-goers vote.

Pataki seems like an unlikely sell in Iowa — a Northeast moderate who backs abortion and gay rights and gun control — but the three-term governor has focused on the handshaking-backslapping-local fundraising required to win over voters in a less populated, rural state.

"He's a good retail politician," said former Iowa Republican Chairman Michael Mahaffey. "Part of the reason he connects is he comes from an area that is more like Iowa than you think. There's a lot of New York that is not like New York City."

Pataki has been to Iowa four times since the National Governors Association meeting last summer.

"I love grassroots politics," Pataki said. "I still remember what it was like to run for mayor of Peekskill." That was his first political job.

His recent Memorial Day weekend swing through Iowa was a prime example. On Friday, Pataki stopped in five small towns raising money for local state lawmakers and county political operations, as well as establishing ties to local activists.

"He has definitely been a player," said Tim Albrecht, a GOP legislative staffer working on the midterm elections where Republicans are clinging to a 51-49 margin in the Iowa House. "He has been helpful in that regard and we expect him to continue. He's doing all the right things."

During his swings, Pataki has paid close attention to the political details. Republican Jeff Lamberti, the president of the state Senate, is trying to oust Democratic Rep. Leonard Boswell (news, bio, voting record) in central Iowa's 3rd District.

Meeting with Pataki recently, Lamberti asked him if he'd mind doing a fundraiser to help his congressional campaign.

"He said sure," chuckled Lamberti. "But he said 'People in Iowa know they can see me for free so my ability to raise money here is limited. Why don't we do a fundraiser for you in New York?'"

The event is scheduled for next month.

Pataki does not have the obvious links to the state's influential social and religious conservatives, then again there's already plenty of competition for that group among other GOP hopefuls.

Many conservatives are quietly watching and waiting to assess Pataki, whom they admit to not knowing very well.

"We'll sit down with him at some point and we'll ask him the questions," said Steve Scheffler, head of the Iowa Christian Alliance. "Then we'll go from there."

Sounding a warning, Scheffler said social and religious conservative are a large enough force that candidates can't expect their vote to be diluted by being spread among several candidates.

"He certainly is going to have to get a chunk out of this constituency if he's going to do well," Scheffler said.

Pataki's aggressive early campaigning could pay off in a wide open primary with no early front-runner, Mahaffey said.

"We have a tendency in the Republican Party to anoint candidates," Mahaffey said. "There is no anointed candidate this time."

Hillary's Challengers (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, May 31, 2006

May 31, 2006 - Maybe Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut has no chance to win the presidency. Or maybe he does. In any case, the mere fact that he called me the other day to remind me that he is running tells me something: that most of the Democratic Party's savviest veterans—elected officials in their Capitol Hill suites, Hollywood machers tooling along the Santa Monica Freeway in their Priuses, the New York soft-money crowd eating their egg-white omelets at the Regency in Manhattan—are convinced that Hillary Can't Win.

We are in the earliest, weirdly neurotic and theoretical phase of the '08 race, when insiders (and would-be candidates) in both political parties try to assess whether the putative, on-paper front runners really can do the job. But the fever is more intense on the Democratic side.

There are plenty of Republican insiders who don't like Sen. John McCain for one reason or another, but I don't hear many say that McCain can't beat whomever the Dems put up against him.

Among Democrats, however, the opposite equation holds true: no one doubts Hillary Clinton can win the nomination; not many think she can beat the GOP's candidate, especially if it is McCain.

Among the ardent Democrats I've talked with in recent days who insist on this are: a megamillionaire entrepreneur from Boston, an academic from Harvard, a show-biz big wig from New York, an industrial-union leader from Washington and—though he doesn't say it in so many words, Dodd.

The Buzz Factor

When he did a count on May 7, Charlie Cook of the Cook Political Report listed 10 Democrats as possible challengers to Clinton—former vice president Al Gore among them. Dodd makes it 11. He told me that he would spend between now and the end of the year doing the first and most indispensable thing that any would-be contender needs to do: seeing if he can raise money.

In presidential politics there are a series of concentric elections until the final one (in the Supreme Court…). Money comes just after—and in conjunction with—the creation of buzz.

Can Dodd create any?

Unless you live in Connecticut, or followed the insider mechanics of the 1996 Clinton re-election race (when Dodd served an unhappy year as party chairman) you probably have no idea who he is. Let me tell you, briefly.

DOJ_NMG_0030860

At 62, with snowy white hair, Dodd is a lifer in politics and government, an insider's insider—very highly regarded within the visible and invisible club of the Senate. He retains a boyish enthusiasm for the old-school arts of bipartisan legislating and serious debate. The guy tends to know what he is talking about.

The Dodd DNA

Politics is a family business. In a way—though he doesn't say so—Dodd's career is about redeeming the Dodd family name in that business. His late father was a senator. A world away—in 1967—Thomas Dodd of Connecticut was censured by the Senate. Three years later, he ran as an independent and lost. His son managed the campaign.

Chris Dodd was elected to the House in 1974—the "post-Watergate" year that swept in dozens of reform-minded Democrats. (Bill Clinton was trying to be one of them down in Arkansas, but didn't make it.) Dodd was elected to the Senate in 1980.

"Legislative accomplishments" don't translate well into a presidential run—one reason why senators rarely move on to the White House—but Dodd has more than most. Perhaps the best known is the Family and Medical Leave Act, landmark social legislation of the Clinton years.

Dodd is a mix of unassuming and worldly, the product of Providence College (a font of prominent Irish Democrats) and the Peace Corps, which took him to the Dominican Republic. He speaks fluent Spanish, is a moderate on defense and pretty much of a social liberal.

There was a time, after a divorce, when Dodd seemed an affable but somewhat lost soul: a man of obvious talent destined for something, but no one was sure quite what. But he remarried a few years ago and is now the proud dad of two little girls, whose ages he still measures in quarter years and months.

He knows the litany of why he can't win: he's a senator, an insider, has no money, is from the Northeast (liberal New England, no less). He's the product of, and thrives in a pre-Internet world where deals are done and votes are won in person, face to face, handshake to handshake, across party lines. Definitely old school.

But Dodd's argument is that, in an uncertain world, and one divided by Red and Blue, voters are ready for someone who can make politics work by bridging gaps, talking turkey and doing deals. "I think I've demonstrated an ability to bring people together," he said. "People are yearning for a sense of confidence in the country's future," he said. "Bringing people together is the way to do it."

And though he doesn't say so, the subtext is clear: I can do something that Hillary can't.

Contract With Pennsylvania (WSJ)

By Mike Folmer

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

LEBANON, Pa. -- The Republican primary of 2006 in this state has been called a "political massacre," an "earthquake" and "payback." It has been discussed in media outlets across the country and across the political spectrum. Now, more than two weeks have elapsed since May 16, and pundits, editorial writers and political analysts are still trying to figure out what led to the defeat of 16 incumbent state legislators -- including Pennsylvania's top two state Senate Republicans -- at the hands of underfunded, and in several cases -- including mine -- unknown challengers.

Many, including some of those incumbents who lost, are crediting (or blaming) the huge pay raise of July 2005, which approved increases of up to 54% for elected officials and was passed under the cover of darkness by a Republican-controlled Legislature at the behest of a liberal Democratic governor, Ed Rendell. Some take a more philosophical approach, attributing the dramatic political shift to a general disdain for Harrisburg; others think it was due to a need for the people to take back control of the government from ineffective politicians.

My personal experiences working the campaign trail this past spring made it apparent to me that the political upheaval was due to a coalescing of two fundamental perspectives held by the rank-and-file: Government needed to be reformed; and the state Republican Party needed to be reformed, too.

Conservatives had long been chafing at the fact that an ostensibly conservative Legislature had linked arms with Mr. Rendell to raise income taxes, push up state spending to record levels, and expand both corporate- and social-welfare spending without any apparent means of accountability -- while a comprehensive property tax reform package continued to stall in the Legislature.

These people at the grassroots no longer viewed the state Legislature as a servant of the people but as an exclusive club for political insiders. They fumed as the legislators voted to increase their own pensions by 50%, in addition to excessive daily allowances just to show up for work, and at the practice of allowing members to take expensive junkets to resort locations.

It was as if the Republican Party leadership in the state capitol had forgotten everything they'd been taught by Ronald Reagan -- that the core values of the Republican Party were lower taxes, less spending and limited government.

Then came the notorious pay raise, and the camel's back was broken.

The pay raise particularly stung Republicans, for it was their political party that was in charge of the Legislature when this blatant violation of the state Constitution (and common sense) was rammed through. These Republicans, I came to understand, felt the time had come to clean their own house.

A critical part of such housecleaning requires viable candidates who are willing and able to challenge incumbent legislators, and who inspire passionate support among the voters. Conservative Republicans are not stupid; if they don't like the choices presented, they will stay home.

Rank-and-file conservatives do not gravitate toward candidates simply because they are not "the other guy." While the pay raise energized voters and gave them a reason to consider other options, it was the duty of the challengers to explain why they were better choices than the incumbents. It is my conviction that Republican voters were just as desirous of a positive vision that they could embrace -- a vision that demanded accountability and reform at the state level -- as they were to remove those incumbents who had failed to uphold the traditional ideals of their party.

And that is why "The Promise to Pennsylvania" was so important. The Promise -- drafted by my campaign and that of three other candidates -- codified the elemental Republican principles of lower taxes and less government and sketched out how these principles should be applied at the state level. For all intents and purposes, it was a Contract With America -- for Pennsylvania.

The Promise gave Republican voters an opportunity to re-evaluate exactly what it was they believed in. Did they want to continue down the path of higher taxes and growing government, or did they want to see real tax reform and constraints on spending?

For the many Republican reformers who won their respective primaries, the Promise holds the key for eventual victory in the fall. It is a standard around which other Republicans can rally, clearly outlining an agenda for the next legislative session and defining the critical, core issues for the party.

It is also my conviction that while the leadership of the Republican Party is still trying to figure out how it will deal with the fallout from May 16, it is imperative that the GOP come together in time for the Nov. 7 election. There are critical races to win -- most notably Rick Santorum's fight to beat back state treasurer Bob Casey Jr. and keep his U.S. Senate seat, and Lynn Swann's campaign to upend Ed Rendell and become Pennsylvania's first black governor.

I was a reluctant candidate. Family and friends urged me to consider public office, but it was only after much thought and consideration and prayer that I agreed. One factor that appealed greatly to me was the vision the Founders had of a citizen-legislature -- of a body consisting of ordinary folks who would fulfill their civic duty for a period of time and then step aside to allow others to do theirs. We've gotten away from that; but public service is not something reserved only for the rich or popular or well-connected. (I was outspent nearly 20 to 1 in my primary campaign against the state Senate majority leader.)

But the most important factor was that ideas matter. I have confidence that the Pennsylvania Republican Party can move forward victoriously not only this coming fall but in future elections. Yet in order to do so, it is imperative that we do not forget the principles that made the Republican Party great.

In many ways, then, the Pennsylvania situation mirrors that of the country as a whole.

Mr. Folmer, a tire salesman, is a Republican candidate for the Pennsylvania Senate.

Texas Governor Signs Property Tax Cuts (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

DOJ_NMG_0030862

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, signed legislation cutting property taxes by almost $16 billion over the next two years and granting public school teachers a $2,000 raise. The legislation was passed in a special session to bring the Texas public school system into compliance with a State Supreme Court order. The one-third reduction in property tax revenue would be offset by a new, higher levy on business, a $1 per-pack increase in cigarette taxes and a portion of the state's $8 billion treasury surplus. The legislation also provides increased per-pupil aid to school districts and bonuses for teachers whose students demonstrate improvement.

Bush Bows To Pressure And Offers Iran Talks (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

The Bush administration bowed to pressure on Wednesday and said it was ready to join European allies in talks with Iran – on condition that Tehran first suspended its nuclear fuel programme.

Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, revealed the policy change before leaving for Vienna for talks on Thursday with Russia and China – which have resisted proposed sanctions against Iran – as well as France, Germany and the UK. She said: "It's time to know whether Iran is serious about negotiation or not."

Iran offered no immediate official response. Tehran previously signalled its willingness to talk directly to the US while insisting that it would not stop enriching uranium. Iran's government denies that it has a secret nuclear weapons programme.

Diplomats said the Vienna talks would seek to agree a package of incentives to put to Iran, as well as an "understanding" of punitive consequences should it refuse to comply.

She stressed that Iran must first "fully and verifiably suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities" before the US would join the talks. The threat of military action remained on the table, she said.

The Bush administration has come under intense pressure from Congress, prominent Republicans and European allies to open a dialogue with Iran. The reversal is the latest sign that Washington is ready to adopt a more pragmatic approach to preserve a broad international front.

President George W. Bush said the US would take a "leadership position" in seeking a diplomatic outcome. The price of oil fell by nearly $2 a barrel on the news.

A senior administration official said the US believed it had the support of both China and Russia to seek UN sanctions should Iran choose not to negotiate, or negotiate in poor faith. "We would return to the Security Council and get a resolution, and Condi will finalise the agreements [in Vienna] on a list of sanctions that would be part of that resolution," he said.

The US stressed that Iran must "fully and verifiably suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities" before the US would join talks. The threat of military action remained, Ms Rice said.

The US offer carried added significance since Washington proposed discussing the whole range of its differences with Iran, including the issue of Iraq and Tehran's support of "terrorist" groups. Ms Rice denied that the US was seeking a "grand bargain" with Tehran that would lead to diplomatic relations.

Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, said: "This important statement by the US administration reinforces our hope that out of the current discussions we will be able to establish a new and co-operative relationship with Iran."

The US broke off direct talks with Iran three years ago, when Washington accused Tehran of allowing al-Qaeda operatives on its territory to plan attacks in Saudi Arabia.

Neoconservatives in the US reacted with dismay, seeing the move as a betrayal of Mr Bush's "freedom agenda".

"It is a terrible idea," commented Danielle Pletka of the American Enterprise Institute. "It incentivises everyone in the world to blackmail the US." The US and UK appear to have backed down under pressure from China, which wanted incentives put to Iran before moving to a United Nations Security Council resolution.

European diplomats urged Iran against a knee-jerk reaction. "Their instinct would be to reject out of hand but that would be a mistake" a senior official said.

WASHINGTON, May 31 — After 27 years in which the United States has refused substantive talks with Iran, President Bush reversed course on Wednesday because it was made clear to him — by his allies, by the Russians, by the Chinese, and eventually by some of his advisers — that he no longer had a choice.

During the past month, according to European officials and some current and former members of the Bush administration, it became obvious to Mr. Bush that he could not hope to hold together a fractious coalition of nations to enforce sanctions — or consider military strikes on Iranian nuclear sites — unless he first showed a willingness to engage Iran's leadership directly over its nuclear program and exhaust every nonmilitary option.

Few of his aides expect that Iran's leaders will meet Mr. Bush's main condition: that Iran first re-suspend all of its nuclear activities, including shutting down every centrifuge that could add to its small stockpile of enriched uranium. Administration officials characterized their offer as a test of whether the Iranians want engagement with the West more than they want the option to build a nuclear bomb some day.

And while the Europeans and the Japanese said they were elated by Mr. Bush's turnaround, some participants in the drawn-out nuclear drama questioned whether this was an offer intended to fail, devised to show the extent of Iran's intransigence.

Either way, after five years of behind-the-scenes battling within the administration, Mr. Bush finally came to a crossroads at which both sides in the debate over Iran — engagers and isolaters, and some with a foot in each camp — saw an advantage in, as one senior aide said, "seeing if they are serious."

Mr. Bush, according to one participant in those debates, told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice several months ago that he needed "a third option," a way to get beyond either a nuclear Iran or an American military action.

Ms. Rice spent a long weekend in early May drafting a proposal that included a timetable for diplomatic choreography through the summer.

"Nobody wants to get to that kind of crisis situation — whether it is us or the next administration — where you either accept an Iranian weapon or you are forced to do something drastic," said the participant, who declined to speak on the record about internal White House deliberations.

The idea of engagement is hardly new. When Colin L. Powell was secretary of state, several members of his senior staff argued vociferously that the United States needed to test Iran's willingness to deal with the United States — especially in the aftermath of Sept. 11.

There was strong opposition from the White House, particularly from Vice President Dick Cheney, according to several former officials.

"Cheney was dead set against it," said one former official who sat in many of those meetings. "At its heart, this was an argument about whether you could isolate the Iranians enough to force some kind of regime change." But three officials who were involved in the most recent iteration of that debate said Mr. Cheney and others stepped aside — perhaps because they read Mr. Bush's body language, or perhaps because they believed Iran would scuttle the effort by insisting that the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty gives it the right to develop nuclear fuel. The United States insists that Iran gave up that right by deceiving inspectors for 18 years.

In the end, said one former official who has kept close tabs on the debate, "it came down to convincing Cheney and others that if we are going to confront Iran, we first have to check off the box" of trying talks.

Mr. Bush offered a more positive-sounding account: "I thought it was important for the United States to take the lead, along with our partners, and that's what you're seeing. You're seeing robust diplomacy."

As part of the diplomatic timetable, Ms. Rice will be in Vienna on Thursday to endorse an international offer to Iran that includes several plums. Among them will be the dialogue with Washington that Iran has periodically sought, a lifting of many long-standing economic sanctions, and even light water reactors for nuclear power with Russia and the West controlling access to the fuel.

Yet skepticism abounds. "It's true that the conditions are significantly different than they were four or five years ago, but candidly they are not as favorable now for the United States," said Richard Haass, who as the head of the State Department's policy planning operation during Mr. Bush's first term was a major advocate of engagement with Iran.

First, the new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinijad, "has vowed that the country will never back down on enriching uranium.

"Oil's at $70 a barrel instead of $20, said Mr. Haass, now the president of the Council on Foreign Relations. "And we are bogged down in Iraq," where the United States is vulnerable to Iranian efforts to worsen the violence and arm the insurgents.

But the internal debates in the White House included vigorous discussion of the risks associated with any effort to negotiate with foes suspected of seeking nuclear weapons. And in this, Mr. Bush already has bitter experience.

In its dealings with North Korea, which Mr. Bush branded a member of the "axis of evil" along with Iran and Iraq, the administration also decided a few years ago to try limited engagement, locked arm-in-arm with neighboring nations.

But North Korea has kept making weapons fuel, and the allies have not stayed united: China and South Korea continue to aid the North. The Iranians have doubtless noticed.

The question now is whether there is any middle ground between Mr. Bush's demand that Iran give up everything, and Iran's insistence that it will give up nothing. Without breaking that logjam, the American-Iranian dialogue may never begin.

Shift In U.S. Stance Shows Power Of Seven-Letter Word (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The Bush administration's decision to consider sitting down with the Iranian government underscores a central truth of diplomacy today: Nuclear weapons buy leverage.

For six years, President Bush and his aides have dismissed the idea of talking with Iran about its nuclear programs, and until last year gave little support to European efforts to restrain Iranian nuclear activity. Attempts by former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami, a moderate, to foster a dialogue were rejected, and even back-channel moves failed to gain traction.

Now, in perhaps the biggest foreign policy shift of his presidency, Bush has approved the idea of sitting down at the table with the Iranian government -- one headed by a former student radical who denies the Holocaust. Attached to the U.S. offer was a stern condition: a verified suspension of Iran's nuclear enrichment operations. But the offer overturned a long-standing taboo, and it came from an administration stocked with officials who have made little secret of their desire to overthrow the government in Tehran.

The administration made this move at a moment of weakness. The president's public opinion ratings are among the lowest ever recorded for a modern president, and oil prices have reached record levels, in part because of the confrontation with Iran. The high price of oil, in turn, has enriched the Iranian treasury.

Iran recently announced it had learned how to achieve a key aspect of enriching uranium -- sooner than expected -- raising the stakes in the confrontation. Even so, the lingering fallout from the administration's decision to attack Iraq has made it increasingly difficult to win the support for sanctions on Iran from critical nations such as Russia and China.

A key factor in Bush's decision yesterday is the influence of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who announced the offer in a televised news conference. Since becoming secretary of state last year, Rice has worked assiduously to make certain that the United States does not maneuver itself into becoming the world's enemy No. 1, as it did on the Iraq war.

When Rice made her first trip overseas as secretary last year, to Europe, she had expected to hear a lot of concern about Iraq. Instead, she later said, she was surprised to learn that the confrontation over Iran's nuclear program was a bigger concern -- and that the United States was considered the problem.

She very quickly won Bush's approval for a public shift in policy: active support of the European negotiating track. The support included withdrawing the U.S. objection to Iran's application to the World Trade Organization and allowing Iran the potential to purchase civilian aviation spare parts.

At the time, Rice insisted that the decision to support the Europeans did not mean the Americans would join the talks. (Lower-level U.S. officials on occasion have talked to Iranian counterparts about Afghanistan and Iraq.)

"We've made very clear that we have a lot of other problems with the Iranians," Rice said when she announced the decision in March 2005. "We've also made very clear that we don't intend to do anything to legitimize the Iranian regime. And so what we're looking at here is helping the Europeans in their diplomacy, not shifting policy toward Iran."

But the Iranians walked away from those talks, and the administration slowly found itself drawn into a different stance as the diplomacy unfolded. Rice needed to win over the Russians and Chinese -- and keep the Europeans in line -- so she quietly dropped the objections to the Iranian desire for nuclear power. Previously, the administration had insisted Iran had no need for nuclear power because of its vast oil and gas reserves. But to placate other nations, U.S. officials retreated from that insistence.

"The Iranian people believe they have a right to civil nuclear energy," Rice said yesterday. "We acknowledge that right."

Over the past two months Bush and Rice, along with Vice President Cheney and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, have considered the question of whether the time was right for the United States to sit at the talks. Once Bush received assurances earlier this week from leaders of China, Russia and other nations that if this offer were rejected they would accept a harder line against Iran, U.S. officials decided to go forward with the plan.

Rice said yesterday that she advocated this decision in part because of echoes of the concerns that she heard on her first trip -- that the United States was not serious about resolving this issue with diplomacy.

Conservatives in the administration have chafed at the shifts, suggesting it shows weakness on the part of the United States because Iran apparently has been able to make significant progress in nuclear energy -- with little apparent consequence.

Rice made this new move just as it appeared the European effort was on the verge of collapsing through division and lack of leadership. The Germans, eager to strike a deal with Iran, have been the most adamant that the United States needed to join the talks.

"If this is what it takes to get Russia and China to join in sanctions, so be it," one administration skeptic said. "But I am most concerned that we will end up renegotiating with ourselves again."

U.S. Agrees To Talks With Iran If It Suspends Uranium Enrichment (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, May 31, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United States will join negotiations with arch-foe Iran if it immediately suspends uranium-enrichment work, which could be used for nuclear weapons, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Wednesday in a dramatic turn in policy.

The shift is aimed at testing Iran's willingness to embrace a diplomatic resolution to the crisis over its nuclear program and Russian and Chinese readiness to support punitive sanctions if the Islamic regime balks.

The Bush administration previously had refused pleas from Britain, France and Germany to participate in talks with Iran, which President Bush in 2002 included in an "axis of evil," along with Iraq and North Korea.

Rice told a briefing that "as soon as Iran fully and verifiably suspends its enrichment and reprocessing activities," the United States will join the three European countries, known as the EU-3, in direct talks with Iran on the future of its nuclear program.

The offer is part of a package of proposals to Iran that Rice and her European, Russian and Chinese counterparts hope to finalize Thursday in Vienna, Austria.

"The Iranian regime must persuasively demonstrate that it has permanently abandoned its quest for nuclear weapons," Rice said. She also said the United States acknowledged that Iran had a right to civilian nuclear energy.

There was no immediate official response from Tehran, where Rice's message was transmitted by the Swiss, who act as intermediaries between the United States and Iran, which have no diplomatic relations.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, called his Iranian counterpart, Javad Zarif, shortly before Rice spoke to tell him about her announcement. Bolton's spokesman, Richard Grenell, said the two men had never talked before.

Iranian officials have floated conditional offers of talks with Washington in recent weeks.

Some senior members of Bush's national security team, including Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, are thought to oppose any talks with Iran and to favor taking steps to undermine or overthrow the Tehran regime.

But the White House has been under pressure for months from Europe, lawmakers of both parties and former top diplomats from Republican and Democratic administrations to drop its refusal to talk to Iran.

European diplomats argued privately that negotiations with Iran on ending what European and American officials believe is a covert nuclear-weapons program would never succeed without direct U.S. involvement.

"My decision today says that the United States is going to take a leadership position in solving this issue," Bush said after Rice's announcement.

Iran says its enrichment program is strictly to produce low-enriched uranium for civilian power reactors, not highly enriched uranium for weapons.

The American offer appeared to contain a second significant concession: dropping a previous demand that Iran permanently abandon all enrichment work because it concealed its program from U.N. inspectors for 18 years.

A U.S. official who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue said it could take Iran up to eight years to meet all the conditions set for ensuring that it wasn't pursuing nuclear weapons and to win acceptance of its right to resume producing low-enriched uranium.

"If they can prove to the satisfaction of . . . the international community and the IAEA (the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency) that they are not developing nuclear weapons, we can imagine Iran resuming pursuit of the (nuclear reactor) fuel cycle," he said.

Rice said the United States, Britain, Germany and France had agreed on the "essential elements" of the package to be discussed in Vienna.

They want a suspension of Iran's uranium-enrichment program and full disclosure of key details of the program, including purchases of weapons-related know-how from an international smuggling ring. Tehran also would have to allow the IAEA to resume snap inspections of its nuclear facilities.

If it agreed, it would be offered economic and political rewards, including sales of advanced light-water power reactors to meet its growing energy needs and access to a five-year supply of low-enriched uranium fuel overseen by the IAEA, U.S. and European officials have said.

If Tehran rejects the demands, sanctions would include restrictions on new foreign investment in Iran and a ban on sales of civilian technology that the country could use in its nuclear and ballistic-missile programs, U.S. and European officials have said.

Rice's announcement was widely welcomed in Europe and Asia. Israel also endorsed it.

A senior administration official, who briefed reporters on condition of anonymity, said Bush had approved the change in tactics Wednesday morning after receiving assurances from world leaders that they'd back sanctions if the outreach failed.

The official said the shift was made because of recent overtures from Iran signaling a willingness to negotiate, a desire to build support for sanctions as a fallback and concerns that delaying action would only make it harder to roll back Iran's nuclear program.

Samuel R. Berger, who was national security adviser in the Clinton administration and who advocated talks with Iran, said they were necessary to test whether a diplomatic solution was possible, they'd help get backing for tough measures if those proved necessary and that they'd show the Iranian people that it was their government that stood between them and the outside world.

Russia is resisting a proposed arms-sale embargo on Iran, the U.S. official said. Russia, Iran's main foreign arms supplier, has agreed to sell 29 sophisticated Tor-M1 antiaircraft missile units in a deal worth $800 million.

In Congress, lawmakers generally supported the administration's decision.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said he cautiously endorsed the new discussion. "All options must be on the table if they fail to respond to the administration's overture," he said.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., urged Bush to broaden the discussion beyond Iran's nuclear program. "We should be willing to talk about all the issues that divide us: the nuclear program, terrorism, Iraq, Afghanistan, Israeli-Palestinian peace, sanctions and security," he said.

U.S. Offers To Talk To Iran (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

The United States offered yesterday to participate in multilateral talks with Iran on its nuclear program if it suspends uranium enrichment, a policy shift that could result in Washington's first direct contact with Tehran in 27 years.

In Tehran, the official Iranian news agency called the U.S. offer "a propaganda move." Iran accepts only proposals and conditions in the nation's interest, the agency said, and "halting enrichment definitely doesn't meet such interests."

The Bush administration ruled out establishing diplomatic relations with Iran at any time soon, saying the proposal was meant only to "enhance" the prospect of peacefully resolving the nuclear dispute.

"We are not talking here about what some have characterized as a grand bargain," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters. "We are not in a position to talk about full diplomatic relations with a state with which we have so many fundamental differences."

The United States broke ties with Iran after the 1979 Islamic Revolution and has blacklisted the regime in Tehran as a state sponsor of terrorism.

The U.S. offer comes as the United States and its European Union partners Britain, France and Germany -- also known as the EU-3 --complete work on a package of carrots and sticks intended to entice Iran to give up its nuclear ambitions.

"To underscore our commitment to a diplomatic solution and to enhance the prospects for success, as soon as Iran fully and verifiably suspends its enrichment and reprocessing activities, the United States will come to the table with our EU-3 colleagues and meet with Iran's representatives," Miss Rice said.

The administration dropped its long-standing refusal to talks with Iran --which it repeated as recently as last week --under increasing pressure from Republican members of Congress, former government officials and European allies.

In the end, Miss Rice, who had been saying that talks with Iran are not necessary because it knows what it needs to do, came to the conclusion that negotiations without the United States would not be effective, officials said.

"There have been those who have said, 'Well, if only the negotiations had the potential for the United States to be a part of them, perhaps then Iran would respond.' So now we have a pretty clear path," the secretary said.

The Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA) said, "Given the insistence by Iranian authorities on continuing uranium enrichment, Rice's comments can be considered a propaganda move."

At the United Nations, Russia and China's U.N. ambassadors praised the U.S. offer of direct talks but Beijing's envoy urged Washington not to put any conditions on its proposal.

Chinese U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya also urged the Western powers drafting a package of incentives and disincentives to entice Iran into suspending its nuclear program to include security guarantees for Tehran in the package, a "carrot" the United States opposes.

Mr. Wang said Tehran must be allowed to keep pursuing enrichment research, in hopes of eventually producing electric power. So far, the United States as well as Britain, France and Germany have flatly opposed letting Iran pursue enrichment research on its soil.

Both Mr. Wang and Russian U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said it was too soon to speculate on how the U.S. policy shift would affect deliberations on Iran in the U.N. Security Council.

In Tokyo, Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso expressed support for the U.S. offer to conditionally join direct multilateral talks with Iran.

"Since it is essential for the international society as a whole to address the Iranian nuclear issue in a resolute manner, Japan is determined to continue playing a fair role in close consultation with the parties concerned," he said.

President Bush, warning Iran bluntly that it "won't have" a nuclear weapon, described the weeks-long effort of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council to agree on a package as "robust diplomacy."

"I thought it was important for the United States to take the lead, along with our partners," he said in reference to yesterday's announcement. "I believe this problem can be solved diplomatically, and I'm going to give it every effort to do so."

Miss Rice, however, refused to rule out the military option in dealing with Iran even temporarily, as the Europeans have done. U.S. officials said she was aware that some members of the administration still oppose the decision to talk to Tehran.

"We're also prepared if Iran doesn't change course," a senior State Department official said. "This will set us up better for getting strong sanctions and building a broader-based coalition against Iran to take effective action in the future."

He also noted that the administration is working to implement additional "defensive measures" against Iran, such as missile defenses in Europe, anti-arms-proliferation activities and a series of financial actions.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana welcomed Miss Rice's statement, saying "Direct U.S. participation would be the strongest and most positive signal of our common wish to reach an agreement with Iran."

U.S. officials also said they were reasonably optimistic that Russia and China finally will drop their objections to including sanctions in the package of benefits and penalties when the foreign ministers of the veto-wielding Security Council members and Germany meet today in Vienna, Austria.

Miss Rice, who flew to Vienna last night, declined to discuss the package before the meeting. But senior U.S. officials said Washington has agreed not to invoke the entire Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter in a future Security Council resolution on Iran to accommodate Moscow and Beijing.

For weeks, the United States has been calling for a Chapter 7 resolution, which would declare Iran a threat to international peace and stability and automatically trigger the option of using force to deal with that threat.

The compromise to be discussed today refers only to certain articles from Chapter 7 that are not linked with the use of force, the senior officials said.

Iran Calls U.S. Talks Offer "Propaganda" (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, May 31, 2006

The United States said Wednesday it would join in face-to-face talks with Iran over its disputed nuclear program if Tehran first agreed to put challenged atomic activities on hold, a shift in tactics meant to offer the Iranians a last chance to avoid punishing sanctions.

Iran dismissed the offer as "a propaganda move."

Before leaving for meetings in Europe on Iran, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that while the U.S. was willing to join talks between European nations and Iran, it was also helping to prepare a package of sanctions that Tehran could face should it decline the new offer.

"We're prepared to go either way," she said

At the White House, President Bush said, "I believe that it's important that we solve this issue diplomatically, and my decision today says that the United States is going to take a leadership position in solving this issue."

The overture to join stalled European talks came after mounting pressure on the U.S. from European allies.

The administration is convinced Russia and China would support sanctions or other harsh measures if new talks fail to persuade Iran to abandon nuclear efforts that the West fears could lead to a bomb, said a senior administration official. The official briefed reporters on condition of anonymity because the secretary was continuing talks with other countries.

Rice will be working to reaffirm such support on Thursday.

The Iranian news agency said Iran accepts only proposals and conditions that are in the nation's interest. "Halting enrichment definitely doesn't meet such interests," IRNA said.

The United States has had no diplomatic ties with Iran and few contacts at all with its government since Islamic radicals took over the U.S. Embassy in 1979 and held diplomats for more than a year.

Rice will meet with foreign ministers from the other permanent U.N. Security Council members on Thursday in Vienna to finalize a package of economic incentives and threats to be presented to Tehran. That package would be on the table in any new talks involving the United States.

The Bush administration had until now refused to talk directly to the Iranians about their nuclear program, although there have been sporadic contacts among relatively low-level officials on other subjects. The U.S. has long rejected direct contacts because it says Tehran supports terrorism and because it wants to avoid appearing to legitimize the regime.

The offer to talk should strip Iran and some U.S. allies of the argument that the hardline U.S. stance was an obstacle, or that Washington was not willing to try every means to resolve the impasse peacefully, U.S. officials said.

"This is the last excuse, in some sense," Rice said.

She said the United States was not offering full diplomatic relations with Iran and would not swear off ever using military action to stop what the U.S. contends is a rogue program to build a nuclear weapon.

"This is not a grand bargain," Rice said. "What we're talking about here is an effort to enhance the chances for a successful negotiated solution to the Iranian nuclear problem."

The administration has given arms-length support to European efforts to bargain with Iran, but also has been the prime mover for sanctions or other tough United Nations action. Russia and China, Iran's commercial allies on the council, have so far blocked that path.

Rice would not directly answer questions about whether those nations are committed to tough measures if the U.S. overture doesn't work.

She spoke of "tactical differences" and said, "I think you can be sure that our friends and our partners understand the importance of the step and the importance that the Iranians must now see of making a choice and making that choice clearly."

In New York, the U.N. ambassadors from China and Russia said the U.S. announcement showed it is more serious about finding a diplomatic solution to the dispute. Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya added that Washington's offer to talk to Iran should be unconditional.

In Brussels, Belgium, European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana welcomed the U.S. words. "Direct U.S. participation would be the strongest and most positive signal of our common wish to reach an agreement with Iran," he said.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said, "The European side's goal is to present a serious and substantial offer of cooperation, which demonstrates to Iran the benefits that would flow from compliance ... rather than the further isolation which would result from their failure to do so."

The U.S. offer is conditioned on Iran suspending its enrichment of uranium and related activities and allowing inspections to prove it. European nations and the Security Council have demanded the same thing, but Iran has refused to comply.

Iran did suspend enrichment activities while talks were active with the Europeans last year but resumed and stepped up the program this spring.

Uranium enrichment can led either to a bomb or to nuclear power production, and Iran has so far insisted that it won't take any deal that involves giving up that technology.

If Iran agreed to suspend disputed activities in order to talk with the United States, it could still insist on resuming them later, which U.S. officials say would be a deal-breaker.

At that point, the United States and its allies would be expected to move for tough U.N. action, possibly including economic or other sanctions.

U.S. Reverses Stand On Talks With Iranians (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Alissa J. Rubin

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration reversed course Wednesday and announced a willingness to take part in direct talks with Iran over its nuclear program, but only if Tehran agreed to suspend its uranium enrichment activities.

Iran called the offer "a propaganda move," and many U.S. and allied officials acknowledged that it may reject the central U.S. precondition for talks. But if Tehran spurns the offer, American officials hope that would draw leading world powers together in agreeing to impose painful economic sanctions on the Islamic Republic.

"Iran now faces a clear choice," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Washington. "This is the last excuse."

DOJ_NMG_0030870

The United States has long resisted pressure to directly negotiate with Iran. Rice said the U.S. initiative would "give new energy" to a European-led effort to develop a package of incentives and possible penalties to induce Iran to halt disputed nuclear activities. The American proposal would also require Iran to allow the resumption of surprise visits to its nuclear facilities by U.N. nuclear inspectors.

It remained unclear going into a meeting of foreign ministers today in Vienna whether Russia and China would agree to the proposal, which offers both sticks and carrots.

Though the countries involved are unlikely to take the drastic step of trying to block Tehran's oil exports, they could still do enough damage to Iran's economy to force a rethinking of the nuclear program by the fundamentalist leadership, U.S. and allied diplomats say. Tehran is under strong pressure to provide more jobs and a better standard of living for its population.

Rice said that although ongoing talks in Vienna among the world powers had made "substantial progress … some outstanding issues remain."

America's allies and many U.S. foreign policy experts have been urging President Bush and his administration to take part in talks, arguing that unless Washington showed a willingness to engage, it could not convince other countries that the time had come to impose penalties on Iran.

The shift in the U.S. position comes less than a month after Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad sent a surprise letter to Bush, apparently the first direct communication between the two nations' leaders since Iranian militants took Americans hostage at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran more than a quarter of a century ago. The letter included a long series of grievances and demands but was followed by calls from foreign policy experts and even some Republicans on Capitol Hill for direct talks.

The administration has resisted such talks on the grounds they would lend a legitimacy to the Tehran regime, which the United States has condemned for actions dating to the 1979 Islamic Revolution. In reversing that stance, U.S. officials equated their participation in multinational talks on Iran with what the administration has done in the case of North Korea's nuclear program.

Iranian officials contend that their uranium enrichment program is intended only for legal civilian nuclear power facilities that would generate electricity. But the United States and Europeans fear Tehran's goal is to develop a nuclear weapons capability. Britain, France and Germany negotiated with Iran for two years over the disputed program, but talks broke off when Tehran resumed enrichment.

Rice said the proposed talks with Iran would be focused tightly on the nuclear issue, and would not be aimed at reaching a "grand bargain" to resolve all differences between the two countries. Nevertheless, some U.S. officials and foreign diplomats said the new approach had been advanced by Rice to Bush in the face of resistance from more hawkish members of the administration.

Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said that Bush on Tuesday had called the leaders of France, Germany and Russia to discuss the proposal and that "they all signed off."

He said the United States and its allies were "finalizing both a series of inducements and punishments."

"Everybody is very close," Snow said, pointing to "a climate for action."

Bush personally addressed the policy shift in comments at the White House.

"Our message to the Iranians is that, one, you won't have a weapon, and two, that you must verifiably suspend any programs, at which point we will come to the negotiating table to work on a way forward."

Rice said that if Iran did not budge, the United States would move to "increase the pressure," either through the United Nations Security Council, "or, if necessary, with like-minded states outside of the Security Council."

Ahmadinejad has spoken scornfully of the incentive package being developed in Vienna. But Iranian officials have also intermittently signaled an interest in drawing the United States into negotiations, partly in hopes that Tehran could exact a U.S. commitment to drop efforts to undermine the regime.

The White House has heard calls to negotiate from a wide variety of sources, including European officials. But some administration members, including Vice President Dick Cheney, have resisted, fearing that talks could only give the Iranian leadership more stature and more time to advance a weapons program.

The United States' overture to Iran offers an opening for negotiations but comes with so many strings attached that little may happen in the short term, diplomats and experts say.

Under the agreement, the U.S. would enter into direct talks only if the Iranians first agreed to suspend entirely their uranium enrichment program, which Tehran restarted in early April.

The U.S. proposal also says that if Iran fails to comply with the demand to suspend enrichment, the permanent Security Council members will move ahead with a resolution that can lead to sanctions. The incentive package would be offered simultaneously with the tabling of the resolution.

These demands would be hard to swallow for Iran and Russia. Iran has said it will not reenter negotiations if there are conditions attached, such as a mandatory suspension. And the Russians have said they oppose any Security Council measure that can lead to sanctions.

Despite the two countries' public statements, the U.S. offer is considered likely to push all parties to reassess their positions. And diplomats and experts around the world applauded the move as the only hope for a negotiated settlement that could result in the Iranians halting their enrichment efforts.

"They've crossed the threshold, they've said they will talk directly to the Iranians…. There are conditions that make it unlikely that it will happen quickly, but it's part of a process," said a senior envoy in Vienna, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with diplomatic protocol.

"Two weeks ago, it was way down the road that they might consider talking. Now, it's if certain conditions are met. We'll allow diplomacy to take its course, and if the U.S. is engaged, they are engaged, it will be qualitatively different."

International Atomic Energy Agency director-general Mohamed ElBaradei, who has quietly encouraged face-to-face talks, welcomed the move, saying in a statement that he "strongly encourages Iran to create the conditions necessary for the resumption of these talks, with U.S. participation, with a view to achieving a comprehensive settlement that is acceptable to both the international community and Iran."

European diplomats and experts reacted enthusiastically to the American move, even if it may not lead to a quick resolution.

"The Iranians have been demanding direct discussions with the U.S. so it would give much more credibility to the Europeans if they have the Americans sitting at the same table," said a European diplomat.

Gary Samore, who served as a top nonproliferation advisor to President Clinton, said any talks would probably be preceded by a U.S. initiative to work out the details of the negotiations. For instance, the Iranians would probably offer to suspend a portion of their enrichment effort, tempting other nations to accept those terms as a way to at least slow the Iranian effort, he said.

Patrick Clawson, a longtime Iran watcher at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said he was not surprised that the administration would make this offer to join direct talks once it had worked out an agreement with other countries on penalties.

"The U.S. position for some time has been if we can agree on the stick, we'll come with the carrot," he said. "That's what this is."

Clawson and Samore both said they doubted the Iranians would accept the offer. But their refusal, Clawson said, could make it easier for the United States to enlist like-minded countries to impose sanctions.

U.S. Is Now Ready To Meet Iranians On Nuclear Plan (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

WASHINGTON, May 31 — The Bush administration said Wednesday that the United States would join Europeans in talks with Iran over its nuclear program, but only if Tehran first suspended its uranium activities, which are thought to be a cover for developing nuclear arms.

The declaration, by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, was a shift away from decades of refusal to hold broad, direct talks with Iran. But Iran has long said it would not agree to preconditions, and the administration's offer appeared to be aimed as much at placating American allies as at wooing Iran.

Ms. Rice announced the shift on the eve of talks in Vienna with European, Russian and Chinese envoys aimed at resuscitating a faltering American-led effort to forge a common front against Iran's nuclear program. The American goal is to present Iran with a package of economic and political benefits if it ends its uranium activities, and a threat of sanctions if it does not.

The shift followed a searching, two-month debate and an accelerating campaign by European leaders to get President Bush to make a dramatic gesture to energize the stalled European-led nuclear talks with Iran, American officials said.

Skepticism from Vice President Dick Cheney and others who have opposed concessions to Iran was overcome, the officials said, when it was realized that refusal to move toward the European view would mean that the administration would be blamed for failing to do its utmost to defuse the crisis, making it harder to rally world opinion against Iran. [News analysis, Page A8.]

Still, American and European officials said, Russian and Chinese support for the package was not yet guaranteed.

"The United States is willing to exert strong leadership to give diplomacy its very best chance to succeed," Ms. Rice said before leaving for Vienna. She added that "the United States will come to the table" with its European partners "and meet with Iran's representative" if Iran met the stated conditions.

It was not clear whether the American offer would prompt any change in Iran's longstanding opposition to preconditions. An official Iranian news agency initially labeled it a "propaganda move."

Ms. Rice said the American shift, however qualified, removed "the last excuse" for Iran to refuse to cooperate. President Bush later described the new approach as one that put the United States into "a leadership position in solving this issue."

"Our message to the Iranians is that, one, you won't have a weapon, and two, that you must verifiably suspend any programs, at which point we will come to the negotiating table to work on a way forward," Mr. Bush said at the White House.

The United States conveyed its readiness to meet through the Swiss Embassy in Tehran, and in a call to Iran's United Nations ambassador, Javad Zarif, by the American ambassador, John R. Bolton, offering Mr. Zarif an advance copy of Ms. Rice's announcement.

Outside of Iran, Ms. Rice's announcement brought nearly universal praise, especially in Europe, though Russia and China seemed guarded about the conditions the United States attached to its offer.

A senior State Department official, who was not authorized to speak for attribution, said President Bush had briefed President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia on the details. "We have a little bit more negotiating to do," the official said. "We just have to make sure that everybody's on board. We think the Russians will be."

The administration has not entirely frozen Iran out of contact in recent years, despite Mr. Bush's labeling it, along with Iraq and North Korea, part of an "axis of evil" in his State of the Union Message in early 2002.

The United States had contact with Iranian officials during the war in Afghanistan and the early stages of the war with Iraq. Iraq and Afghanistan are neighbors of Iran, and Iran has long wielded influence over their internal affairs.

American talks with Iran were cut off in mid-2003 after the United States charged Iran with involvement in the bombing of civilians in Saudi Arabia. But there were talks at the end of that year and the beginning of 2004 to speed American relief to Iran after the earthquake in Bam.

In addition, last year Ms. Rice announced that the American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, would be authorized to talk with Iranian officials about the situation in Iraq, including infiltration of insurgents and aid to Shiite militias. But these talks have not taken place.

With Washington's new position now public, the European, Russian, Chinese and American negotiators are to focus on details of the incentives and threats of punishment. The United States has quietly made one significant concession to the Russians on this score, by allowing language that would remove any threat of force from the document being discussed.

In addition, the United States has agreed to a Russian and Chinese demand to require that even if the Security Council threatens sanctions, the sanctions would not be imposed without another Council vote.

What all these face-saving arrangements leave unstated, however, is that the United States appears determined to enlist other countries to impose economic penalties, like a crackdown on bank activity in Iran, if the Council fails to act in the face of further Iranian defiance.

Getting worldwide support for a tough policy toward Iran has been hard because Iran, which moved last summer to resume uranium enrichment, is technically correct in saying that this activity, defined by Iran as peaceful in nature, is allowed under the nuclear nonproliferation treaty that it signed.

The West maintains that because Iran has concealed many of its activities from the International Atomic Energy Agency, it has forfeited its right to enrich uranium.

A package of incentives is to be presented Thursday in Vienna, if American plans are fulfilled.

The threat of sanctions, as envisioned by the United States, Britain and France, is to take the form of a commitment to a resolution to be adopted by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which implies penalties if Iran refuses to suspend its enrichment of uranium. Russia and China are opposed to invoking Chapter VII but may relent if they are persuaded by American assurances that sanctions would not be adopted without another vote of the Council.

North Korea Project Halted

A project to build two nuclear power plants for North Korea in exchange for its agreement to allow United Nations inspections of atomic sites was formally ended yesterday by the United States, Japan, South Korea and European Union. The contractor, the Korean Peninsula Energy Development Organization, was formed in 1995 to build two light-water reactors, from which it is difficult to extract weapons-grade plutonium, but the Bush administration never fully supported it.

U.S. Offer Of Iran Talks Seen As Change Of Course (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration, signaling a willingness Wednesday to open direct talks with Iran over its nuclear program, is embracing a sharp change of course that reflects a more pragmatic approach to one of the world's most intractable conflicts and may ease upward pressure on international oil prices.

The administration's overture comes with the same demand of Iran that the U.S. and its European allies have made from the start: the Iranians must first abandon their enrichment of nuclear material, which the West views as evidence of a determination to build an atomic bomb.

But until now, the U.S. has gone out of its way to avoid direct talks with Iran over a program that Iran maintains is designed only for civilian nuclear power. The U.S. has insisted so adamantly that Europeans handle all talks that Greg Schulte, the American ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency, once took evasive action as he encountered the Iranian representative in a hallway in Vienna.

"Once I almost found myself in the same elevator with him, but I found another elevator," said Schulte, adding that Iran wants to paint the conflict as a dispute between the U.S. and Iran. "This is not the U.S. against Iran. This is Iran against the world."

But that may have changed with the administration's offer to add the "weight" of the U.S. to European-led negotiations with Iran. President Bush pledged Wednesday to negotiate "a way forward," but only if Tehran would abandon its suspected development of nuclear weaponry.

The administration also held out a promise of greater economic cooperation with Iran, a country with which the U.S. has not had diplomatic relations since 1980, when ties were severed during Iran's detention of 52 American hostages for 444 days.

The official Iranian news agency quickly dismissed the new U.S. initiative as "a propaganda move." Iran also has rejected previous demands that it halt enrichment.

Before Iran's reaction, oil prices declined on the news of the offer. Iran is estimated to have as much as 9 percent of the world's known oil reserves, second only to Saudi Arabia, and about 15 percent of natural gas reserves.

The change in course is a signal that pragmatists within the Bush administration may be gaining sway over hard-liners who have refused direct relations with Iran. Bush's action is also a measure of the increasing alarm with which Israel and other nations view Iran's procurement of the technology needed to develop weapons-grade uranium.

"My decision today says that the United States is going to take a leadership position in solving this issue," Bush said. "And our message to the Iranians is that, one, you won't have a weapon, and two, that you must verifiably suspend any programs, at which point we will come to the negotiating table to work on a way forward."

Bush, who repeatedly has maintained that the U.S. will not eliminate the option of military action against Iran, also insisted that he is committed to a diplomatic solution.

"You're seeing robust diplomacy," Bush said. "I believe this problem can be solved diplomatically, and I'm going to give it every effort to do so."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she had informed Iran of the administration's offer, using the Swiss government as an intermediary. The invitation, she added, came with a non-negotiable requirement: "As soon as Iran fully and verifiably suspends its enrichment and reprocessing activities, the United States will come to the table with our [European Union] colleagues and meet with Iran's representative."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had made an overture of his own, with a rambling letter to Bush earlier this year, the first communication from Tehran to the U.S. in three decades. Bush dismissed that just last week as "like 16 or 17 single-spaced typed pages" that "didn't address the issue of whether or not they're going to continue to press for a nuclear weapon."

George Perkovich, director for non-proliferation at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, called the U.S. move a "careful and constructive response."

He added, "Almost everyone in the world recognized that something like this move was necessary because the Iranians were winning the international diplomacy. The only people who didn't seem to recognize that this was necessary were in the White House. Now they seem to have recognized reality. They had no other feasible options."

Saeed Laylaz, an analyst in Tehran, said the Iranians had been awaiting a response to their letter. "I'm not immediately optimistic," Laylaz said of Bush's reply. "It doesn't mean negotiations will start tomorrow morning ... but I believe this is the beginning of a trend."

Noting that "both countries know they should find a diplomatic solution," Laylaz said, "The United States knows that military confrontation is too dangerous and too costly. And Iran knows any continued confrontation will be harmful to its own interests."

Until now, the U.S. had left this diplomacy to a troika of Europeans, the so-called "EU-3" of Great Britain, Germany and France. Four years ago, in his State of the Union address, Bush identified Iran, Iraq and North Korea as "an axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world." But since failed diplomacy with Iraq gave way to a costly U.S.-led invasion, the U.S. has found itself taking part in "six-party" talks with North Korea and is now ready to speak with Iran.

Part of the challenge facing the U.S. has been the reluctance of either China or Russia to support sanctions against Iran since the question of Iran's nuclear program has been referred to the United Nations Security Council.

Rice, asked if the U.S. overture makes it more feasible that Russia and China might support the U.S., said the American reluctance to join negotiations had been "the last excuse, in some sense."

Rice held out hope to Iran of a "beneficial relationship of increased contacts in education and cultural exchange, in sports and travel, in trade and in investment." She warned, though, that "the nuclear issue … is not the only obstacle standing in the way of improved relations." Iran, she said, must also stop sponsoring terrorism in Iraq and other nations.

While many experts have estimated that Iran is five to 10 years away from acquiring the technology needed for bomb-making, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert publicly has suggested that Iran could be ready within a year. The Iranian program is of particular interest to Israel because Ahmadinejad has called for the destruction of the Jewish state. The Israelis, in meetings at the White House last week, had encouraged the U.S. to engage in negotiations, one expert said.

The IAEA, which in February reported Iran to the Security Council, plans another meeting June 12 to assess "what if any progress has been made," Schulte said. Bush plans to travel to Vienna, headquarters for the IAEA, to meet European Union leaders later this month.

While Ahmadinejad maintains that his country is interested only in civilian nuclear power generation, many U.S. experts express doubt, in part because Iran possesses great reserves of oil that it could use for energy. Iran's pursuit of enrichment "makes no sense at this point … and in our judgment is really a guise, is really a cover for a military program," Schulte said.

In Shift, U.S. Offers To Talk To Iran, Aiming To Bolster Allies' Cohesion (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Neil King Jr.

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration launched a new, more urgent multilateral strategy to rein in Iran's nuclear program by offering to participate in European-led negotiations currently under way with Tehran, after years of pointedly shunning the regime.

The abrupt shift, announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday, is a nod to European allies' desire to offer carrots as well as sticks to steer Iran away from its efforts to produce weapons-grade uranium. The offer to join talks was conditioned on Tehran's pledging explicitly to rule out any plans for nuclear-weapons development.

U.S. officials hope the gambit will win more support from allies for sanctions if Tehran spurns the outreach, as early indications suggest it might.

While the move drew a cool response from the Iranians, the reaction in other quarters was highly favorable. The European Union portrayed the announcement as a "most positive signal," and White House aides said even Russia and China -- long resistant to punishing Iran -- now seem willing to go along with sanctions under certain circumstances. And oil markets reacted with a hint of optimism. (See related article.1)

Ms. Rice said the U.S. might ultimately be willing to work outside the United Nations to impose sanctions if the new American approach fails to change other nations' stances. And while U.S. officials are eager to stress that Washington is exhausting every diplomatic option in dealing with Iran, the U.S. experience in Iraq has all but forced the administration to try a more cooperative approach: This time, Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice are working with allies and through diplomatic channels. They have pulled out the diplomatic stops in recent days to nail down agreement on a firm U.N. resolution.

The president on Tuesday telephoned the leaders of three of the top countries involved -- Vladimir Putin of Russia, Angela Merkel of Germany and Jacques Chirac of France -- and is hoping to speak with Chinese President Hu Jintao soon. Ms. Rice late yesterday flew to Vienna for talks with the foreign ministers of Germany, Russia, France, Britain and China -- the last four of which, along with the U.S., are the permanent members of the U.N. Security Council. The administration also has been consulting with friendly nations in the Persian Gulf, and Mr. Bush as recently as Tuesday talked at length about the Iranian problem with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"We now have an opportunity to either check their movement toward further sophistication of their nuclear program by negotiation, to which we would be a party, or to check it by greater pressure on the Iranians through sanctions and other measures through the Security Council and, if necessary, with like-minded states outside of the Security Council," Ms. Rice told reporters yesterday.

The fight with Iran centers around fears that Tehran is busy working to develop nuclear weapons, while the Iranian government says it is merely enriching uranium to fuel a civilian nuclear program. To ensure that Iran doesn't acquire nuclear weapons, the U.S. and others want to stop the domestic enrichment program and supply Iran with fuel from the outside, a proposal that Iran has rejected.

After hours of official silence in Tehran, the official Iranian news agency dismissed the U.S. offer to participate in European-led talks as a "propaganda move," though some moderate officials within Iran's government have called for direct talks with Washington. Last month, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad sent a rambling 18-page letter to Mr. Bush, though it made only a passing reference to Iran's nuclear program.

But the U.S. announcement drew immediate praise in Europe, where top officials have pushed the U.S. for months to join on-and-off talks that until now have been led by Britain, France and Germany. It also drew cheers from financial markets, as crude oil futures fell 74 cents a barrel in New York trading. One factor behind the recent jump in oil prices has been fear of a confrontation between the U.S. and Iran, the world's fourth-largest oil producer.

While it remains unclear if Tehran will take up the offer, the U.S. move does seem to have hardened support for applying more pressure on Iran. Russian and Chinese diplomats praised the move. And at the White House, a senior administration official said that Russia and China had agreed to back a tough U.N. resolution if Iran rebuffs the U.S. offer. The official also said the proposal's timing was meant to gauge the sincerity of Iran's recent overtures to the U.S. -- which continued with back-channel contacts after Mr. Ahmadinejad's letter -- so the world could see Iran's true intentions.

While the U.S. has generally shunned open contact with Iran since Islamic radicals took hostages at the U.S. embassy in 1979, the Bush White House, more than any of the previous four administrations, had firmly rejected any suggestion that it engage in high-level talks with Iran. In remarks yesterday after Ms. Rice's announcement, Mr. Bush said he decided to alter his stance to show "that the United States is going to take a leadership position in solving this issue" diplomatically.

In a similar turnaround, the administration at first refused to have any contact with North Korea but later agreed to join in six-party talks to try to end Pyongyang's nuclear program, though those negotiations have made little progress.

In the Vienna meetings today, the ministers hope to complete agreement on a comprehensive set of both potential sanctions and economic incentives for Iran. Ms. Rice said these incentives, coupled with Washington's new willingness to engage Tehran directly, offer Iran a clear alternative in its bid to reintegrate with the international community while still developing a peaceful nuclear-energy program.

"Today, the Iranian regime can decide on one of two paths, one of two fundamentally different futures for its people and for its relationship with the international community," Ms. Rice said. She said the U.S. offer to join the European talks would remove "the last excuse" that Iran and others have cited for the lack of diplomatic progress.

In advance of any formal agreement -- in or outside the U.N. -- on sanctions, the U.S. Treasury Department and other government agencies have already been stepping up efforts to curtail Iranian access to the international banking system if Tehran doesn't suspend its nuclear program. In recent months, UBS AG of Switzerland and ABN Amro Holding NV of the Netherlands both announced they were severing their financial ties. Both financial institutions have been subjects of U.S. Justice Department inquiries into whether they violated sanctions laws regarding Iran.

Diplomats involved in the Iran negotiations said these moves could be part of stepped-up action against Iran that will increase in the coming months, regardless of events at the U.N. "I think you're only seeing the early stages of this sort of financial pressure," a European diplomat said.

Ms. Rice personally called for an interagency plan to pressure Iran's financial system should the country not comply with international demands, say U.S. officials. The plan would include targeting companies and personalities known to be involved in the nuclear program, these officials say. And it has been aided by growing concerns among financial institutions about the costs of doing business with Iran.

U.S. officials have also been seeking to cobble a united front among Middle East countries to pressure Iran. All are Sunni Muslim-majority countries that are skeptical of both Iran's nuclear intentions and its moves to expand its influence in the region.

In recent weeks, State Department and Pentagon officials have met with leaders from nine Arab nations to try to develop greater security cooperation. Some of the discussions have focused on counterproliferation and counterterrorism issues, U.S. officials say. But they have also directly sought to strengthen these countries' military hardware, particularly anti-missile defenses.

"The intent is to show that no one in the Gulf community can find that it can be bullied or pressured by Iran's behavior," said John Hillen, the assistant secretary of state for political-military affairs. He added that the Bush administration is seeking to stress to Middle Eastern states that Washington isn't reducing its commitment to securing the region.

U.S. officials are particularly seeking to build a stronger security presence in the Middle East through the Gulf Cooperation Council, a regional body comprising Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates. All have healthy bilateral relationships with Washington, U.S. diplomats say, but the hope is that they can begin cooperating better among themselves on everything from maritime security to protecting the region's energy supplies.

They see the GCC as a buttress against Iran's influence in countries such as Syria, Lebanon and Iraq.

The U.S. outreach to Iran is already being attacked by conservative analysts in Washington and Iranian exile groups. They say the Iranian president will view Mr. Bush's overture as a sign of weakness and that it is unlikely to generate any concessions from Tehran. They also believe Iran's theocratic government will simply use diplomacy with the U.S. to further its nuclear ambitions.

Talks will "buy more time as Ahmadinejad is rapidly proceeding with Iran's nuclear-weapons program," said Alireza Jafarzadeh, a Washington analyst affiliated with the National Council of Resistance of Iran, one of the large Iranian exile opposition groups.

U.S. Willing To Talk With Iran On Nuclear Program (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a significant policy shift, the Bush administration offered Wednesday to take part in talks with Iran about its nuclear program if Tehran suspends efforts to make nuclear fuel.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the offer removes Iran's "last excuse" for not stopping its nuclear program. "It's time to know whether Iran is serious about negotiations," she said.

IRNA, Iran's official news agency, quickly dismissed the offer as "a propaganda move," according to the Associated Press. The statement said Iran had no intention of halting uranium enrichment.

The initial rejection still leaves room for diplomacy, Iran experts said.

"I suspect they'll negotiate over negotiations," said Ray Takeyh of the Council on Foreign Relations.

IRNA is government-controlled, but the Bush administration said it was awaiting official reaction from Iran's leaders.

"I hope this is not a real reaction from Iran," U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton said in an interview on Fox News. "I think it's important that they take a very careful look at what Secretary Rice laid out today because it really is their last chance, in many respects."

Tehran also is waiting to examine a package of incentives and possible punishments being assembled by the United States, European countries, Russia and China.

The talks would be the first acknowledged high-level negotiations between the two countries since 1980, when the United States broke diplomatic relations during the Iran hostage crisis at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

The Bush administration's offer was the latest in a flurry of diplomatic activity over recent months designed to halt Iran's nuclear program.

The White House suggested recently that it might agree to talks with Iran if Tehran suspended its nuclear program. Rice's statement Wednesday was the first official offer and followed urging from Europeans.

France, Germany and Britain welcomed the U.S. offer.

The overture could help the White House win over Russia and China, which are reluctant to support sanctions and are urging more diplomacy.

The offer also strengthens the U.S. position if Iran refuses to suspend its nuclear program. It allows the United States to argue that it made every diplomatic effort before resorting to sanctions or war.

In contrast to the U.S. stance on Iraq, when the United States acted with limited international support, President Bush said Wednesday that "there must be a united international front … to prevent the Iranians from developing a nuclear weapon."

Bush told reporters that his administration was prepared to take the "leadership position" in efforts to end Iran's nuclear program.

The Bush administration says Iran is trying to build a nuclear weapon. Tehran insists its program is for peaceful purposes.

U.S. To Join Talks With Iran If Uranium Enrichment Stops (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The Bush administration offered for the first time yesterday to join European talks with Iran over its nuclear program, but only if the Iranian government suspends efforts to enrich uranium and reprocess spent nuclear fuel, which the administration calls part of a covert attempt to make bombs.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the U.S. policy shift at a State Department news conference, warning that if the Iranian government chooses not to negotiate and to continue pursuing its nuclear ambitions, "it will incur only great costs."

"We urge Iran to make this choice for peace, to abandon its ambition for nuclear weapons," Rice said. Refusing to do so, she added, "will lead to international isolation and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions."

A senior administration official said there is substantial agreement from Russia and China -- two nations that have resisted sanctions against Iran -- on an escalating series of U.N. penalties that would be imposed if Iran does not comply. He said negotiators are expected to finalize a package that includes potential sanctions for noncompliance, as well as benefits if Iran accepts a deal being crafted by several nations during a meeting in Vienna today. Rice left for the meeting shortly after her announcement.

The Bush administration previously refused to engage in direct talks with Iran on its nuclear program, preferring to let three European Union nations -- Britain, France and Germany, known as the E.U.-3 -- conduct negotiations. But Germany lately has increasingly urged Washington to deal with Tehran directly, as have a growing roster of foreign policy experts and at least two U.S. senators.

"I thought it was important for the United States to take the lead, along with our partners, and that's what you're seeing," President Bush told reporters. "You're seeing robust diplomacy. I believe this problem can be solved diplomatically, and I'm going to give it every effort to do so."

John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, called Javad Zarif, Iran's U.N. ambassador, before Rice's announcement to inform him of the administration's willingness to engage in direct talks. Meanwhile, Rice's remarks also were given to the Swiss ambassador to the United States for transmission to Iran.

Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency seemed to dismiss the offer, saying that the country accepts only proposals that are in its interest, the Associated Press reported. "Halting enrichment definitely doesn't meet such interests," IRNA said. Iranian officials have long insisted that their nuclear program is limited to peaceful purposes.

In extending the offer to enter the nuclear talks, Rice made it clear that the United States would not contemplate restoring diplomatic relations with Iran, which were severed during the 1979 hostage crisis, until the regime made changes, including renouncing its support of terrorist groups.

Senior Chinese and Russian officials welcomed the U.S. offer of direct talks, saying it showed an increased willingness to pursue diplomatic means to resolve the budding nuclear crisis. Still, Wang Guangya, China's U.N. ambassador, said the United States should provide Iran with security assurances and drop its demand that Iran cease uranium enrichment before such talks could begin.

"I think it in a way proves that the U.S. is more serious about the negotiations than about other options, but I do hope that this offer could be less conditional," Wang told reporters.

Wang said China may be prepared to take a tougher line with Iran if the United States and Europe offer more "attractive carrots" to the Iranians, including security assurances, and a pledge to allow Tehran to pursue a peaceful nuclear energy program, including a small research-and-development project on uranium enrichment.

The United States and key European allies oppose such a project, saying it would provide Tehran with the technical know-how to enrich uranium for a nuclear weapon. Estimates vary, but some experts think Iran could master the expertise needed to produce a nuclear weapon by the end of the year, though U.S. intelligence agencies estimate it would take Tehran a decade to build a bomb.

The shift in U.S. policy came after mounting calls for a dialogue with Iran from senior foreign policy experts and lawmakers, notably former secretaries of state Henry A. Kissinger and Madeleine K. Albright and Sens. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.).

The pressure increased in early May when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad wrote a rambling 18-page letter that was dismissed by Bush but seen in much of the world as an invitation for talks with the United States. The letter was followed by back-channel communications making it clear that the Iranians were seeking direct talks.

Administration officials, meanwhile, said they began seriously discussing a plan to enter negotiations with Iran two months ago. Rice, on her way to New York in early May for what turned out to be a contentious meeting on the Iran issue, sketched an outline of a plan on a piece of paper, a senior State Department official said.

Later, a small group -- including officials from the State Department, the White House and the Defense Department -- was assembled to flesh out her ideas. Bush discussed them with British Prime Minister Tony Blair during his visit to Washington last week, and Bush followed that up with phone calls to the leaders of France, Germany and Russia on Tuesday to ensure that they were on board. Rice, meanwhile, discussed the idea with her Chinese counterpart, Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing, before Bush gave final approval to the offer.

Rice and other Bush administration officials said the offer of direct negotiations would eliminate the argument that the U.S. refusal to deal directly with Iran on the nuclear issue was the impediment to resolving the impasse.

"This is the last excuse in some sense," she said. "There have been those who have said, 'Well, if only the negotiations had the potential for the United States to be a part of them, perhaps then Iran would respond.' So now we have a pretty clear path."

Oil Falls Amid U.S. Offer Of Iran Talks (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

Oil prices ended moderately lower yesterday after a selloff on hopes of a diplomatic solution to the Iran nuclear standoff.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a major policy shift, said Washington was ready to join multinational talks with Tehran if Iran suspends all disputed nuclear activities.

The nearby July crude contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange settled 74 cents lower at $71.29 a barrel after falling as low as $70.05.

In the past, Iran has offered to suspend its controversial nuclear-enrichment program to find a way out of the crisis, and the surprise U.S. diplomatic overture triggered a knee-jerk selloff in oil futures.

At a news conference yesterday, Ms. Rice said the U.S. was prepared to join a united international front in an attempt to persuade Iran to abandon any ambitions it may have of building nuclear weapons.

"It is an opportunity for the world to clarify Iran's intentions, and it is an opportunity for Iran to make its intentions clear," she said.

While there was no immediate official reaction from the Iranian government, the Islamic Republic's official news agency dismissed the overture as a U.S. "propaganda initiative."

Asserting that Ms. Rice has broached the subject, the Islamic Republic News Agency wrote: "Of course, the Islamic Republic of Iran will only accept proposals and conditions that take into account the interests of the people and the nation [of Iran]. Suspending enrichment absolutely will not safeguard these interests."

The unofficial dismissal "called the whole thing into question" and led traders to buy back previously sold positions late in the session, said Tom Bentz, an analyst at BNP Paribas Futures in New York. "To be honest, why anyone believed that the Iranians would respond positively is the question."

Bill O'Grady, an analyst at A.G. Edwards in St. Louis, said if Iran formally rejects the U.S. offer of talks, oil prices could climb to new highs.

"Then the odds of something happening start to accelerate," Mr. O'Grady said. On the other hand, Iranian acceptance would mean more losses for oil, with crude prices potentially dropping into the mid- to low-$60s, he added.

In other commodity markets:

CBOT: The Chicago Board of Trade will raise fees for trade-clearing and certain other transactions, moves that will increase the average amount of revenue generated for each contract traded at the exchange. Effective July 1, the fee for clearing all trades will be six cents a contract, up from five cents. CBOT, a unit of CBOT Holdings Inc., will raise fees for so-called off-exchange transactions and for electronic trading of agricultural products.

COPPER: Futures on the Comex division of the Nymex fell on month-end long liquidation and general weakness in commodities. July copper fell five cents to $3.624 a pound.

Oil Prices Cool Off After U.S. Softens Stance On Iran (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

WASHINGTON — Oil prices fell for the first time in a week Wednesday as gasoline prices continued to decline.

Oil prices fell 74 cents, or 1%, to $71.29 a barrel in trading in New York after the Bush administration said it would participate in talks with Iran about its nuclear ambitions if the country halts its effort to produce nuclear fuel.

Worries about a potential showdown between Iran and other nations about Iran's nuclear program have bolstered oil prices for weeks. Although the USA does not import oil from Iran, OPEC's second-largest producer, there is concern that should sanctions be imposed on that country, there would be less oil on the world market.

The decline in oil prices following the White House's announcement reinforces the idea that the lofty prices, which recently hit a record high, are not supported by basic supply and demand fundamentals, says Rakesh Shankar, senior economist at Moody's Economy.com.

"We see at least $5 to $6 in pure speculative premium," Shankar says. "It's a house of cards that any breath of wind will tumble."

Although the decline Wednesday was the first in a week, prices earlier in the session were down by as much as $2 a barrel.

The fact that investors erased some of those losses suggests they question if Iran will follow through, Alaron Trading analyst Phil Flynn says.

"People are skeptical that these talks are actually going to happen," Flynn says.

He predicts oil prices will continue to rise to a new record of $78 a barrel by midsummer, based on strong global demand and on concerns during hurricane season about the potential impact on U.S. energy supplies.

"Oil prices are going to stay strong and go up," Flynn says.

Oil is a key element in a number of industries and accounts for half of the cost of gasoline at the pump.

The U.S. average price for a gallon of gasoline fell for the second-consecutive week this week, the Energy Department said Wednesday.

The nationwide average price was $2.87 Monday, down 3 cents from a week ago, but still up 77 cents from a year ago. Prices recently peaked at $2.95 a gallon May 15, according to the government's weekly report.

Prices remained above $3 a gallon in several cities, such as Los Angeles, New York, San Francisco and Seattle, this week.

Large drops in prices at the pump are unlikely, says Fred Rozell, retail pricing director at Oil Price Information Service, which tracks gasoline prices. That's because the memory of the reduction in gasoline supplies and the quick run-up in prices to record levels following last year's hurricanes is too fresh. Weather forecasters have predicted another active hurricane season, which begins today.

"There's still that fear," Rozell says. "Any time the wind picks up and threatens to blow anywhere near the refining sector, prices are going to go nuts."

Iranian Hard-liners In Fix As U.S. Offers To Join Talks (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

Iranian hard-liners, led by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, faced a dilemma of their own after yesterday's announcement by the Bush administration that it was ready to join talks over Iran's suspected nuclear programs.

The U.S. policy shift "will be seen as a victory for the tough line of the government," said A. William Samii, an Iranian political analyst for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, "but it's a tricky question of how best to respond."

Ordinary Iranians are increasingly weary of the confrontation with the West over the nuclear programs, Mr. Samii said, but have been told repeatedly by the country's conservative Islamic leaders that developing a nuclear capability is a matter of national honor and security.

If Washington's presence in the talks produces a deal to suspend or terminate Iran's nuclear programs, "there will be a lot of questions for the Iranian government," Mr. Samii said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, briefing reporters yesterday, said bluntly that one motivation behind the U.S. decision was to test Tehran's sincerity.

"It's time to know whether Iran is serious about negotiations or not," she said.

Iranian nuclear negotiators, backed by supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, have rejected in recent months any suggestion that they suspend uranium enrichment while the talks proceed. Mr. Bush and Miss Rice said such a suspension was a precondition for U.S. participation in the talks.

In the first official reaction to the U.S. offer, Iran's state-run news service called the proposal a "propaganda move."

"It's evident that the Islamic Republic of Iran only accepts proposals and conditions that meet the interests of the nation and the country," the Islamic Republic News Agency said last night. "Halting enrichment definitely does not meet such interests."

But Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council and an Iranian foreign policy scholar at Johns Hopkins University's Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, cautioned, "You should never take Iran's first reaction too seriously."

Mr. Parsi praised the U.S. move but said the demand for a halt to uranium enrichment could tempt Tehran to put forward its own preconditions for talks.

However, the prospect of active U.S. participation in the talks could widen the differences within the Iranian regime over negotiating tactics and strategy, he added.

"When there was no credible offer on the table, the international pressure only united the different factions in the government," he said. "That could change now."

The uranium enrichment program remains a sensitive topic in Tehran. The Supreme National Security Council, the top security agency, has forbidden debate on the subject in the national press.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, a little-known figure before his surprise election in mid-2005, has carved out a major role in foreign policy in part by strongly backing the nuclear program. Ayatollah Khamenei, still the final arbiter of policy in Iran's fractured political system, has backed the president's uncompromising stand.

The supreme leader said earlier this week that "any retreat" on the nuclear issue would be a "100 percent loss."

But other prominent figures, including former President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and former top security aide Hassan Rowhani, have publicly expressed doubts about the regime's hard line in talks with France, Britain and Germany.

Iran insists its nuclear programs are for peaceful civilian use and says it has a right to such programs under international treaties.

Mr. Ahmadinejad and his allies have grown bolder in recent days, Iranian analysts say, reflecting what they say are increasing troubles Washington faces on other fronts.

Foreign Minister Manuchehr Mottaki, on a visit to Malaysia this week, said the United States could not afford to "create a new crisis" in the region because of the difficult situations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Jaw-Jaw Before War-War? (WSJ)

By Robert D. Blackwill

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

The Bush administration's announcement that it will join the EU-3 negotiations with Iran -- if Tehran suspends, verifiably, its enrichment and reprocessing activities -- will be seen as good news by many. With this new initiative, the American-led attempt to stop diplomatically Iran's nuclear weapons program will likely last for at least several more months. Perhaps Iran will eventually accede, either because of the threat or imposition of sanctions against it, or in the face of the united will of the international community.

We may hope the outcome is peaceful. But how probable is it? Vegas might give 3-1 odds against -- or longer. The Europeans have tried for two years to find a compromise with Tehran, without progress. Despite nearly unanimous condemnation by the international community, the regime appears determined to acquire nuclear weapons capability, and to replace the U.S. as the dominant power in the Persian Gulf area.

The essential problem here is not administration policy, the shape of the table, or who is sitting around it. Iran's nuclear policies are causing this crisis and Tehran has been left in no doubt about how to end it -- stop trying to create a nuclear arsenal. Nevertheless, if negotiations with Tehran fail, the case against using U.S. military force to set back Iran's nuclear weapons program is impressive.

Iran would retaliate strongly in Iraq, in Afghanistan and perhaps against the U.S. homeland. The effect in the Muslim world could be volcanic. Terror against America would increase. Islam could be further radicalized. Oil prices would skyrocket with damaging effects on the international economy, even if Iran did not interrupt its supply. The people of Iran would probably fall in behind the mullahs.

Global public opinion would further shift against the U.S. The Bush administration's resulting prolonged fixation on Iran could facilitate the rise of Chinese power and give North Korea more room to maneuver. Moreover, how accurate would U.S. intelligence and targeting information be? For what period would an air campaign have to last to be effective? If Iran subsequently began rebuilding its nuclear infrastructure, how long would it be before the U.S. might have to attack again?

For many, these arguments rule out military force. Former National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski has argued that, "if undertaken without the sanction of the U.N. Security Council either alone by the U.S. or in complicity with Israel, it would stamp the perpetrator(s) as an international outlaw(s)." Since it is difficult to imagine any circumstance in which the Security Council would endorse U.S. military action against Iran, this would seem to take the military option off the table for the likes of Mr. Brzezinski.

If diplomacy does not succeed, he suggests a policy of deterrence, which, he explains, "has worked in U.S.-Soviet relations, in U.S.-Chinese relations, and in Indo-Pak relations." But deterrence in the situations he mentions was focused on avoiding nuclear use. It did not prevent Pakistan from conducting more than a decade of cross-border terrorism in the course of which 40,000 innocent Indians were murdered. Would nuclear deterrence weaken Iran's ambition to become the hegemonic state in the Persian Gulf region? Would it end Iran's state support for international terrorist organizations? Would it lessen this Iranian regime's oft-repeated objective to eradicate Israel?

In fact, it would likely be the U.S. that would be deterred once Tehran acquired nuclear weapons capability and threatened U.S. national interests. Many argued a decade ago against military action against North Korea's nuclear facilities. Negotiate, they insisted. The PDRK presently produces probably several nuclear weapons a year. Who's sorry now? Henry Kissinger reminds us that bureaucrats and experts instinctively favor delay, equivocation, negotiation and the status quo, "because short of an unambiguous catastrophe the status quo has the advantage of familiarity and it is never possible to prove that another course would yield superior results."

The use of American military force against Iran's nuclear infrastructure would obviously carry great risk. But acquiescing in an Iranian nuclear weapons capability would be deeply dangerous for the U.S. and likeminded democracies for decades to come. It would be regarded by the entire world, friend and foe alike, as a strategic defeat for the U.S., and produce a major shift toward Iran in the balance of power in the Greater Middle East.

Iran would be emboldened to further endanger American vital national interests world-wide. Terrorist organizations everywhere would be given a major lift, some through direct support from Tehran. Israel's very existence would be called into question. And the nonproliferation regime could be dramatically, perhaps fatally, undermined. If Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and other Muslim states followed the Iranian nuclear example, for how long could a nuclear war in be avoided in this violent part of the world? John McCain sums it up: "In the end, there is only one thing worse than military action, and that is a nuclear-armed Iran."

Given the extraordinary stakes involved, ignoring the military option and hoping that we will somehow be rescued by sanctions, new negotiating mechanisms, or the Iranian mullahs is a serious mistake. We should instead follow Nehru's advice: "Risks and deadlocks when they occur at least have this advantage, that they force us to think." The distinguished French strategist Thérèse Delpech has been doing precisely that and warns, "The Iranian nuclear programme is progressing more rapidly than anticipated . . . and Tehran shows it has learned from Pyongyang that brinksmanship brings rewards." We may not have years to debate these historic policy choices. We should do so now before the gathering storm with Iran arrives with full force.

Mr. Blackwill, president of Barbour Griffith & Rogers International (a Republican lobbying and consulting firm), was U.S. ambassador to India from 2001-2003, deputy national security adviser for strategic planning and presidential envoy to Iraq in 2003-2004.

Rice Makes The Right Move On Iran (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0030883

PRESIDENT BUSH HAS MADE A U-TURN on Iran — and not a moment too soon. Just as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was about to get on a plane to Vienna for talks on Iran, she announced a courageous and historic about-face that offers hope of ending the hostility that has marked U.S. relations with Iran since 1979.

That said, the chances of negotiating a verifiable, permanent end to Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program are slim. Iran's anti-Semitic, nationalistic president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, appears determined to produce nuclear weapons. But even if negotiations founder or fail, Bush's overture to Iran is as shrewd as it is welcome. Blame will rightly fall on Tehran if it fails to seize this opportunity.

Tehran's blustery initial response, dismissing the offer for talks as U.S. "propaganda," only shows how completely Bush's gambit caught the Iranians off guard. Several aspects of Wednesday's announcement indicate that the administration has done some serious thinking, and rethinking, on Iran.

First, despite Iran's history of mendacity with its nuclear program, Rice made a point Wednesday to acknowledge — twice — Iran's right to a civilian nuclear energy program. It was a necessary concession to Iran's pride in its program and to the fact that the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty allows for it.

Second, in a concession to both Iran and Europe, Rice said the U.S. would "actively support" greater European economic cooperation with Iran. This reverses decades of U.S. attempts to wreak economic pain on Iran. It also offers hope that China and Russia, which have strong economic ties to Iran and have opposed U.S. efforts to exert pressure on Iran at the U.N., may be more likely to support U.S. efforts.

Third, Rice demanded as a condition for talks that Iran "fully and verifiably suspends its enrichment and reprocessing activities."

That may sound tough, but it's actually a face-saving gesture. Tehran can agree to a temporary suspension — as it has previously done during negotiations with the Europeans — without backing off its position that it will resume enrichment any time it pleases. And the White House can tell the Iran bashers in Congress that its willingness to negotiate has had tangible rewards.

More broadly, Bush's move indicates a late-blooming maturity in foreign relations. A president frequently chided for refusing to admit error has not only changed his mind, he has reexamined one of the core principles of his foreign policy. Even before his inauguration, Bush's most senior advisors were adamant that the way to deal with "rogue regimes" was to freeze them out. And Iran was famously included in the "axis of evil" that Bush identified in 2002.

Iran is no less dangerous today than it was four years ago. And its near-immediate dismissal of this overture is not encouraging. Yet Rice arrives in Vienna not only with a new proposal but a new approach. That change may be the more important one and, in the end, the more consequential.

A Smart Approach To Iran (WP)

THE BUSH administration's offer yesterday to join negotiations with Iran was well tailored. By stating its readiness to join the European governments that have been negotiating with Tehran for several years, the administration may have defused an issue that was impeding its effort to win support for U.N. sanctions against Iran. Its concession was merely to acknowledge the reality that any enduring settlement of the Iranian nuclear threat will require direct U.S. participation. Yet the administration rightly insisted that Iran first suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing before any talks including the United States begin, and it linked its offer to a carrot-and-stick package of incentives and sanctions that would be presented to Iran in the coming days with the support of the Europeans and, possibly, China and Russia.

The packaging means that Iran won't achieve the symbolic breakthrough of talks with the United States -- something its regime and public deeply desire -- unless it suspends its nuclear work. If Iran rejects the offer, which will also include economic incentives, the result should be the passage of a Security Council resolution opening the way to sanctions. Crucially, European governments, and possibly Russia and China, will agree on the sanctions to be imposed even before the offer is made.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice still needs to firm up this elaborate piece of multilateral diplomacy in a meeting with the permanent Security Council members and Germany in Vienna today. There are some weak points: The Security Council resolution won't be voted on unless Iran rejects the offer, and there is no deadline for Tehran's response. Yet if Ms. Rice succeeds, Iran may well be presented with the "clear choice" she described yesterday between improved international relations and a relatively painful isolation.

That doesn't mean the Bush administration is anywhere near ending the threat from Iran. Most likely, the regime will try to dodge the choice it will be presented or reject it altogether. It will look for support to actors such as Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, who has publicly undercut the decisions of his own board and the Security Council by proposing that Iran be allowed to continue uranium reprocessing. Tehran also will count on the Bush administration's critics in Europe and Washington to decry the offer to negotiate as unworthy and to insist that the United States offer Iran unconditional bilateral negotiations on all issues.

Ms. Rice made it clear yesterday that no such "grand bargain" is on the table. Were the Bush administration to propose such a scheme, Iran would surely pocket the concession of de facto U.S. recognition while continuing to pursue its nuclear program. Fragile European support for sanctions would quickly give way to pressure on Washington to offer Tehran greater and greater concessions. If, on the other hand, Iran accepts the coming offer, it's possible that Iranian-U.S. talks could evolve into a larger discussion of security issues -- Iraq, Lebanon, global terrorism -- that would benefit both countries, though it's hard to imagine that happening under Iran's current government. For now, the administration has rightly put the focus on forcing Tehran -- not Washington -- to make a choice.

Condi's Iran Gambit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

When Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad publicly released a long, insulting letter seeking direct talks with the U.S. last month, President Bush dismissed it as unworthy of reply. But yesterday Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice delivered the real U.S. answer: Yes.

In a surprising policy reversal, Ms. Rice offered to negotiate directly with Iran's mullahs if they first suspend all uranium enrichment and cooperate with United Nations arms inspectors. The Secretary of State seems to have convinced Mr. Bush -- over the doubts of Vice President Cheney and others -- that this was the only way to prevent the U.S. from being isolated as our European allies ran for cover and Russia resisted any U.N. sanctions. How this new U.S. concession will impress the mullahs to give in is now Ms. Rice's burden to demonstrate. Good luck.

Granted, the offer has one big virtue: ending the three-year pretense that the so-called EU-3 -- Britain, France and Germany -- had any chance of ending Iran's nuclear ambitions. Time and again the not-so-big three had threatened "consequences" if Iran continued to enrich uranium, only to back down and force more concessions -- from Washington. The mullahs always wanted to talk directly to the U.S. for the implicit recognition such talks would convey, and now they have their wish.

In theory, Condi's gambit could help to expose Iran's real intentions should it refuse to negotiate seriously. In theory, too, a determined U.S. could use the direct talks to insist that Tehran undertake a Libyan-like dismantling of its nuclear facilities, complete with random and intrusive inspections. But yesterday's proposal demands nothing so comprehensive, and the potential sanctions supposedly on the table are still opposed by Russia and China. The ultimate sanction of military force isn't even hinted at, much less on the table.

Given the concessions he has already won by refusing to cooperate, Mr. Ahmadinejad won't be in any hurry to oblige now. Already yesterday, Iran was pocketing the direct-talks and demanding that any negotiation be "without pre-conditions." This was entirely predictable, and you can bet this new Iranian demand will soon be echoed in Paris, Moscow and all too many precincts in Washington.

It was good to hear Presidential spokesman Tony Snow yesterday describe that enrichment pre-condition as the "foundation stone" of the new U.S. proposal. But will Ms. Rice and her main ally in this windmill tilt -- Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns -- soon be pressing Mr. Bush to make this concession too?

It's not as if Iran has met anybody even halfway on concerns about its nuclear program. The U.N. Security Council has already asked Iran to suspend uranium enrichment. But Iran's response to April's deadline was to announce it had enriched reactor grade uranium and is developing advanced centrifuges to do more -- perhaps as many as 3,000 by the end of this year.

Meanwhile, President Ahmadinejad continues to deny that the Holocaust ever happened, threatens to erase Israel from the face of the earth, taunts Mr. Bush about the coming collapse of democracy world-wide, abets the killing of Americans in Iraq, supports terror in Lebanon and elsewhere, and talks more generally about a coming conflict in which much of humanity will perish. We suppose it would serve Mr. Burns right if he has to negotiate with this zealot, except that the entire State Department seems almost as zealous in its pursuit of any kind of deal.

We'd like to think better, but one thing we didn't hear yesterday from Ms. Rice was any timeline for Iran to accept her offer. Tehran will surely attempt to delay as long as possible, giving it time to build more centrifuges and further harden its nuclear facilities. Mr. Burns could soon be talking to an Iranian Le Duc Tho about the shape of the Geneva negotiating table.

Perhaps the most dispiriting part of this new diplomacy is the signal it will send to Iran's internal opposition. The regime is wildly unpopular, but it will use this implicit U.S. recognition to show that it has earned new world respect. It will also demand that the U.S. cease its support for democrats inside the country, and voices in Europe and at State will want to do the same. We hope Mr. Bush has vetoed that kind of appeasement. We hope, too, that he'll continue to put pressure on the mullahs by interdicting Iranian terror financing, and shipping under the Proliferation Security Initiative, where warranted.

Iran's relentless drive for a nuclear weapon is a difficult problem, and perhaps Ms. Rice is right that direct diplomacy is essential to expose Iran's real purposes. But given Iran's track record, we'd say the Secretary has walked her President out on a limb where the pressure will soon build on him to make even more concessions. If this gambit fails, she'll have succeeded mainly in giving the mullahs more time to become a terrorist nuclear power.

Though Late, Offer To Talk To Iran Will Only Benefit U.S. (USAT)

Can Iran be persuaded to give up its race for nuclear weapons?

On Wednesday, the Bush administration took a big step to try to do just that. After more than five years of steadfastly rejecting negotiations with Iran — which calls the United States the "Great Satan" — the administration announced it would, after all, sit down at the table, along with three European allies.

There's one precondition: Iran first has to suspend its enrichment of uranium.

The administration's policy turnaround is welcome and badly needed. The question is why it took so long. Whatever happens, the offer of talks strengthens any serious U.S. efforts to halt Iran's nuclear program.

Here's why.

Every significant agreement in recent history — from Cold War weapons reductions to Libya's abandonment of its nuclear program — has involved negotiations involving the United States, the world's superpower.

Talks with Iran, if they occur, might just succeed. That's a long shot, of course, but it would be the best outcome.

The more likely outcome is that Iran either spurns talks or that talks fail. Initial reactions from Tehran on Wednesday were indeed negative; the official Iranian news agency called the U.S. offer "a propaganda move."

If the Iranians refuse to negotiate, the Bush administration will be in a stronger position to orchestrate tough punitive measures, beginning with sanctions. It could not be accused, as it was over Iraq, of not exhausting diplomatic options.

The dangers Iran poses to the United States and the world cannot be overstated. It is a fundamentalist Middle Eastern country that sponsors terrorism. Its volatile president says he wants to destroy Israel.

Iran insists that its nuclear program is for generating power, but it has a history of deceit and hiding nuclear activities from United Nations inspectors. It has toyed with other nations that have tried negotiations.

Why would Iran even consider suspending its nuclear program for a vague offer of talks? Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice laid out the considerable reasons: a supervised nuclear energy program, trade and economic benefits, the possible start of a positive U.S.-Iranian relationship.

To date, the Bush administration has spurned traditional diplomacy at great cost. In the Persian Gulf War of 1991, diplomacy persuaded allies to join in and foot most of the bill. In the current Iraq war, the go-it-alone U.S. approach has had a devastating cost in lives, money and reputation.

This apparent return to more patient diplomacy is a wise, and overdue, shift.

No More Excuses (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

For the past few months, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has seemed so pleased with himself. He's been popping up here and there spouting off about exterminating Israel with the air of a man who thinks he has the world literally over a barrel — who feels himself fully on the offensive and in control.

But that changed yesterday, when Condoleezza Rice announced her willingness to talk with Iran about nukes so long as Iran suspended its enrichment program first. As Robert Kagan of the Carnegie Endowment notes, in a swoop the U.S. has put itself back in front of events. It's taken the initiative away from Ahmadinejad and Vladimir Putin, and it's created a series of problems for Tehran.

What Rice did was set off a chain of events that could lead to a U.N. resolution on Iranian sanctions as early as July. Diplomats, book your New York hotel rooms today.

Yesterday's policy shift really began in late April, as Rice returned from a visit to Baghdad and decided it was time to bring the dispute with Iran to a head. The European Union negotiations were dissolving into disharmony and confusion. There were some indications that Iran was accelerating its nuclear program. It was clear that Iran was winning.

Rice decided to shake things up. What she had to do, to borrow the metaphor of one senior administration official, was to take the cue ball and smash it into all the other balls on the table, and so open up room for future maneuvering.

This in itself was a gutsy maneuver, for in deciding to get so active she was essentially betting her career on her ability to deal with Iran.

Quickly, President Bush and Rice agreed upon a course of action that was neither passivity nor bombing. They decided to accelerate the diplomatic process. They did this with no expectations that Iran would agree to negotiate away its nuclear program. There are no optimists in this administration about the prospects for diplomacy (though there are varying degrees of pessimism).

Instead, Bush and Rice concluded that it was necessary to exhaust diplomatic alternatives, in order to make international sanctions possible later. The U.S. had to remove everybody else's excuses for inaction.

Bush and Rice told their European and Chinese allies they would be willing to talk with Iran so long as it was in a group, so long as the Iranians suspended their enrichment program, so long as the Europeans agreed to really stick by this precondition, and so long as the Europeans, Russians and Chinese agreed in writing to a menu of sanctions to be imposed if talks never got off the ground.

Reaching agreement on all this was no easy task. And there are some who wonder if the U.S. could have persuaded the Europeans to accept even tougher sanctions. The allies have agreed that if diplomacy fails they will jointly separate Iranian banks from the world banking system, and choke off Tehran's access to reserve currencies. But there is no mention of an oil or gas embargo. Dennis Ross, the former Clinton envoy, who supports the administration's course, suggests that Iran will not fundamentally rethink its policy unless it is convinced that the U.S. is so determined to prevent Iran from getting the bomb that it is willing to impose pain on itself.

Still, the accomplishments over the past few weeks have been impressive. Bush and Rice have created a coherent policy. They have organized the Europeans, Russians and Chinese around that policy. They have put Iran on the defensive, and forced the different factions in the regime to argue about what sort of country they wish to become. (Yesterday's public blast from Tehran was anticipated and discounted.)

Even the rollout was masterful. I called experts around the world yesterday afternoon, and all of them seemed to have just gotten off the phone with a senior administration official (or two), and all were positive about what had been achieved.

It's still hard to believe the international community can really get its act together. (Have the U.S. and the Russians and the Chinese really forged an agreement on sanctions, or just fudged their differences?) But this display of competence causes me to remember that over the past several weeks this administration has done a number of things well (the nominations of Michael Hayden and Henry Paulson, to name just two). Maybe there's life in this presidency yet.

Palestinians Hit Home In Sederot (NYT)

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

JERUSALEM, May 31 — A Palestinian rocket slammed into a residential area in southern Israel early Wednesday, hitting a house about 100 yards from the home of Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz.

No one was hurt, but the rocket damaged the house in Sederot, a working-class town that is most often the target of the Palestinian fire from the northern Gaza Strip.

Mr. Peretz said he was awakened by a siren that alerts Sederot residents to incoming rockets. The Israeli military said three rockets had been fired, and the Palestinian faction Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility.

Mr. Peretz visited the damaged house and said the military would "take actions that prevent these organizations from firing toward Sederot and other communities."

Later Wednesday, the Israeli military fired artillery rounds into northern Gaza. No casualties were immediately reported.

US Envoy Urges 'Bold' Egypt Reforms (AFP)

AFP, May 31, 2006

United States ambassador to Egypt Francis J. Ricciardone urged Egypt to pursue "bold" reforms, but insisted that Washington has no interest in drastic changes that could spark chaos.

"Contrary to folklore, we do not, we do not confuse change with chaos. We do support bold but well-managed, wisely-led, purposeful change," Ricciardone told the annual meeting of the American Chamber of Commerce in Egypt.

Washington has spoken out recently against Egypt's strong arm tactics against the opposition, including the jailing of prominent opposition leader Ayman Nur and crackdowns against anti-government demonstrations.

"America supports and encourages not only the Government of Egypt, but also those independent forces and voices of opposition who champion these goals," Ricciardone said.

The US ambassador described as "very harsh" the five-year jail sentence of opposition leader Ayman Nur for fraud in what Egypt insists is a criminal not a political case.

"Even criminal cases that involve politicians, are not entirely criminal. There is a political dimension," he said.

"The man who ran for president and came in second, lost the elections by a great margin, ended up before the courts and got what appears to Americans a very harsh sentence," he said.

"I would have wished that it turned out differently."

Ayman Nur came a distant second in last year's presidential elections which saw Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak win 88 percent of the votes.

Egypt, a leading recipient of US economic and military aid, has received more than 60 billion dollars since 1979, including 34 billion dollars in foreign military financing credits to buy US material and services.

In recent weeks, Egyptian police detained hundreds of pro-reform protesters who had come out to support the judiciary in their call for independence from the executive body.

Bush Offers To Help Catch Rwanda Criminals (AP-Y2)

AP2, May 31, 2006

President Bush called the 1994 genocide of a half-million people in Rwanda "one of the most significant tragedies in modern history" and said the United States would give any help the country wanted to track down those responsible who are still at large.

In an Oval Office meeting Wednesday with President Paul Kagame of Rwanda, Bush also pledged to help repay the country for troops that it has sent to deal with another genocide — a violent conflict raging in Sudan's Darfur region that has left 180,000 people dead and an additional 2 million homeless.

Bush said the money will come from a supplemental spending bill that is being considered by Congress that also includes funding for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan and to aid Hurricane Katrina victims.

"I told the president that sometimes the Congress doesn't move as quickly as I'd like on issues, but I'm confident they'll get the supplemental passed when they come back from their Memorial Day break," Bush said.

Bush credited Kagame with trying to bring reconciliation to his country. He said Kagame offered to help with similar efforts in Iraq.

"But the way I look at the situation is that Rwanda can serve as an example for other societies that are troubled," Bush said.

"To the extent that he wants our help in finding certain perpetuators of crime, we'll be glad to do so," Bush said.

Kagame thanked Bush for U.S. support in sending troops to Darfur, combating HIV/AIDS, supporting private investments and building infrastructure.

Darfur Rebels Refuse To Sign Peace Deal (AP)

By Ali H. Zerdin

AP, June 1, 2006

A Darfur rebel group Wednesday again rejected a peace deal aimed at ending three years of fighting that has killed at least180,000 people and forced more than 2 million flee their homes in Sudan's western region.

The African Union-drafted accord was signed May 5 by the government and main Sudan Liberation Movement, but both a splinter group of the Liberation Movement and the Justice and Equality Movement have resisted international calls to accept the deal.

Khalil Ibrahim, who heads the Justice and Equality Movement, rejected the pact saying it does not provide "a fair share of resources and power" for his group.

Ibrahim spoke after meeting Slovene President Janez Drnovsek, who is seeking to mediate the crisis.

"We want a fair peace agreement," Ibrahim said.

The African Union had called on Ibrahim's group and the other faction to sign on to the deal by Wednesday.

There was no indication on what would occur if they didn't meet that deadline.

Drnovsek called on all sides to continue negotiating. Ibrahim called on the United Nations and the European Union "not to close the door for peace in Darfur."

The Justice and Equality Movement is the smallest of the chief Darfur rebel groups and is linked to Sudan's leading fundamentalist Islamic ideologue Hassan Turabi, while the other rebel groups in the predominantly Muslim region are seen as secular.

Darfur has been torn by violence since rebel groups made up of ethnic Africans rose up against the Arab-led Khartoum government in 2003. The government is accused of responding by unleashing Arab militias known as the Janjaweed who have been blamed for some of the war's worst atrocities. Khartoum denies backing the Janjaweed but has said it will try to rein them in since the deal was signed.

Ensuring the Janjaweed respect the cease-fire is key to persuading Darfur rebels to comply with the peace deal, but there have been several Janjaweed attacks since then, U.N. officials said.

The AU's 7,200 peacekeepers in Darfur have largely been ineffective in stopping atrocities and re-establishing security, leaving tens of thousands of people in camps, with little food or water.

The Sudanese government had said the peace deal opened the way to a U.N. force for Darfur, but has moved only with reluctance to help the U.N. prepare to get peacekeepers on the ground.

AU Deadline Passes For Holdout Rebels To Sign Darfur Peace Deal (AFP)

By Lea-Lisa Westerhoff

AFP, May 31, 2006

A midnight African Union deadline for holdout Darfur rebels to agree to a peace deal for the troubled western Sudanese region passed with no new signatories, AU officials said.

Despite intense pressure and threats of sanctions on the two rebel groups that have thus far rejected the pact and signs that dissident factions might sign on at the last minute, AU officials said no such overtures had been made.

At the same time, they said the pan-African body might be willing to accept signatures to the May 5 agreement on Thursday, considering logistical problems would-be signers may have had in meeting the May 31 deadline.

"No one has called to say they will sign but they know how to reach us," a senior AU official told AFP at the bloc's headquarters in Addis Ababa after the 2100 GMT deadline passed. "We'll see what happens (Thursday) morning and consider it."

Noureddine Mezni, a spokesman for the AU Mission in Sudan (AMIS), told AFP in Khartoum that AU commission chief Alpha Oumar Konare Konare would on Thursday "indicate the next steps to be taken."

The holdout groups have refused to sign the accord aimed at ending three years of conflict in Darfur, which has left some 300,000 people dead and 2.4 million homeless.

While the main wing of the region's Sudan Liberation Movement (SLM) did sign the AU-brokered deal, a splinter faction and the Justice and Equality Movement (JEM) have refused, saying it fails to address their concerns.

Shortly before the deadline expired, Mezni said efforts were still underway by southern Sudan ex-rebel chief, now Sudanese First Vice President, Salva Kiir to "persuade those who did not sign" the pact to do so.

A source close to the negotiations said Kiir had received a delegation led by Konare's Sudan envoy, Baba Gana Kingibe, and that he would himself soon host talks between the AU and holdout rebels in the south of the country.

On Wednesday, AU officials in Addis Ababa said a group claiming to represent a JEM splinter faction had arrived there to meet officials just hours before the deadline.

"We have been approached by a certain number of groups who are favorable to the DPA," AU Peace and Security Council commissioner Said Djinnit told reporters, referring to the Darfur Peace Agreement.

Diplomats in the Ethiopian capital said the alleged JEM dissidents were prepared to sign the deal even after a spokesman for the group said it could not agree unless substantial changes were made.

Mezni said AU officials were drawing up a new document that would allow dissident factions and commanders to escape sanctions.

"We are finalising a different document, a mechanism will be put in place to receive the signatures of groups and individuals who have chosen the path of peace," he said.

A source close to the AU said seven field commanders from Abdel Wahid Mohammed al-Nur's holdout SLM faction had arrived in Addis Ababa to join the peace process "and before that many others did the same."

Nur himself has said he will not sign unless Khartoum agrees to pay compensation and give his SLM wing a greater security role and a say in local and federal government.

Officials involved in the peace effort have warned Nur he risks becoming "irrelevant" if he does not sign, but his group's absence from the accord will likely plunge Darfur into further violence.

The SLM founder represents the Fur tribe, Darfur's largest, and has insisted on more concessions from the Sudanese government, which stands accused by Washington of perpetrating genocide in Darfur.

The SLM's other faction, led by Minni Minnawi, is the only group to have signed up to the deal.

The Abuja accord, signed on May 5, provides for a more equitable distribution of power and wealth, the disarming of the pro-government Janjaweed militias and a referendum on the future of Darfur.

Machete-wielding Youths Fight In E. Timor (AP-Y2)

By Anthony Deutsch

AP2, May 31, 2006

Machete-wielding youths battled in East Timor's capital Wednesday amid burning and looting as more foreign troops bolstered a force struggling to stop the unrest that has destabilized the country.

More than 100,000 residents of Dili have fled their homes to escape the violence, an aid official said.

Australia, which has provided the vast bulk of the more than 2,000 international security forces trying to control the city, suggested that a semi-permanent contingent may be needed to help East Timor restore order.

After a lull in violence Tuesday, street fights broke out in several parts of the smoldering city Wednesday. Roaming bands of youths fired sling shots, threw rocks and hacked rivals with machetes.

Australian forces spent several tense hours on the main airport road trying unsuccessfully to keep the warring parties apart. Some patrols rolled past scenes of violence and arson without intervening.

Australian army medics treated a man who suffered head and back wounds after being attacked with a machete. At least eight people were hospitalized with machete wounds, and three of them were in critical condition, a hospital official said.

More than 100,000 people have fled their homes, said Kym Smithies, a spokeswoman for about 30 private aid groups operating in the country. More than 70,000 were in camps in the capital and another 30,000 had fled the city altogether, she said.

The violence is the worst in East Timor since its bloody break from Indonesia in 1999, which paved the way for full independence in 2002 after years of U.N. administration. It remains one of the world's poorest countries and is dependent on foreign aid.

The fighting was triggered by the dismissal in March of 600 soldiers from the 1,400-member army. Sporadic clashes last week between the disgruntled soldiers and government troops spiraled into open street violence in Dili, and at least 27 people have died.

Much of the antagonism on the streets is between East Timorese from the "east" — perceived to be pro-independence — and those from the "west," believed to be sympathetic to Indonesia.

Australia has 1,300 front-line troops in East Timor and several hundred military personnel supporting them.

New Zealand's contingent of almost 200 troops began arriving in force Wednesday, deploying from military cargo planes carrying packs and rifles.

More than 330 Malaysian troops are in place, and some 120 Portuguese paramilitaries are due by week's end.

President Xanana Gusmao said late Tuesday he had invoked emergency powers and taken over the government's security role to try to end a political deadlock that has contributed to the rampant lawlessness.

Foreign troops appeared to be flexing newly given powers to detain suspects, not just disarm them, and parts of the city appeared calm Wednesday.

Australian troops arrested 10 suspects in one burnt-out neighborhood. Within eyesight of the troops, houses were broken into and set ablaze.

Defense Minister Brendan Nelson suggested that an international security force might be needed to help ensure "the political, financial, legal and social reconstruction of East Timor over the near and longer term." He said Australia could lead such a force.

In Canberra, Australia's military chief, Air Chief Marshal Angus Houston, said he expected the peacekeeping mission to last at least six months.

East Timor's Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri — whom many blame for the crisis — rejected calls for his resignation.

"I will be prime minister until the next election," he told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio.

On Wednesday, 15 major aid donors — including Australia, the United States, the EU, the Asian Development Bank, International Monetary Fund and the World Bank — urged the feuding parties to stop.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said he hoped residents would heed Gusmao's appeal to turn in weapons to the peacekeepers.

"It's really sad and tragic that we have to relive this situation again in East Timor," he said.

Pope Benedict XVI also appealed for an end to the violence in the country, which is predominantly Roman Catholic.

Rebel leader Maj. Alfredo Reinado said the crisis would not end until Alkatiri — whom the rebels accuse of discrimination — is ousted.

"The prime minister should go," Reinado told The Associated Press by telephone from a rebel redoubt in the hills surrounding Dili. "Why doesn't he just leave? Do more people need to be killed?"

ETimor Violence Returns As Rebels Reject Move (AFP-Y2)

By Neil Sands

DOJ_NMG_0030891

AFP, May 31, 2006

East Timor's rebel leader rejected an agreement designed to end days of violence in the tiny nation that has forced tens of thousands to flee and demanded the sacking of the embattled prime minister.

As gang violence and arson attacks again broke out across the capital Dili, Major Alfredo Reinado said Wednesday President Xanana Gusmao made a "mistake" by assuming emergency powers but not sacking Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri.

"It's not a solution. He is a criminal and should not be allow to stay as prime minister," Reinado told AFP. "That is the mistake that the president has made."

Reinado spoke from his base outside Dili, where he is holed up with nearly half the 1,400-strong military, who were sacked by Alkatiri after going on strike over alleged discrimination against troops from the west of the nation.

Battles between the renegade troops and the remains of the military spiralled last week into mob violence in the streets, with rival eastern and western gangs fighting and torching homes and shops.

The UN refugee agency said it was setting up an airlift to help about 65,000 people who have fled the fighting.

An emergency team from the office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) in Dili found that the displaced people were in critical need of food, clean water and shelter, the agency said in a statement.

The initial airlift of tents and other supplies from UNHCR stocks in the Middle East is for 30,000 people.

Another 35,000 are thought to have fled to the countryside for safety, the agency added.

As the president and prime minister squabbled over the emergency powers, some here wondered whether Gusmao -- a former guerrilla leader and national hero for leading the nation to independence -- could deliver peace again.

"The first time yes but not now," Elite Pinto told AFP when asked if the president could bring peace to the nation.

On Wednesday, gangs moved towards the airport in the late afternoon where they set fire to a roadside market.

About 30 youths, many with bandanas hiding their faces and using knives, rocks and slingshots, converged on the market near Dili's airport, urged on by a man standing on the back of a motorbike shouting: "Attack, attack."

They torched eight makeshift kiosks and two buildings -- a shop and a house, both of which appeared unoccupied at the time.

International troops arrived in about 10 armoured personnel carriers to disarm the youths and re-open the airport road.

A block of homes and shops in Becora, one of the capital's most dangerous areas, was torched before dawn. Many houses were unoccupied as frightened locals have been spending the nights in shelters.

"They were surprise attacks. When we woke up and came over here we found that our house had been burned," Carlos Soares told AFP as he picked through the remains of his home.

The commander of the international forces called in by the government to last week to quell the unrest, Australian Brigadier Mick Slater, said the situation had improved.

"Things are starting to stabilise," he told reporters.

The international military presence of 2,250 troops from Australia, Malaysia and New Zealand was boosted with the arrival of another 42 New Zealanders, bringing their contingent to full strength of 120. Some 120 Portuguese paramilitaries are due to leave Friday morning for East Timor, a bit later than scheduled to accommodate the opening hours at Dili's airport.

After two days of crisis talks in the capital, the hugely popular Gusmao on Tuesday announced 30 days of emergency rule and the sacking of the defence and interior ministers.

In a statement he said he was "implementing the necessary measures to prevent the violence and avoid further fatalities" as well as for the "rapid re-establishment of public order".

Reinado would not comment on whether the rebels were ready to surrender their weapons.

Alkatiri denied that Gusmao had full control of the military, insisting he still commanded wide support, but Foreign Minister Jose Ramos Horta appeared to contradict him.

"Any decision on security and defence matters will be made by President Gusmao in cooperation with the Australian force commander," Horta told Australian radio.

He said the government still needed "significant change" to stop the unrest and indicated a cabinet reshuffle could be expected in the next few days.

U.S., Vietnam Seal Pact, Lift WTO Obstacle (WT)

By Jeffrey Sparshott

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

The U.S. yesterday signed off on an agreement that will allow Vietnam into the World Trade Organization.

The pact removes one of the last hurdles barring the communist nation from joining the world's capitalist club.

"This truly is an historic step in the relationship between our two countries," Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia said in Ho Chi Minh City.

The U.S. evacuated the city, then known as Saigon, in 1975 at the end of a war that cost more than 58,000 American lives. The countries have since slowly rebuilt political and economic ties, and are poised to permanently normalize trade relations.

Congress still must vote on WTO membership for Vietnam. The Bush administration hopes that will happen this summer.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, Maryland Democrat and a party leader on trade issues, said both parties are likely to have concerns about Vietnam's human rights record as well as its export of manufactured goods such as textiles.

"But there is broad support among Democrats and Republicans to support Vietnam's admission into the WTO," he said.

U.S. business groups widely favor WTO membership for Vietnam as a way to open the country's market and to ensure it plays by global trade rules. But apparel and textile manufacturers oppose the pact.

The deal lifts barriers to bilateral trade, opening opportunities for U.S. companies but also eliminating quotas that capped Vietnam's fast-growing exports of clothing and fabric to the U.S.

"This deal is a disaster for U.S. manufacturing, and the U.S. textile industry in particular," said Auggie Tantillo, executive director of the American Manufacturing Trade Action Coalition.

Mr. Bhatia dismissed textile and apparel concerns during a May 22 briefing in Washington, saying the pact included safeguards to protect the industry.

Apparel is the top U.S. import from Vietnam, valued at $2.9 billion last year -- 55 times greater than it was in 2000. Furniture, footwear, coffee and seafood -- mostly shrimp and catfish -- are other major imports. Aircraft, worth $346 million, was the major U.S. export to Vietnam. The U.S. ran a $5.4 billion trade deficit with Vietnam last year.

Congress in 2002 voted 338-91 to allow President Bush to temporarily normalize trade relations with Vietnam. Mr. Bush has since renewed that status each year.

The country is denied permanent normal trade relations under a 1974 law that links trade to freedom of emigration.

Vietnam also must settle details of its membership with a WTO committee, likely postponing formal membership to at least until the fall.

Countries aspiring to join the WTO must reach terms with each of the body's 149 members, though the biggest economies -- including the U.S. and the 25-nation European Union -- typically set the most rigorous terms.

The U.S. was the last major economy to sign off on Vietnam's accession, a capstone to normalization of relations between the countries.

Vietnam began to reform its economy in the mid-1980s and steadily repaired ties with the U.S. through the 1990s. Congress approved a bilateral trade agreement in 2001.

Bolivia President Morales Says U.S. Seeks To Kill Him (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Jeb Blount

Bloomberg, June 1, 2006

May 31 (Bloomberg) -- Bolivian President Evo Morales said the U.S. organized teams to track down and kill him, according to a note published on the Bolivian presidential Web site.

Morales, speaking at the opening of a hospital that was built with help from Cuba in the town of Escoma, Bolivia, said he recently found out about the plots against him, the state newswire ABI said in the report on the presidential Web site.

The allegations are unfounded, U.S. Embassy in La Paz said in a statement sent to journalists by E-mail. Calls to the Bolivian presidential palace requesting comment were not returned.

For Venezuela, A Treasure In Oil Sludge (NYT)

By Juan Forero

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

PUERTO LA CRUZ, Venezuela — The sludge in the glass jar on David Nelson's bookshelf here is thicker than molasses and was once thought worthless. But the Chevron Corporation, whose operations he runs in eastern Venezuela, has spent about $1 billion turning what was once called liquid coal into oil, helping transform a swath of scrub grass into a great frontier for oil production.

The region, the Orinoco Belt, is in fact so promising that President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela says it contains up to 235 billion barrels of recoverable oil; if true, the reserves would rival those of Saudi Arabia.

"We do know that the Orinoco is underdeveloped," said Mr. Nelson, 49, a geologist from California with 27 years' experience developing heavy-grade oil. "And the resources in the Middle East are at their midpoint."

This great, largely untapped treasure is pitting a leftist government aiming to use oil revenue for social programs against multinational corporations like Chevron, which were invited here a decade ago to develop the Orinoco Belt, a 54-square-mile area some 120 miles south of here.

With demand rising, worldwide supplies threatening to decline and oil prices near record levels, the struggle in this country underscores the growing debate between governments and oil companies worldwide over profits from technologically challenging but potentially lucrative oil fields — whether in the Caspian Sea, the Arctic tundra or here in the Orinoco region.

Venezuela will be the host for an OPEC meeting on June 1, where Mr. Chávez can be expected to emphasize his country's vast potential. It clearly has a lot to gain from the Orinoco, where daily oil production has slid to 2.6 million barrels, from 3.3 million barrels five years ago. To underline the region's potential, President Chávez has asked oil companies from as far away as China and Russia to certify the size of the hefty reserves.

Saudi Arabia, still the giant among world oil suppliers and the leading force in OPEC consultations, scoffs at such boasts.

Yet, what is under the ground here in Venezuela, the Western Hemisphere's largest oil-exporting nation, has become so valuable that companies throughout the world want to drill for more, and Mr. Chávez, who regards his government as revolutionary, wants it to have a larger slice of the earnings.

In Venezuela, foreign companies including Exxon Mobil, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, BP and Total of France could lose once-favorable terms and in essence be forced to transfer up to $8 billion in value to the government, just as some opportunities elsewhere are drying up.

The big oil companies are right to be rattled. In April, Mr. Chávez's populist government took control of 32 mostly marginal oil fields across Venezuela that had been managed by foreign concerns. Then on May 16, the National Assembly raised royalties on the four heavy crude oil projects of the Orinoco to 33.3 percent, from 16.6 percent, and is planning to increase taxes to 50 percent, from 34 percent.

The government says it is preparing to capture a bigger stake in the Orinoco — turning control of projects that produce 600,000 barrels a day over to Venezuela's state oil company, Petróleos de Venezuela. Energy officials say the government could take up to 60 percent control of the so-called strategic associations, as the projects are called. No timetable has been laid out, but leaders in the National Assembly, which is controlled by Mr. Chávez's forces, say it is only a matter of time.

"With the high price of petroleum on the market, we are going to share in the excess earnings of the strategic associations," Mario Isea, president of the assembly's hydrocarbons commission, which is allied with Mr. Chávez, said in an interview. "They have gone years without paying royalties and effectively paying commercial taxes instead of petroleum taxes."

In the mid-1990's, President Rafael Caldera's government, eager to develop oil discovered in the 1930's, opened the region to foreign investment because the state oil company had neither the capital nor the technology to develop the Orinoco's semisolid sludge. Oil prices were low, world supplies easily met demand and Venezuela had on its hands a crude oil so heavy, so filled with impurities, that it was not even known as oil, but rather bitumen.

But then, given a virtual tax holiday intended to stimulate investment — the royalty rate was 1 percent — the multinationals embarked on a process of drilling and, more recently, upgrades that permit refining Orinoco crude oil into a lighter, marketable product.

In the Hamaca field, an area the size of Houston that produces oil for Chevron, ConocoPhillips and the Venezuelan state company, oil now slurps through an octopus-like system of horizontal wells that reach out as far as 8,000 feet.

The drill bits are equipped with sensors that emit seismic signals measuring what they are passing through — whether rock, sandstone, fine shale, sand or clay.

"Obviously, we'd love to find deposits with sweet light crude in shallow fields," said Mr. Nelson, who carefully explains the complex challenges his company faces. "That's not where energy resources are, so we have to adapt."

Back in a control room near his office in this Caribbean port, geologists and engineers monitor wall-size screens and make quick decisions whether the drill needs to bore ahead, or move up or down.

The idea is to have the drill moving fast, at hundreds of feet an hour, into blue-shaded patches, which signal porous material that would contain crude oil.

"Our goal is to first find sand and once we find it, stay in it," said Mike Waite, a senior geophysicist who leads the team monitoring the drilling.

Just west of here, gunk from the Orinoco is turned into oil at the Jose Industrial Complex, a virtual city of pipes, water-treatment lagoons, smokestacks, pits and storage tanks. Since the first shipment of Hamaca oil left aboard the tanker Overseas Sophie two years ago, the project has produced an average of 180,000 barrels a day.

Mr. Nelson said the project, among the most intricate in the world, is worth it, "but you have to put some elbow grease into it."

"These projects are big," he said. "They're complicated. They have a lot of moving parts. You have a lot of complicated negotiations with governments. It's not a business of instant gratification."

All told, according to a recent Deutsche Bank report on the Orinoco projects, $17 billion has been invested, about $3.5 billion in the Hamaca project alone. Big energy companies, including some from Brazil and China, would like nothing more than free rein to ramp up investments and produce more.

Ali Moshiri, Chevron's Latin America exploration and production group chief, said in April that Venezuela needed $200 billion to develop the heavy oil reserves.

"There's a sense of urgency, not a sense of luxury," said Mr. Moshiri, who predicted that 90 percent of Venezuela's production would come from the Orinoco in the years ahead.

The government, to be sure, talks of increasing production to 5.8 million barrels a day by 2012, from 2.6 million barrels now. But Venezuela, which as a leading voice in the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries has advocated a particularly tough form of oil nationalism, wants to achieve this on its own terms.

Its energy minister, Rafael Ramírez, who is also the president of Petróleos de Venezuela, said in an interview that the deals that multinational companies signed with the government in the 1990's were "absurd," giving Venezuela little in return.

"They are beholden to their stockholders, and we are beholden to our country," Mr. Ramírez said.

Venezuelan officials contend that exploration and production in the Orinoco has become easy, even risk-free, with a barrel of oil costing less than $1 to produce, down from $2 in 1995.

Energy officials here assert that the multinationals exaggerated the technical challenges and costs, swindling the state.

They also argue that the companies have made extraordinary profits — and will continue to do so even with higher taxes and royalties.

"They have made a fortune," said Mr. Isea, the president of the hydrocarbons commission. "This remains an excellent business. I do not think anyone will leave."

Venezuelan officials say their measures are enshrined in a 2001 law that says the state oil company must have a 51 percent stake in projects; they sidestep questions about previous contracts being grandfathered in.

Mr. Ramírez and lawmakers also say that a 1945 hydrocarbons law permits the government to raise royalties when the price of oil goes up.

The foreign companies, trying to avoid controversy, do not publicly dispute the Venezuelan government's statements. But Larry Goldstein, president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation, an industry-supported analysis group in New York, said: "In Venezuela today, I don't believe contracts have meaning. And it affects the production, no matter what the Venezuelans say."

The game of oil brinkmanship continues, with Mr. Ramírez saying that the companies have few options.

"It's no secret for anyone that the big deposits, the giant ones, are finished," he said. "There are no new oil regions that compare to the Orinoco Belt."

The recent Deutsche Bank report agreed, saying that "few are likely to quickly turn their backs on reserves of the order seen in Venezuela."

"They may not like Chávez," the report added. "They may not like his regime. But they also know that he has probably done as much to support high oil prices through his rhetoric and posturing as any individual. This president is no fool. And at the end of the day, you go where the oil is."

Sudan And Angola Wait At Opec's Door (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries is considering enlarging its membership – for the first time in more than 30 years.

Oil ministers arriving in Caracas for a meeting on Thursday were awaiting the report of Nigeria, the group's current president, on invitations of membership to Sudan and Angola. The pair, who are observer members, are two of the world's fastest-growing oil producers. Angola's production is 1.25m barrels a day, having risen almost 80 per cent in the past decade. Sudan produces about 360,000 b/d.

Their membership would boost Opec's share of world oil supply from 41 per cent to 43 per cent. But the move would be likely to anger the US and China as well as almost every big international oil company.

Sudan is China's most important source of foreign oil assets and a rogue nation in US eyes. Angola is the most important new frontier for production and reserves for ExxonMobil and Chevron of the US, and Europe's BP, Total and Eni. Neither the companies, nor the Chinese want to be subject to forced output cuts, which could happen if Angola and Sudan joined Opec.

Khartoum has signalled it would like to join the group, while Luanda has been less enthusiastic. Many within Opec appear keen for the two to join, but cautioned that the process was by no means certain to end with both becoming members.

Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, Qatar's energy minister, has backed the plan, but said he was awaiting details. "I will support Sudan's membership in Opec. Opec is an organisation for exporting countries, and Sudan is exporting a lot of oil."

Russia and Kazakhstan have in the past decade been the two oil producers thought most likely to join Opec. Neither were invited nor made a formal approach.

Lebanon Seeks Way To Disarm Palestinian Militia Groups (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

NAAMEH, Lebanon, May 28 — The radical Palestinian militiamen operating a checkpoint here south of Beirut seemed to be from another era, vestiges of the bloody civil war in the 1970's and 80's.

But two days after missiles flew from southern Lebanon into northern Israel, prompting Israeli warplanes to pound local camps in the worst cross-border fighting in years, they were also something else: a challenge to the Lebanese government.

Lebanese politicians have begun focusing attention on the Palestinian militias as a critical security issue and have vowed to disarm them.

Palestinian refugees have played various crucial roles in the tangled history of Lebanon. For instance, Palestinian raids on Israel from Lebanese bases in the 1970's drew Israeli fire and episodes of occupation. Palestinian militias took sides in Lebanon's civil war, fighting so strongly that Syria was eventually drawn in as a counterweight, for the start of nearly 30 years of occupation.

The Palestinian militias that persist in Lebanon — and run checkpoints like the one in Naameh — are mostly rogue groups like Fatah Intifada and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command. Both are based in Syria; neither is part of the Palestine Liberation Organization. They are estimated to have fewer than 500 men between them.

But Lebanese officials note that in recent confrontations with the Lebanese Army, their ranks have swelled. The officials accuse Syria of resupplying them with weaponry.

"These are Syrian groups, not Palestinian groups," said the Druse leader Walid Jumblatt, a main leader of the anti-Syrian majority in Parliament. "As long as you have uncontrolled armed groups with the pretext of liberation, Lebanon will not have stability."

In mid-May one group clashed with Lebanese Army soldiers in the Bekaa region, the third incident of its kind in a year.

"The clashes have challenged the government's ability to build a state," said Ghassan Moukheiber, a member of Parliament with the Free Patriotic Movement of Gen. Michel Aoun, which is allied to Hezbollah. "This has become a call on the Lebanese government to define its defense strategy and its policy."

Last month Lebanon's numerous factions, meeting for a national dialogue to settle political issues like the future of President Émile Lahoud and the future of the militias, unanimously agreed that the Palestinian groups should disarm and return to refugee camps. Officials pointed to Hezbollah's participation as a sign that the talk might produce results.

The government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, conscious of the destabilizing potential of the Palestinian groups, has insisted that they be disarmed through negotiations, not force, adding to skepticism that anything will happen. Lebanese groups have yet to agree on a plan for the disarming.

"We don't want to repeat the mistakes of the past," said Khalil Makkawi, a former Lebanese ambassador to the United Nations, who heads the committee negotiating with the groups to disarm.

"We know our history, and we have seen a scenario like this in 1975," he said, referring to the outbreak of the Lebanese civil war. "So we intend to do this peacefully."

Mr. Makkawi's committee began a groundbreaking dialogue with the Palestine Liberation Organization and other Palestinian groups earlier this month to improve conditions in Lebanon's sprawling refugee camps. The refugees there, who now number some 500,000, are not allowed to work in professional fields or own property.

The effort has also included the reopening of the P.L.O.'s office in Beirut after almost 30 years. But so far, Mr. Makkawi said, the effort has been hindered by the inability of the Palestinians to agree on a unified delegation that can negotiate with the government.

Ostensibly, Mr. Makkawi's effort aims to get Palestinians out of militias by opening work opportunities and improving their living conditions.

The most troubling aspect of the violence on Sunday, Mr. Makkawi and other officials say, is that no group took responsibility for the initial rocket barrage into Israel that set off the violence, raising the possibility that the attack was meant more to encourage Israeli reprisal than to strike a blow across the border.

"There are people on our soil undertaking dangerous acts and putting Lebanon in a difficult situation," Mr. Makkawi said. "You've got a really dangerous situation when you have people using Lebanese territory and you don't even know who they are."

Early Sunday morning, a militant group fired several Katyusha rockets into northern Israel, setting off Israeli airstrikes and an afternoon of bombardments by Israeli forces and Hezbollah guerrillas. The incident was the worst bout of fighting since Israel withdrew from southern Lebanon in 2000.

The Palestinian militant group Islamic Jihad, one of whose leaders was assassinated in southern Lebanon on Friday, vigorously denied a role and dismissed as a hoax a statement of responsibility in its name faxed to news agencies. Hezbollah, which controls the southern border sections of Lebanon, insisted that it had no idea who was responsible for the rocket attack.

But Hezbollah is the primary target of the United Nations resolution on disarming militias and so may have the most to lose if that is done. Mr. Jumblatt and others have accused its leaders of dragging their feet on the issue.

"We have agreed to deal with this issue peacefully," said Ahmad Malli, a member of Hezbollah's political leadership. "But Lebanese will not be pulled into a fight for anyone."

Voters Opt For Change In S. Korea (CSM)

By Donald Kirk

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

SEOUL, SOUTH KOREA - At a crowded bus stop, a young man on an election day holiday from his university talks about why he and most people he knew opposed the party of the left-of-center President Roh Moo-hyun in Wednesday's local elections. "He does nothing," says Park Jin Han. "He talks a lot, but he has no program and no ideas."

The perception of a central government unable to deal with economic problems and weak in the face of North Korean demands lies at the crux of a reaction that guaranteed conservative victories in two-thirds of the races for provincial governorships and mayors of major cities.

For Korea, the reversion to conservatism portends the downfall of a decade of liberal leadership in the next presidential election in December 2007. While the ruling party's efforts at reconciliation with North Korea were not the paramount issue, the sense of forever making concessions to the North was a factor in the voting - and could be among the policies that change if the liberals are ousted next year.

"We are sick of their policies," says a retired economist, after voting for all six conservative candidates on the ballot in his district here. "It is not just the economy or North Korea," he adds. "They are all mingled together. It is everything."

At press time, early returns showed candidates from the Grand National Party (GNP) leading in 13 of 16 key regional posts, including races for mayor of this capital city as well as Pusan, Korea's second city and biggest port. The ruling Uri Party appeared to be leading in only one race.

The GNP leader, Park Geun-hye, helped her party score the decisive victory though not herself a candidate in Wednesday's election. She gained sympathy in the middle of the campaign after a deranged attacker who held Uri Party membership stabbed her with a box-cutter, shouting that he wanted to kill her in the name of "democracy."

Ms. Park is the daughter of President Park Chung Hee, assassinated by his intelligence chief in 1979 after 18 years in power.

Recovering from her wound, Park appeared on election day smiling confidently, clearly a leading contender for her party's presidential nomination. The other conservative contender, Lee Myung Bak, outgoing mayor of Seoul, appeared equally confident, riding a wave of popularity reflecting aggressive building and cleanup programs, notably rehabilitation of a stream running through the center of the capital.

On the issue of North Korea, the GNP favors a firmer line than the Roh government's policy of accommodating Pyongyang - a policy that has caused friction with Washington. North Korean media in recent days have blasted the conservatives, charging Washington with wanting to establish a "puppet regime" in South Korea.

"There's no reason for this government always to be at odds with the United States," says Chang Ki Tak, an office worker. "You have all these leftists in the government who want to destroy relations with Washington, and then send their children to the States."

Indeed, the election results confirm a groundswell of discontent in which Mr. Roh and his top aides are seen as weak and ineffective in ways that might escape the notice of foreigners focused either on a steadily rising gross domestic product or periodic anti-American outbursts.

"The biggest companies get rich, but small and medium enterprise is suffering," says a shopkeeper, Kim Myung Chul. "I know a lot of people are unable to make money. Some are closing down or leaving the country."

Factor in the skyrocketing price of real estate, and middle-class Koreans begin to feel almost dispossessed. Two- and three-bedroom apartments in the fashionable and convenient districts south of the Han River cost at least $2 million or $3 million apiece, leaving young professionals to commute long distances from suburbs where apartments may go for more than $1 million each.

Exacerbating the financial crunch, thousands of recent graduates are failing to find jobs for which they have trained, creating an alliance of sorts between a disillusioned middle-class and restive youths who need to get careers on track.

"Maybe 1 in 5 graduates get work right after graduation," says Kim Hye Suu, who graduated from a leading university several years ago and earns money teaching English and translating. "Many go on to graduate school when they can't find anything or they travel abroad for a while."

India's Economic Growth Ratchets Up To 9.3% (WSJ)

By Peter Wonacott And P.R. Venkat

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

NEW DELHI -- India's economy grew 9.3% in the quarter ended March 31 from a year earlier, marking a broad display of momentum on par with China's red-hot growth.

Growth in India's fiscal fourth-quarter -- fueled by surprisingly strong farm production and vibrant consumer spending -- beat the forecasts of most analysts as well as the official estimate.

Based on the buoyant quarterly result, the government's Central Statistical Organization lifted its figure of gross-domestic-product growth in the fiscal year that ended in March to 8.4%, up from an 8.1% estimate.

India's solid recent economic performance has raised the prospect of two Asian giants expanding at double-digit rates, spinning off new jobs and buying more of what the world grows and produces.

But while both China and India are emerging as growth engines for the global economy, commodity markets are showing the strain of their newly developed bulk. Both countries have been importing large amounts of crude oil while China is buying base metals, pushing up prices for these products. The nations' fast growth is likely to mean that high commodity prices won't ease soon.

"Supply and demand conditions are already tight," says Shuchita Mehta, an economist at Standard Chartered Bank in Mumbai.

Both India and China are trying to spur galloping growth to help lift hundreds of millions of residents -- mostly in rural areas -- out of poverty. China's economy grew 9.9% last year, and is expected to expand almost as rapidly in 2006. For his nation, Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has set a goal of double-digit growth within three years.

But in trying to achieve accelerated growth, India's economy in particular faces a number of obstacles. Several industries remain relatively closed, shielding them from foreign competition -- but also fresh capital. India's dilapidated roads, seaports and airports have constricted the transport of goods, depriving needy areas of business activity and new investment.

Yesterday, Finance Minister P. Chidambaram said the Indian government would need to speed up market overhauls and the construction of infrastructure to keep up the current economic pace.

"While 8.4% is satisfactory growth, more reforms are necessary to sustain this growth," Mr. Chidambaram said after the latest economic figures were released. He added that he would be talking with the prime minister about ways to spur lagging sectors, such as mining, which grew only 0.9% in the fiscal year, down sharply from 5.8% the previous year.

India's strong economy is also prompting some worries about the country's current-account deficit. It has widened as more crude oil is imported at rising prices, wracking the country's currency, the rupee. On Wednesday, the rupee hit a two-year low against the dollar.

Mr. Chidambaram said India continues to hold huge foreign-exchange reserves and that its current account deficit was within manageable limits. Previously, he has said high oil prices will underpin inflation but won't hurt growth. The annual inflation rate is currently at about 4.3%, but India's central bank doesn't expect it to rise past 5.5% for the fiscal year that began April 1.

That relatively tame picture has prompted some government officials to play down signs the economy might be growing too fast. "I don't think there is any evidence of overheating," said Planning Commission Deputy Chairman Montek Singh Ahluwalia. "Macroeconomic indicators are in OK shape."

African Graft Stings Donors (CSM)

By Rachel Scheier

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

KAMPALA, UGANDA - Uganda - a small, poor country still best known for its infamous former dictator, Idi Amin - isn't used to being first in much. But in the 1990s, it became the first African country to substantially bring down its AIDS rate.

It has since become a darling of international donors, especially in the health sector. So no one was surprised when, in 2003, Uganda became one of the first countries to receive a multimillion-dollar grant from the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis, and Malaria.

But three years later, the phrase "Global Fund" has become synonymous with graft in Uganda. A government inquiry recently revealed that tens of millions of dollars of the country's Global Fund grants have gone missing, much of it plundered by high-ranking public officials. Through months of hearings, which began in September and concluded just a few weeks ago, a disgusted Ugandan public heard how monies meant for lifesaving AIDS drugs were spent on personal phone bills, lavish "Christmas packages," and fancy four-wheel drive vehicles.

Along with increasing an already high level of cynicism here, the scandal highlights the corrosive nature of corruption in Africa and demonstrates the difficulties donors face in giving recipient governments the autonomy needed to spend aid money efficiently while also making sure the funds are used appropriately.

Problems with Global Fund monies have surfaced recently in other countries as well. Kenya was warned by Fund officials in March to report the whereabouts of $10 million that was unaccounted for or see its grants yanked. Some Fund grants in Nigeria were recently suspended for mismanagement.

Aside from Uganda, graft in connection with Global Fund monies has not been substantiated in any of these countries. Still, the questions raised reflect a growing emphasis in international circles on combating corruption around the world, especially in Africa. A survey quoted by the African Development Bank last month put the cost of graft on the continent at $148 billion per year.

And as the West tries harder than ever before to end poverty in Africa - the Group of Eight industrialized countries (G-8) last year agreed to double aid to the continent to $50 billion annually - the Global Fund scandal in Uganda also calls into question the fashionable idea that all that's needed to promote development in poor countries is more money.

"In hindsight, maybe we were a bit naive," says Victor Bampoe, the Fund's portfolio manager for East Africa. "But I struggle to see how we would have done things differently."

The Global Fund, a Geneva-based public-private partnership set up in 2002, was to be a new transparent, efficient aid model that would avoid the politics and delays that have long hamstrung development efforts. The idea was that the Fund would be strictly a financing mechanism; decisions about how to spend the money would be decided by local players.

"There is increasing recognition that aid has to be more than putting a bunch of white doctors on a plane and telling them to hand out pills," says Bernard Rivers of AIDSPAN, a Global Fund watchdog group. But, he added, "There is a tension between efficiency and accountability."

The Global Fund is the largest single financing agency in the world to combat the three diseases. It has raised more than $5 billion from donor governments and private philanthropies, and funded programs in 131 countries.

By last August, Uganda had already received more than $45 million of the $201 million that was earmarked for the country over the course of two years when a whistle-blower cried foul. After ordering an outside audit, Fund officials suspended Uganda's grants, citing "serious mismanagement." They were restored several months later, after the government commissioned an inquiry. It also agreed to changes in how the money was being disbursed and overseen, starting with the dissolution of the office responsible for doling out the funds, the Project Management Unit, which one Fund official likened to "a piggy bank" for those with the right connections.

Judge James Ogoola, who headed the probe, called it "no less than an audit on our country's moral standing." He found that hundreds of millions of shillings had been spent on "sensitization workshops" and generous "hardship allowances" for everyone from secretaries on up. A number of organizations that received Fund money had no physical addresses, let alone any experience in the health field. Officials in the Ministry of Health also testified that they had "borrowed" Global Fund money to campaign for a referendum to change the constitution to allow President Yoweri Museveni to run for a third term.

Local AIDS groups were particularly outraged when it was revealed in April that some $22,000 had been taken from the Global Fund basket to pay the hospital bills of a former government minister.

"Uganda has received a lot of money for AIDS - probably more than people can imagine in Africa," says Rubaramira Ruranga, a well-known AIDS activist. Mr. Ruranga faulted donors and the Ugandan government for fostering a system that tolerates, if not encourages, corruption. "AIDS in this country has become an industry," he says.

Global Fund officials say that the Ugandan government has cooperated with Geneva to put in better oversight mechanisms, such as hiring an outside company to serve as a "caretaker management firm." They say that, in general, the Fund had tightened "checks and balances" everywhere. "This is an opportunity to dust ourselves off and move forward," says Mr. Bampoe.

Last week, a newly reelected Museveni announced that the three ministers implicated in the scandal would be dropped from his new cabinet. A spokesman said the President was "responding to the public mood." Charles Mubbale, a director of the Ugandan chapter of Transparency International, says it is unlikely the ministers will face any official censure in the end. The Daily Monitor, a local newspaper, called the entire inquiry an "elegant diversion" to placate donors.

Mr. Mubbale says a deeper problem is the pervasive cynicism among Africans that comes from often seeing graft rewarded rather than punished. "The hard-working person who doesn't steal ... they say he's stupid and lazy," says Mubbale. "It's become an attitude of, well, let's just wait our turn."

Quake Upsets The Cradle Of Indonesian Culture (NYT)

By Peter Gelling

KASONGAN, Indonesia, May 31 — Behind a painted sign on a sidewalk reading, "This is not an exhibition, it's a disaster," hundreds of traditional ceramic sculptures lie shattered beneath a collapsed roof.

More than half the houses, shops and galleries lining this small street here were destroyed in the earthquake on Saturday and are littered with the broken remains of their owners' livelihoods. The hundreds of artists who live in Kasongan, a village in Bantul, the district hardest hit by the quake, have survived for generations by selling the pottery they make to tourists.

The region affected by the earthquake is part of the ancient kingdom of Yogyakarta, the cradle of Javanese art and culture, making it one of the most popular tourist destinations in Indonesia.

"I'm worried I will have nothing to give to my children now," said Buang, 50, who uses only one name. He has four adult offspring, all of whom worked in the family's shop.

His youngest son, Eno, who will spend Thursday, his 22nd birthday, looking after his injured mother and grandfather, was the only relative to escape the building that was the family's house and shop before it crashed down. In a panic, he followed the faint sounds of his mother's call for help, throwing aside pieces of brick wall. When he finally reached her, her face was bleeding heavily.

"I was scared and confused," Mr. Eno said. "There was so much happening. But all I could think of was reaching my family. My family is my treasure."

Mr. Eno dug everyone out, including his father, pinned beneath a fallen doorway. His cousin, however, who lived down the street, died instantly, with seven other people from this community of a few hundred people.

The Indonesian Social Welfare Ministry said nearly 6,000 people had died in the quake, which also left more than 130,000 homeless.

Mr. Eno's family, and five others, are sleeping in a tent. His mother, Gimah, 50, lies on the floor, recovering from a blow to her head. His grandfather, whose back is injured, is carried several times a day by neighbors to a nearby health clinic for observation.

Ms. Gimah comes from a long line of ceramic artists. She made most of the family's sculptures, while her children operated the store and her husband of more than 30 years supplied the materials.

In minutes on Saturday morning, the quake reduced all the family had worked for to waste.

"We have to start all over, like so many of the families here, from the beginning," Ms. Gimah said. Mr. Eno worried that the lack of tourists would prolong their despair.

In this region, thousands of shops make and sell handicrafts, traditional batik clothing, musical instruments and ceramic sculptures, many of them exported to the United States and Europe.

Performances of ancient Javanese shadow puppetry and gamelan orchestras — Indonesian musical ensembles with wind, string and percussion instruments — are frequent in Yogyakarta. Sophisticated galleries, teeming with collectors and contemporary exhibits, line its southern streets.

In the aftermath of the earthquake, many of these contemporary artists are mobilizing relief and offering their studios as temporary shelters. Others are trying to salvage mangled paintings from ruined workshops.

The Indonesian Art Institute in Yogyakarta, where famous artists regularly lecture and foreign students, many from the United States, come to study Indonesian art, had major structural damage. And 20 of its students died in the quake.

Nindityo Adipurnomo, curator of the internationally famous Cemeti Art House in Yogyakarta, has taken into his gallery nearly 20 neighbors whose houses were flattened. During the day, he drives to Bantul to deliver food and other supplies.

He said that many studios and galleries were damaged but that artists in the Yogyakarta area were trying to continue their work.

"It is important to keep busy, for artists to keep working and to continue displaying their art, it helps us to cope with what has happened," Mr. Adipurnomo said. He has decided to go ahead with an exhibition scheduled for next week in Jakarta.

Ki Timbul Hadiprayitno, a 73-year-old master puppeteer who lost his house, most of his puppets and all of his musical instruments, agreed. He is fully booked through August and has not canceled a single show.

Shadow puppetry is one of the oldest art forms in Indonesia. Its stories offer a glimpse into the layered philosophies of Javanese spiritualism, which includes elements of Hinduism and Islam. Many of the stories emphasize a philosophy of acceptance, known locally as pasrah.

"We can only just keep going," he said. "Bad luck, good luck, life, death, it is all God's will."

Mr. Hadiprayitno, who started performing in 1946 and regularly performed privately for Suharto, the former president, lives in Tegal Dowo, a village in Bantul that was almost leveled.

He lost three quarters of his finely detailed wooden puppets, some hundreds of years old, which depict everything from old-world kings and queens to monsters and clowns, and his two gamelan orchestras, which consist of several xylophones, hand drums, gongs and flutes.

"It is very hard for me to have lost my puppets," he said, sitting under a tarp outside his son's partly collapsed house, drawing on a crackling clove cigarette as minor aftershocks rumbled.

But he will find a way, he said, and will not postpone a coming performance in Bantul to celebrate the new harvest. The show is scheduled for Saturday — one week after the earthquake left his community in ruins.

Agency Warns Of Higher Risks Of Bird Flu (FT)

By Andrew Jack

Europe's disease control agency will on Thursday warn governments to accelerate their preparations for a flu pandemic in the face of an increased risk the bird flu virus could mutate into a form more dangerous to humans in the near future.

In its latest public health risk report, the European Centre for Disease Prevention and Control (ECDC) will say there are "many good reasons . . . to continue and intensify" preparations, including boosting co-operation among countries and between health, agriculture and other government departments within each nation.

Chief of these reasons is the spread of the virus since January into a broad range of birds, including migratory species that travel widely.

As a result, Europe must adjust to the likelihood of H5N1 becoming endemic in birds, warns the ECDC.

The cautiously worded document from the agency, created last year to monitor the spread of disease in the European Union, concludes: "The likelihood that [the H5N1 virus] might achieve any inherent potential in the near future may have risen."

It stresses there are no current indications that the behaviour of the flu virus in humans has changed significantly. But it says the spread this year of H5N1 into animals in Europe, the Middle East and Africa increases the likelihood of human exposure and mutation or recombination of the virus.

The report comes after the World Health Organisation said on Wednesday it saw no need to escalate its pandemic alert level, as its investigations intensified into a cluster of infections in Sumatra in Indonesia that killed seven people this month.

The WHO said there were no signs of significant genetic mutation in the virus that it has studied in four of the Sumatra victims.

It said there was no spread of H5N1 from the cluster, although it has given the antiviral drug Tamiflu as a prophylaxis to 54 people.

A further six cases confirmed elsewhere in Indonesia in recent days have brought the worldwide total of infections to 224, and deaths to 127.

"H5N1 has become far more prevalent and, if it stays in its present form, we are going to have to learn to live with it in Europe," said Angus Nicholl from the ECDC.

At a Europe-wide conference in Sweden earlier this month, the agency pledged to complete its assessment of all national preparation plans by July 2007.

It also promised to draw up indicators to assess progress, accelerate the take-up of seasonal flu vaccine, and strengthen international support to combat the virus, especially in Africa.

Avian Flu News Tracker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal Online, June 1, 2006

Wednesday, May 31, 2006

12:50 p.m.: Fifty-four uninfected members and contacts of the family hardest-hit by bird flu are under voluntary quarantine in Indonesia, and there are no signs the disease has spread since May 22, the WHO said in an update1. The quarantined people - except pregnant women and infants - are taking the antiviral drug Tamiflu as a preventive medication and they are being visited daily by public health teams who check them for symptoms, the WHO said. Seven members of the family died either of confirmed or probable infection with the H5N1 virus. An eighth infected member survived. 2

8:50 a.m.: Outbreaks of H5N1 may be underreported in Indonesia and China, and the virus could be more widespread in Africa than authorities know, said experts gathered at a Rome conference3 on the disease. Poor monitoring and lack of compensation mechanisms that encourage farmers to report animal deaths meant that authorities were not always aware of all outbreaks of the H5N1 virus, animal health experts told reporters.

6 a.m.: Dutch biotechnology company Crucell NV announced it has started a large study to test a vaccine against avian-flu virus in humans. The trial, performed in collaboration with a team based in Leicester, U.K., will oversee the vaccination of 560 healthy adult individuals, Crucell said.

2 a.m.: Bird flu killed a 15-year-old boy in Indonesia, a health official said citing local tests, as the country struggled to get a grip on a rise in cases. Indonesia averaged one human bird flu death every 2 1/2 days in May, putting it on pace to soon surpass Vietnam as the hardest-hit country. The boy, from the West Java town of Tasikmalaya, had a history of contact with poultry. He is the third recent victim from the province. Last week, a 10-year-old girl and her 18-year-old brother who lived in another village died of the disease.

Iran's Bahai Religious Minority Says It Faces Raids And Arrests (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Members of the Bahai religious minority in Iran said this week that the government had recently intensified a campaign of arrests, raids and propaganda that was aimed at eradicating their religion in Iran, the country of its birth.

On May 19, Iranian security officials arrested 54 Bahais in the city of Shiraz who were involved in a community service project, many of them in their teens and early 20's, said diplomatic officials and Bahai officials outside of Iran.

They were not charged and all but three were released within six days, these officials said.

It was the largest mass arrest of Bahais since the 1980's, when thousands of them were imprisoned and more than 200 were executed by the new Islamic government.

The developments have alarmed human rights monitors at the United Nations, who say that since December, the government newspaper in Tehran has published more than 30 articles denigrating the Bahai faith — even accusing Bahais of sacrificing Muslim children on holy days. The arrests coincided with raids on six Bahai homes, in which notebooks, documents and computers were confiscated. More than 70 other Bahais have been arrested since January 2005 in smaller clusters, and some are still being held, the monitors said.

"We see a pattern emerging that is quite ominous," said Bani Dugal, who represents the Bahai International Community at the United Nations, where religious and some other groups have consultative status. "It's basically trying to create terror in the Bahai community, and also to win over the Iranian population to accept it."

Mohammad Mohammadi, press secretary for Iran's mission to the United Nations, said he had no information about arrests of Bahais and would not be able to respond until Monday because of an Iranian holiday this week.

The Bahais are the largest religious minority in Iran, with about 300,000 members there. There are five million worldwide. They believe that humanity is one race, that men and women are equal and that all religions and prophets are derived from the same source, God.

They have suffered successive waves of persecution in Iran since their faith was founded there in the mid-1800's by a Persian nobleman considered by the Bahais to be a messenger of God. That belief violates the Islamic teaching that God sent many prophets before Muhammad, but none afterward. The Bahai are discriminated against in some other Muslim countries, where they are far less numerous than in Iran.

Unlike Jews and Christians, who have seats in Iran's Parliament set aside for them as religious minorities, Bahais in Iran are considered "unprotected infidels," said Kit Bigelow, director for external affairs of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States. Bahais are not permitted to attend college, work for the government or practice their faith openly.

She called the recent arrests "the latest step in the implementation of a strategy on the part of the Iranian government to eliminate the Bahai community."

Asma Jahangir, the United Nations special rapporteur who monitors freedom of religion for the Commission on Human Rights, announced in March that she had just learned about a confidential letter from the chairman of the command headquarters of Iran's armed forces instructing government agencies to identify all Bahais and monitor their activities.

Ms. Jahangir said the letter was sent on Oct. 29, 2005, on the orders of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Ms. Jahangir said in a statement in March that she was concerned that "information gained as a result of such monitoring will be used as a basis for the increased persecution of, and discrimination against, members of the Bahai faith, in violation of international standards."

Mr. Mohammadi, the Iranian press secretary, said he could not confirm whether such a document existed.

Azedah Perry, a Bahai in North Carolina, said that among the 54 arrested in May were 3 of her nieces, ages 17, 18 and 21. She spoke by telephone with her nieces after their release, and said they told her they were interrogated during their six days in prison, but tried to keep their morale up by praying and singing. She said when they were arrested, they were volunteering in a community service project at several public schools. She said they were teaching underprivileged children English, science and mathematics — not the Bahai faith — and had permission letters from the local Islamic council in their pockets.

Last year, Mrs. Perry's brother-in-law in Shiraz was taken by armed Iranian guards from his home and held for six weeks in a prison in Tehran with several other Bahai men before being released, Mrs. Perry said.

"It's hard to live in such a situation," she said. "You don't know what will happen each day. The day they attacked my sister's house, she was in her bedroom and she saw guards with guns in her backyard."

The United States Congress is considering a resolution that would condemn the Iranian government for repressing Bahais and call on President Bush to make the abuse of Bahais a significant factor in United States foreign policy.

Representative Mark Steven Kirk, an Illinois Republican who co-sponsored the resolution with Representative Tom Lantos of California, said, "My fear is that if the regime leads the country into a confrontation with the West, it will be the cover for a great human rights crime, as happened before."

Saudi Women Rise In Defense Of The Veil (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0030904

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- More than 500 women packed the Saudi capital's Maimouna Center on a recent evening to attend a lecture. The women, some still in their full black wraps, filled the rows of plum-colored plastic chairs, while late arrivals sat in small clusters on the carpet and against the wall.

"Whom do we love?" asked the lecturer, a woman, seated behind a desk on a raised platform.

"God," the women answered in unison.

"Then we must obey Him."

She went on to urge the audience members to dress modestly and raise their daughters to do the same. She explained that, despite what some Saudis are now saying, it is a sin for men and women to mix. "Even if people don't see you sin, God is watching," she warned. "On Judgment Day, your own skin will testify against you."

As she took copious notes, Mashael al-Eissa dabbed at tears, overcome by the extent of her religious responsibilities.

Eissa, a fiery young Internet writer, and the lecturer, Afrah al-Humaydi, are among a group of conservative Saudi women trying to redress what they view as an erosion of traditional values in the kingdom and a dangerous shift in the status of women.

"Saudi women are the luckiest in the world and Saudi Arabia is the closest thing to an ideal and pure Islamic nation," Eissa said. "We don't want imported Western values to destroy that."

The changes that have so riled Eissa and other conservative women followed the intense scrutiny that Saudi Arabia received after the discovery that 15 of the 19 hijackers who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States were Saudis. The lack of personal liberties in the kingdom -- an absolute monarchy that imposes a strict form of Islam -- was widely held to be an underlying part of the extremist ideology the attackers shared.

Shortly afterward, strict censorship of the media was loosened and subjects that the religious establishment had placed off-limits for decades, such as the ban on women driving or working alongside men, were openly debated. Women, previously hidden, started appearing as television newscasters, and their photos became daily staples in the press.

King Abdullah, crowned in August, called for increased work opportunities for women and started including female journalists, professors and business leaders on his trips overseas.

And during regional tours last year, both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes said Saudi women needed broader political rights to make changes in their lives.

But the new atmosphere has alarmed conservative women who are suspicious of U.S. interference and warn that changes in their status could destroy the country's Islamic framework. Though no figures are available, conservative, religious women seem to constitute a sizable portion of the country's female population, belying notions that most Saudi women are unhappy with their lot and waiting to be liberated.

On the contrary, the black veil and the prohibition against women driving are embraced by many women here as a form of protection and an integral part of their religion.

Faiza al-Obaidi, a biology professor, says she thinks the attempts at Western-style female emancipation are part of a religious war being waged by the United States, "an intellectual rather than physical colonization." Sitting at the food court at the Basateen Mall in the coastal city of Jiddah one weekend, lifting her veil to take bites from a tuna sandwich, she said the West was targeting women, the core of society, as a means of eventually controlling the whole country. "They fear Islam, and we are the world's foremost Islamic nation," she said.

Obaidi shows pride in her religion and resists foreign interference, she said, by maintaining her veil, or niqab . "Just because this is closed," she said, tugging at the black material that covered her face, "doesn't mean this is," pointing to her head.

Samia Adham, a statistics professor seated beside her, also in a veil, added: "This is a choice. We choose to be ruled by Islam. We will make changes, but within our religion and in our own way."

Two young men with long hair and wearing bright T-shirts and frayed jeans entered the food court and sat at a table with a young woman. Obaidi shook her head. "You wouldn't have seen that several years ago," she said.

Many Salafi women here, who follow the school of thought that calls for a return to Islam as practiced by the prophet Muhammad and the following two generations, shatter the stereotype of women in black niqab as meek and submissive. Often well educated, articulate and sometimes downright aggressive, they include award-winning scientists, writers and college professors.

Khadija Badahdah, a university administrator who holds a doctorate in chemistry from the University of London and wears a veil, said she recently started to grant television interviews because women calling for change were dominating coverage on the airwaves and in newspapers and giving the wrong impression of Saudi women. "They are a minority but they appear to speak for all of us," she said, sitting in her comfortable home in Jiddah on a recent weekend. "This is the beginning of a cultural erosion, and if we don't fight it now, it will continue."

The Salafi women have also used lectures and Internet and newspaper campaigns to combat what they view as negative developments. Though they appear to be fighting against women's rights, they say they are actually fighting for the rights granted to women in Islam.

Humaydi, the lecturer, says she counsels women to educate themselves for at least half an hour a day about their rights under Islamic law. The problems faced by Saudi women, she said, are not because of Islam, which she calls a perfect religion that honors and values women. The fault lies in its improper implementation.

"We were given rights by Islam 1,400 years ago that women in the West only got at the beginning of the 20th century," said Humaydi, a middle-aged college professor. "Muslim women can work, and inherit, and be financially independent."

But working alongside men, taking leadership positions or removing the veil are choices that the religious women say are not open to them. This year a Gallup poll in eight predominantly Muslim countries found that only in Saudi Arabia did the majority of women not agree that women should be allowed to hold political office. Last summer, 500 women addressed a letter to Abdullah asking him to save the country from the onslaught of Westernized ideas regarding women and to maintain the ban on women driving and working with men.

Men and women should not share work spaces, Humaydi contends, because Islam says not to place oneself in an environment where adultery can occur. "People are wonderful, but the devil doesn't sit still," she said, adding that even Bill Clinton, while president, "couldn't resist him."

At Jiddah's King Fahd Medical Research Center, a small Casio recorder played Koranic verses in the background as Faten Khorshid peered through a microscope, her niqab falling past her shoulders over her long white lab coat. Khorshid, who received a government grant for cancer research, says that her conservative views have not held her back and that the niqab makes it easier for doctors to concentrate on work instead of one another. "I don't want to be the equal of a man," she added. "In many ways, I am better than him."

Clashes In Paris Suburbs Recall Riots Of Fall (WP)

By Molly Moore

PARIS, May 31 -- Small gangs of youths pelted riot police with rocks and set cars and garbage bins ablaze late Tuesday in a second night of unrest in the Paris suburbs, raising fears of a return of the disturbances that inflamed 300 French towns and suburbs last fall.

The violence of the last two nights -- in which youths attacked police cars, government buildings and riot police -- was sparked in part by mounting resentment toward the mayor of the northeastern Paris suburb of Montfermeil, who in recent weeks imposed a law prohibiting 15- to 18-year-olds from gathering in groups of more than three and requiring anyone under 16 to be accompanied by an adult on city streets after 8 p.m.

The French government last fall promised to improve living conditions and job opportunities in suburbs heavily populated by immigrant families and where unemployment is rampant, but little has been done and the government's main initiative -- a youth jobs bill -- ended with this spring's politically disastrous student demonstrations.

At the same time, police have said crime has increased in poor suburban neighborhoods, and frustration with the government has continued to fester.

"We have the painful sense that nothing has been fixed," Francois Hollande, leader of the opposition Socialist Party, said in an interview on France-2 Television.

At 9:30 Tuesday night, an estimated 15 young people threw rocks and projectiles at police patrolling an apartment complex area. At 11 p.m., youths tossed a makeshift explosive into a police car. The officers inside barely had time to escape before the vehicle exploded in flames.

Marauding youths set afire about a dozen private cars and torched numerous garbage bins in Montfermeil and the adjacent town of Clichy-sous-Bois, where last fall's three weeks of violence began when two teenagers were electrocuted as they tried to hide in a power substation. They believed police were chasing them.

Muhittin Altun, a third youth who survived with severe burns in that incident, was arrested Tuesday night on charges of throwing rocks at a police car. He was later released, according to French news media.

Six police officers were reported slightly injured and 13 youths were detained in Tuesday night's incidents.

In Montfermeil, a suburb of high youth unemployment and government-subsidized housing projects, young people have been growing increasingly angry at Mayor Xavier Lemoine's attempts to crack down on gang violence. Although a local court earlier this month overturned his effort to limit youth gatherings, he vowed to seek other measures.

On Monday, residents said, police roughed up a woman who protested police efforts to arrest her son, a suspect in the beating several weeks ago of a bus driver. Police ended up arresting both the mother and son, according to police.

Monday night, hooded youths hurled stones and other projectiles at Mayor Lemoine's house and at City Hall, and the police who responded were attacked with baseball bats. The clashes lasted three hours and seven police officers reportedly were injured.

French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, whose characterizations of rioters as "scum" inflamed last fall's violence, visited police officers who had responded to Monday night's incidents. "More than 100 hooligans set upon you -- masked and carrying weapons," he said. "We are confronting not a spontaneous revolt, but hooligans who have only a single purpose -- to create the most damage and injure as many people as possible."

Transportation Minister Dominique Perben, of the ruling Union for a Popular Movement party, described the incidents as a "reminder" of last year's violence.

"The question of the suburbs is a question for the entire political class," Perben told I-tele television. "We must have the courage to look things in the face."

A Flagging Commitment On AIDS (NYT)

The AIDS epidemic turns 25 this week, and while new infections are declining in a few countries, the number of infected is still growing, especially among young women. Globally, the epidemic seems to have more energy than efforts to fight it.

This week, United Nations members are meeting in a follow-up to the successful U.N. special session in 2001, which pushed the world to take AIDS more seriously. At that time, the countries created a detailed plan for attacking the disease, with specific targets. Spending soared, from $1.6 billion in 2001 to $8.3 billion last year.

The nations now are supposed to be reporting on whether their targets are being met, and devising a plan of action for the next few years. Instead, they are watering down the original plan. Ideologues, led by Washington, are taking out commitments to key programs, and wealthy nations worried about cost are replacing concrete goals with vague statements. AIDS groups fear the world is moving backward.

The most recent draft written by the nations does maintain the 2001 target of universal access to treatment, prevention and care, and sets a spending goal of $23 billion per year by 2010. But Europe and the United States have successfully opposed including specific targets that would have provided clear, periodic measurements of whether countries were meeting goals. In terms of money, the world will fall $6 billion short of what is needed this year, and we are falling further behind each year.

The drafts also show that on issues of interest to religious conservatives, the United States and Syria are holding down one side, joined at times by the Vatican and Saudi Arabia. Washington, for example, has removed references that were in the 2001 declaration about providing clean syringes to drug users. These efforts are desperately needed in many countries, like Russia, where the epidemic is largely spread by drug injectors.

The word "condom" has also gone missing. Depressingly, nations have been debating whether they can make any reference at all to "empowering girls" or "vulnerable populations," itself a euphemism for sex workers, drug injectors and gay men.

Tellingly, the United States has insisted on taking out all references to "evidence-based prevention strategies" — strategies scientifically proven to work. Instead, Washington wants to use the phrase "evidence-informed prevention strategies." Apparently the Bush administration feels the need to make room for strategies that are not proven to work.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Calif. Man Pleads Guilty In Terror Case (AP-Y2)

By Don Thompson, Associated Press Writer
AP2, June 1, 2006

A man pleaded guilty Wednesday to a lesser charge rather than be retried on allegations that he lied to the FBI about his son's attendance at a terrorist training camp, according to court papers.

Under a deal, Umer Hayat, 48, an ice cream vendor, pleaded guilty to lying to customs agents about more than $28,000 he and family members were carrying on a trip to Pakistan three years ago. In exchange, prosecutors agreed to drop charges that he lied to the FBI and to recommend he serve no more jail time after spending nearly a year behind bars.

"This outcome was not, of course, the one most desired by the government," said U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott. "However ... our region is safer today than it was one year ago."

Hayat smiled as he left the federal courthouse, but he would not comment. He will be under house arrest until his Aug. 18 sentencing.

"He's happy. It's over. Obviously he wants to move on with his life at this point," said defense lawyer Johnny Griffin III. "From Day One we've maintained that Umer Hayat is not a terrorist; he had no involvement with terrorist-related conduct or activities."

His first trial ended last month in a mistrial after the jury deadlocked on two counts alleging that he lied to the FBI. The retrial had been scheduled to begin Monday.

He admitted in court Wednesday that he lied in April 2003 when he denied his family was carrying more than $10,000 in cash when he was detained on a jetway at Washington-Dulles International Airport.

Federal agents found two envelopes containing $5,000 each in his pants, two similar envelopes in his son's pockets and $8,053 being carried by his wife. He gave several explanations, including the cash was from several relatives to be used as wedding gifts for his son and daughter.

It was on that trip that his son, Hamid Hayat, attended a terrorist training camp, prosecutors said. But Scott said there is no indication the money was to be used for any terrorist activity.

Hamid Hayat, 23, was convicted of supporting terrorism by attending an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and lying to the FBI. He faces at least 30 years in prison.

Umer Hayat's plea closes another chapter in the case of terrorist-related activities in the small city of Lodi — about 35 miles south of the state capital — which is better known for growing wine grapes.

The government's investigation into Lodi's 2,500-member Pakistani community began after agents received a tip in 2001 that local businesses were sending money to terrorist groups abroad.

That probe produced no results, but it led agents to an informant, Naseem Khan, 32, a Pakistani native who moved to the U.S. as a teenager. He targeted a pair of local imams and then befriended Hamid Hayat.

Khan recorded phone calls from the younger Hayat after he left for Pakistan. Some of the calls showed Khan urging Hayat to attend a jihadi camp, but defense lawyers claimed there was no evidence Hamid Hayat went to such a camp.

While the government presented no evidence of a terrorism network during the nine-week trial, the case centered on videotaped confessions the two Hayats gave to FBI agents.

Their lawyers claimed that the confessions came after hours of leading questioning, and that their clients merely told the FBI what they thought the agents wanted to hear.

The investigation became public a year ago when authorities arrested the Hayats and detained two local imams. The clerics and one of their sons were later deported for immigration violations. The Hayats were the only people criminally charged in the probe.

Umer Hayat Agrees To Plea Deal (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, June 1, 2006

Lodian pleads guilty to lying to customs agents about money, charges unrelated to terrorism

Umer Hayat, who had been charged with two counts of lying about terrorism, pleaded guilty Wednesday — but not to terror-related charges. Instead, the Lodi man acknowledged lying to customs agents by denying he was carrying $28,000 when he took a trip to Pakistan several years ago.

And, instead of facing up to 16 years in prison on the previous charges, the U.S. Attorney's Office is recommending a sentence of 11 months, the time Hayat already served in jail, and be placed on three years of felony supervised release.

Hayat, 48, remains on home detention and is scheduled to be sentenced Aug. 18. The actual sentence will be up to U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr., who could sentence Hayat to as much as five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Federal sentencing guidelines, however, call for a sentence of zero to six months behind bars.

Defense attorney Johnny L. Griffin III was happy with the deal, saying his client had always been willing to admit that he lied to customs agents. The government dismissed the terror-related charges with prejudice, meaning they can never again bring those charges against Hayat.

"I consider this a victory because I said from day one that Umer Hayat was not a terrorist, nor was he ever involved in terrorism," Griffin said.

U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott disagreed that the deal was a victory for the defense.

"(Hayat) is now a convicted felon, and he wasn't yesterday," Scott told the News-Sentinel. "(He) will remain on very strict supervised release by the probation department for the next three years and if he violates any of the terms, he's going back into custody."

Hayat and his 23-year-old son, Hamid Hayat, went on trial in mid-February with separate juries. Umer Hayat's jurors spent nine days deliberating before they told Burrell that they were "decisively deadlocked" on April 25. They split 7-5 and 6-6 on the two counts. Prosecutors had said they would retry the Lodi man, but have since decided to settle the case.

"This outcome was not, of course, the one most desired by the government," Scott said earlier Wednesday in a written statement, adding that prosecutors still believe Umer Hayat lied about terrorism, but had to consider the evenly divided jury.

"I have been a prosecutor for many years and am well acquainted with the challenges of retrying a case with those sorts of juror splits, given our duty to prove a case beyond a reasonable doubt to all 12 members of the jury," Scott said.

The plea deal came just days before Umer Hayat was scheduled to face his second trial on two counts of lying to the FBI. He was accused of denying that he had personal knowledge of terror training camps in Pakistan, and of knowing that his son attended the camps.

Umer Hayat

Because prosecutors dismissed those charges Wednesday, the ice cream vendor only stands convicted of declaring the wrong amount of money when he and his family went to Pakistan on April 19, 2003.

When customs officers stopped the Hayat family at Washington-Dulles International Airport, Umer Hayat said he was not carrying any money. Inspector David Martinez told him amounts totaling more than $10,000 must be declared, and Umer Hayat then showed two envelopes containing $5,000 each.

Twice more, he said the family was not carrying any other money, but agents then found $10,000 on Hamid Hayat and $8,053 on Umer Hayat's wife.

After assessing a fine of about $2,000, agents ultimately returned the rest of the money. During pre-trial proceedings, community members signed affidavits declaring they had sent the money with the Hayats to deliver to family members in Pakistan.

News of the plea was welcome for Woodbridge resident Debra Kiriu, who served as forewoman of Umer Hayat's jury. The jury was never told of the $28,000, though the customs agent traveled from Washington, D.C., for the trial. He testified for eight minutes.

"I'm glad to see that he came forward and said, 'Yes, I did lie,'" Kiriu said Wednesday evening. "I don't know if he just didn't know the laws at the time. It's hard to say. That's what's hard about the case: He's been here for 30 years and by then he should know the laws."

Umer Hayat is a naturalized U.S. citizen, and his son was born in California, meaning that neither is eligible for deportation to another country.

The deal will not likely affect the case against his son, said Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, because Umer Hayat did not plead guilty to anything related to terrorism.

A second jury spent eight days in deliberations before convicting Hamid Hayat of all four charges against him, which include three counts of lying to the FBI and one count of providing material support, in the form of himself, to terrorists.

Hamid Hayat's sentencing has been postponed until at least November because his attorney has asked for a new trial amidst allegations of jury misconduct.

Wednesday's plea deal came five days shy of June 5, the one-year mark since the Hayats were arrested during a high-profile investigation involving dozens of FBI agents swarming through Lodi.

Trial testimony ultimately revealed that the case had been underway for years and that a paid FBI informant, Naseem Khan, had infiltrated Lodi's Pakistani community and secretly recorded conversations. He was initially assigned in late 2001 to get close to two imams, or Muslim religious leaders, but the following summer he met Hamid Hayat, who was 10 years his junior.

The two became friends, and recordings played in court revealed an informant who repeatedly mentioned getting "training" in Pakistan and talked about violent jihad, or war against enemies of Islam.

What secured prosecutors a conviction was Hamid Hayat's videotaped interview with FBI agents. They questioned him for hours and then, when he began to change his story, turned on the video recorder. Hamid Hayat described various camps and often repeated what agents told him, but jurors decided he gave enough information to convict him.

Despite the fact that Umer Hayat has not been convicted of any terror charges, Scott, the U.S. Attorney, said the community is safer now that the Hayats have felony convictions and the two imams have been deported.

Kiriu said she thinks Lodi residents will probably be glad to hear that the case is resolved, rather than having the national media continue focusing on Lodi as a possible terrorist center.

Whether the investigation is truly over, though, remains undisclosed.

"There continue to be people of interest to us and I really can't say anything beyond that," Scott said.

Deal And Guilty Plea In Terrorism (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, May 31 — Federal prosecutors in Sacramento announced Wednesday that they had obtained a guilty plea from a Pakistani-American ice cream truck driver who was accused of lying to the authorities during a terrorism investigation.

The driver, Umer Hayat, agreed to plead guilty to lying to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and customs officials about how much money he was carrying on a trip from California to Pakistan in 2003, said McGregor W. Scott, a United States attorney for the Eastern District of California. Mr. Hayat had told officials during a stopover in Washington that he and his family were carrying less than $10,000, while prosecutors said the amount was more than $28,000.

Mr. Hayat, 48, had been expected to face trial next week on more serious charges of lying to federal investigators in relation to his son, Hamid, who was convicted on April 25 of lying to federal agents and providing material support to terrorists by attending a training camp of Al Qaeda in 2003. A separate jury had deadlocked on charges against the elder Mr. Hayat on the same day, but prosecutors had sought to retry him.

The plea puts at least a temporary end to an inquiry that disrupted the rural town of Lodi, where the Hayats live in a close-knit Muslim community. It also brings to a close a federal prosecution that raised questions about government interrogation techniques. Both Hayats had submitted confessions to investigators despite limited English, an element that some legal experts say could open their convictions to appeal.

In a statement on Wednesday, Mr. Scott, the prosecutor, seemed to strike a victorious note. "After 9/11, the U.S. Justice Department's top priority is to detect, disrupt, and deter future acts of terrorism," he said. "This mission was accomplished."

In exchange for his plea, federal officials said they would dismiss all previous charges and recommend that Umer Hayat receive a sentence of three years supervised release. Since his arrest in 2005, Mr. Hayat has served 330 days in jail and 30 days of home confinement, prosecutors said. Sentencing is Aug. 18.

Lodi Man Is Released In Plea Bargain (LAT)

By Rone Tempest And Eric Bailey

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Federal prosecutors Wednesday agreed to drop terrorism-related charges against Lodi ice cream truck driver Umer Hayat in exchange for a guilty plea in a 2003 customs case.

Hayat, 48, who spent nearly a year in jail and under house arrest on the charges, was released for time served. Six weeks ago, a hopelessly split jury failed to reach a verdict in his case.

"This outcome, of course, was not the one most desired by the government," said U.S. Atty. McGregor Scott. The government still believes the original charges that Umer Hayat lied to FBI agents about his 23-year-old son, Hamid Hayat's, 2003-04 attendance at a terrorist training camp in Pakistan, he added.

But Scott said retrying a case that had resulted in a mistrial was too daunting. "It was my decision that the felony plea we announce here today was the best resolution of this matter for the government," he said.

In April, another jury found the younger Hayat guilty of all four counts against him. Hamid Hayat, scheduled for sentencing in July, faces up to 39 years in federal prison.

But the jury in the father's case deadlocked 7 to 5 and 6 to 6 on the two charges against him. As a result, the government Wednesday allowed Umer Hayat to plead guilty to charges that he lied to customs agents at Dulles International Airport in Virginia on April 19, 2003, about the amount of money he and his family were carrying on their way to Pakistan.

Federal law requires individuals to declare amounts exceeding $10,000. Customs officials found that the Hayat family had more than $28,000 they said they were planning to use for Hamid Hayat's upcoming wedding.

Defense attorney Johnny L. Griffin described the plea bargain as a victory for Umer Hayat, who he said had been unfairly branded as a terrorist.

"There is no way we were ever going to agree to any plea involving terrorism," Griffin said outside the Sacramento Federal Courthouse, "because it was not true."

Umer Hayat, smiling broadly at Griffin's side, declined to comment.

Although Scott said the plea deal was a setback for the government, he added that the customs conviction of Umer Hayat, terrorism conviction of his son and deportation of Lodi's two Muslim religious leaders on visa violations amounted to success for the government.

"Our region is much safer today than it was one year ago," Scott said.

The four-year investigation of Lodi's large Muslim community began in late 2001 after a Bend, Ore., convenience store clerk and former Lodi resident told FBI agents that he had seen known Al Qaeda terrorists worshiping in the Lodi mosque in 1999 and 2000.

The FBI quickly determined that the sightings were false but hired the store clerk, Pakistani Naseem Khan, as an undercover paid informant and sent him into the Lodi community, where he secretly recorded hundreds of hours of conversations with fellow Muslims. No evidence surfaced of any Al Qaeda connections.

Hayat Pleads Guilty To Lesser Charge In Lodi Terror Case (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, June 1, 2006

A Lodi man charged with lying to the FBI about terrorist ties pleaded guilty Wednesday in Sacramento federal court to making a false statement to customs officials in 2003 about how much money he and his family were carrying on their way out of the United States.

Prosecutors agreed that, at the time of Umer Hayat's sentencing on Aug. 18, they will seek dismissal of charges that Hayat lied about his son's terrorist training in Pakistan and his own firsthand knowledge of such training when he was initially questioned by FBI agents in June.

The prosecutors also agreed to recommend that the nearly 11 months Hayat served in jail awaiting trial be his sentence for lying at Dulles International Airport about the amount of money he and his family were carrying to Pakistan.

The plea deal came four days before a second trial of Hayat on the terrorist-related charges was scheduled to start. The first trial ended April 25 with a deadlocked jury and a mistrial.

Privacy Fiasco That Needlessly Undermines Security (FT)

By Richard Falkenrath

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

Suppose a terrorist, a Dutch national, arrives at Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport and buys a one-way ticket on the daily KLM flight to New York. Like the September 11 2001 hijackers, he travels under his real name. US authorities have uncovered his identity and placed him on the terrorist watch list. The question is: will he be caught and, if so, when?

Currently, even if the US authorities had provided this terrorist's name to Dutch or European authorities, there is no watch-listing system in either jurisdiction that would have identified him as he purchased his international ticket or transited through Dutch immigration control. Moreover, because he is a Dutch national he would not have been required to apply for a visa to enter the US. So he would pass out of Europe undetected.

In all likelihood, however, he would be identified once his flight had left European soil. Under a May 2004 agreement between the US and the European Commission, European airlines were allowed to transmit their passenger manifests to US authorities 15 minutes after take-off. Two days ago, the European Court of Justice annulled this agreement.

The ECJ based its decision on technical legal grounds. It said that the Commission officials with whom the US had been negotiating lacked the legal authority to conclude the agreement. This is a significant, though perhaps temporary, setback for the European Union officials who have been trying to impose some coherence and rigour on Europe's various post-9/11 counter-terrorism and law-enforcement activities. It is also, in Washington, an unpleasant reminder of Henry Kissinger's famous line from three decades ago: "You say Europe, but can you tell me which number I should call?"

But the court avoided the real issue raised by the accord – the proper balance between the individual's right to privacy and the collective's interest in security in the era of infiltrative, transnational terrorist threats and unbounded computer power.

Huge private-sector databases, such as the airlines' passenger records, can be extremely useful to a government's effort to locate and eliminate terrorist threats. National governments have a responsibility to protect their people and therefore must take seriously new counterterrorism techniques presented by the advance of technology.

Yet a government's access to these private-sector databases raises troubling issues of personal privacy. Privacy advocates, pundits and politicians have raised alarm about a wide variety of such activities initiated in the aftermath of 9/11 – and not without reason. Potentially valuable counterterrorist initiatives such as the US-EU passenger data accord are at risk of foundering for loss of public trust and political support. In the US, the long-standing plan of the Transportation Security Administration to check the passenger manifests of domestic flights against the terrorist watch list is essentially dead in the water for this reason.

Both the US and Europe need to update their laws governing official access to private-sector databases for security purposes. The European privacy directive dates from 1995 and the US Privacy Act from 1974, so the legal framework on both sides of the Atlantic lags at least a decade behind the technological art of the possible.

But, more important than legal reform, government security services need to update their practices to incorporate that art of the possible. It is no longer necessary for government agencies to acquire and retain an entire private-sector database in order to accomplish a legitimate public purpose. It is now possible for a government to check a watch list anonymously – that is, to check one list of names in a private-sector database against another list of names in a government database in a manner that reveals to the government only those names that match. This is but one of several important new privacy-enhancing technologies that could, if adopted by governments, improve security as well as liberty.

US and European officials are trying to figure out what to do now that the ECJ has scuttled their passenger-data agreement. The first thing they should do is study the ways in which new technologies and procedures can be used to achieve their basic security aims while minimising the impact on personal privacy. In so doing, they may earn back some of the public trust they have lost and become more effective in the long run.

Flying Across The Pond (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0030916

In case you were wondering, it's still safe to board a plane in Europe and fly to the U.S. That's so despite a ruling from the European Court of Justice this week striking down a post-9/11 accord on sharing air-passenger data. Despite some media hyperventilating, there's next-to-no chance Europe's airlines will stop transferring important passenger information to the U.S.

Europe's highest court ruled Tuesday against the 2004 deal between the U.S. and the European Commission on data sharing. The European Parliament had sued, taking umbrage at giving U.S. officials the same information routinely handled by travel agents. Passengers' names, addresses and the number of bags they checked were all deemed more sacrosanct than preventing another terrorist attack.

However, in its ruling the court did not address the issue of privacy rights. Rather, it said the European Commission was wrong to have based the passenger-data deal on EU law regulating commercial activities. This was not a trade matter but one of public security, it said. The court gave the EU 90 days to find a solution, and until then the agreement with the U.S. remains in place.

Since security issues remain in the national domain, the 25 member states will each have to ratify the revised accord. Given that those governments unanimously approved the current deal, this should be no problem. The September 11 attacks were planned and carried out by al Qaeda members based in Germany who freely flew into the U.S., so it is surely reasonable for Washington to seek passenger data prior to arrival across the pond. Europe remains a major recruiting ground for terrorists, and it's good to know most European governments recognize the problem.

War On Terror Breeds Legal Challenges (VOA)

By Jim Malone

Voice of America, June 1, 2006

Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui remains the only person convicted in connection with the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. Others who allegedly planned the 9/11 attacks are being held by the U.S. abroad. But as of now, there are no plans to put them on trial.

Moussaoui was sentenced to life in prison after he pled guilty to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly planes into buildings.

But what about some of the alleged planners of the 9/11 attacks now in custody, like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibh, who allegedly financed the 19 hijackers on September 11.

U.S. officials say that despite the lengthy and challenging prosecution of Zacarias Moussaoui, criminal prosecution remains an option.

Paul McNulty "The Moussaoui case, I think, demonstrates that we can be successful," said Paul McNulty, the deputy U.S. attorney general. "In our investigations, we will continue to use every tool and authority available to us to identify risks at the earliest stage possible. And in deciding whether to prosecute, we will not wait to see what becomes of risks."

During the court proceedings Moussaoui was known for his disruptive outbursts in court and taunting relatives of victims who had testified.

Legal experts and others wonder if the difficulties on display in the Moussaoui case are making it less likely that the government will want to try the alleged masterminds of the 9/11 attacks in open court.

Benjamin Wittes has written editorials about the issue in the Washington Post newspaper. He spoke at a forum on the issue sponsored by the American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

"I mean, these are the people we have identified and are in our custody and there seems to be no plans whatsoever to bring them to trial," said Wittes.

Trying terrorist suspects in open court could be risky because the government might be forced to reveal some of its intelligence sources as it presents evidence. Prosecutors would also have to address whether torture was used to obtain confessions.

Neal Katyal, a law professor at Georgetown University Law Center in Washington, believes the Bush administration would prefer to simply detain some of the terror suspects indefinitely.

"I think the federal courts have given the president a fairly robust power to detain enemy combatants and I think they are likely to continue to do that," said Neal Katyal. "And so, folks like Khalid Sheik Mohammed, I think, are going to be detained indefinitely. And given that backdrop, it seems unwise to bring a prosecution in which the results may be acquittal," he said.

The Bush administration could also decide to try some of the al-Qaida suspects in military commissions, also known as military tribunals.

Professor Katyal represents Salim Ahmed Hamdan, now awaiting trial as an enemy combatant at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Hamdan is challenging the Bush administration's right to try terror suspects through military tribunals before the U.S. Supreme Court.

"And he can sue the President of the United States, the most powerful man on earth, in the highest court of the land," Katyal said. "That is something that in any other country, I think I would have to fear for my life and I think Hamdan would have to fear for his. It is something remarkably American about our system."

The Supreme Court is expected to issue a decision before the end of June on the legality of the military commissions.

While it remains unclear what the United States will do with the alleged high profile al-Qaida members in custody, prosecutions of lower-level suspects continue.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty says since the 9/11 attacks, the Justice Department has secured 253 convictions against 435 defendants in terrorism-related cases. Many of those convictions, however, involved minor crimes and immigration violations not directly related to terrorist acts or plots. E-mail This Article

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Anti-Terror Funding Cut In D.C. And New York (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security yesterday slashed anti-terrorism money for Washington and New York, part of an immediately controversial decision to reduce grant funds for major urban areas in the Northeast while providing more to mid-size cities from Jacksonville to Sacramento.

The announcement that the two cities targeted on Sept. 11, 2001, would suffer 40 percent reductions in urban security funds prompted outrage from lawmakers and local officials in both areas, who questioned the wisdom of cutting funds so deeply for cities widely recognized as prime terrorist targets. The decision came less than five months after Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff unveiled changes in the grants plan intended to focus funding on areas facing the gravest risk of attack.

Potential targets outside the Northeast also took painful hits, including New Orleans, San Diego and Phoenix. New Orleans's grants for security and disaster preparedness were cut in half even as it struggles to rebuild after Hurricane Katrina.

In Washington, where the funding dropped from about $77 million to about $46 million, Mayor Anthony A. Williams called the decision "shortsighted."

New York's grant plummeted from about $207 million to $124 million. A DHS risk scorecard for the city asserted that the home of the Empire State Building and the Brooklyn Bridge has "zero" national monuments or icons.

"As far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security and the administration have declared war on New York," Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, told the Associated Press. "It's a knife in the back to New York, and I'm going to do everything I can to make them very sorry they made this decision."

Homeland Security's grant programs have drawn criticism from cities both large and small; many have felt slighted by what they maintained was a haphazard and unfair distribution plan. This year's round of grants was supposed to ensure that enough money goes to areas at highest risk of terrorist attack by employing risk scores, effectiveness tests and 17 "peer review" panels consisting of homeland security professionals from 47 states.

But department officials struggled yesterday to defend the latest outcome even as lawmakers in both parties denounced them. Most experts and many government officials had expected that the new review process would lead to more money, rather than less, for major terrorist targets such as Washington and New York.

Tracy A. Henke, assistant secretary for grants and training, told reporters that the new funding distribution was the result of a better review process and does not indicate lesser risk for cities such as Washington or New York. Officials noted that Congress had cut the program by about $125 million in 2006, to $711 million, and that New York, Washington and other major cities still would receive the largest shares.

"We have to understand that there is risk throughout the nation," Henke said. "We worked very hard to make sure that there was fairness in the process."

The department refused to release the names of panel members or other details about the review boards.

I. Michael Greenberger, director of the Center for Homeland Safety and Security at the University of Maryland, said the plan doesn't pass the common-sense test.

"It's completely inconsistent," Greenberger said. "Where are our priorities? . . . There can be no doubt that Washington and New York are the biggest potential ground zeroes for any future attack."

The Urban Areas Security Initiative provides money to 46 metropolitan areas. It is part of a broader $1.7 billion grant program at DHS, most of which attracted little controversy because it is divided evenly among states and territories.

In addition to Washington and New York, the grant decisions included a 46 percent drop for San Diego, where several of the Sept. 11 hijackers lived; a 61 percent decrease for Phoenix, where an FBI agent suspected that terrorists were taking flight training; and a 30 percent reduction for Boston, the point of origin of the two jetliners that crashed into the World Trade Center.

Phoenix Mayor Phillip Gordon called the grant reduction from $10 million to $3.9 million "outrageous." He said that Phoenix, the nation's fifth-largest city, includes a network of dams, a nuclear power plant and numerous other potential targets.

"Shame on them," Gordon said. "They are literally stripping the ability to protect this area by actions that are incomprehensible."

Winners included Atlanta, Chicago and Los Angeles, as well as smaller cities such as Louisville (up 70 percent), Charlotte (64 percent) and St. Louis (31 percent). The only notable gain in the Northeast was in the Jersey City-Newark area, where the grant rose from $19 million to $34 million.

Louisville's funding increased from $5 million to $8.5 million, and Mayor Jerry Abramson said the money will be used primarily on a project to improve communications between emergency responders. "A lot of this is about logistical issues that are very important if something were to happen," he said.

Undersecretary for Preparedness George Foresman told reporters that although the program was formed with anti-terrorism objectives in mind, the money is meant to improve readiness for "an act of terrorism or an act of Mother Nature."

Yet one of the big losers was hurricane-ravaged New Orleans, whose grant award dropped from $9.3 million to $4.6 million.

The national capital region, which includes Washington and its suburbs in Maryland and Northern Virginia, had requested $190 million in urban security funds for 2006 -- an optimistic figure that would have represented an enormous increase over the $77 million the region received last year.

Washington's deputy mayor for public safety, Edward D. Reiskin, said possible cutbacks will include $25 million planned for communications infrastructure and $10 million for "mass care shelters" to house people displaced from their homes.

"I think it's shortsighted for the federal government to cut funds this way," Williams said at his weekly news briefing. "We remain a target area."

Montgomery County's homeland security director, Gordon Aoyagi, said he was stunned by the news, and predicted "a substantive reduction in a number of regional efforts." Robert Crouch, homeland security adviser to Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine (D), said that "there will be some shakeout" because of the cuts.

New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) scoffed at the grant decision. "When you stop a terrorist, they have a map of New York City in their pocket," he said. "They don't have a map of any of the other 45 places."

Security Cuts For New York And Washington (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 31 — After vowing to steer a greater share of antiterrorism money to the highest-risk communities, Department of Homeland Security officials on Wednesday announced 2006 grants that slashed money for New York and Washington 40 percent, while other cities including Omaha and Louisville, Ky., got a surge of new dollars.

The release of the 2006 urban area grants, which total $711 million, was immediately condemned by leaders in Washington and New York.

"When you stop a terrorist, they have a map of New York City in their pocket," Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York said. "They don't have a map of any of the other 46 or 45 places."

In Washington, Mayor Anthony Williams said: "It was very shortsighted for the federal government to gut our homeland security funding program, even more so because so many dollars continue to be spent in rural areas that are far less likely to emerge as targets."

Homeland security officials said the grants were a result of a more sophisticated evaluation process, combined with a smaller overall allocation of money from Congress.

For the first time, they said, teams of law enforcement officials from around the nation evaluated the effectiveness of the spending proposals submitted by the 46 eligible urban areas, cutting grants for cities that had shoddy or poorly articulated plans.

"We want to make sure we are not simply pushing dollars out of Washington," said Tracy Henke, assistant secretary for grants and training. "The reality is you have to understand that there is risk throughout the nation."

The net effect was that the grant to New York City, which was $207.6 million last year, will drop to $124.5 million this year. Washington will see its grant dollars drop to $46.5 million this year from $77.5 million.

While some cities lost money, other gained. Money for Louisville, Omaha and Charlotte, N.C., jumped by about 40 percent, with grants to each of about $8.5 million. Money for Newark and Jersey City, which received a combined grant, rose 44 percent, to $34 million. Chicago, Atlanta and the Los Angeles area each received smaller, but still sizable increases, an action that drew praise.

"Finally, risk-based funding is kicking in," Representative Jane Harman, Democrat of California, said in a statement. "Los Angeles, the top terrorist target on the West Coast, is beginning to get the necessary funding to protect its people and critical infrastructure."

Gail Braun, grant administrator in Omaha, said she was pleased that the department also recognized the needs of smaller cities. In Omaha, Ms. Braun said, the $8.3 million will be invested primarily in emergency communications equipment and training.

"Any kind of an attack can happen here in the Midwest as well," she said. "We want to make sure we can respond or prevent it in the first place."

Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, who is chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said the allocation formula was flawed.

"This is indefensible," Mr. King said. "It's a knife in the back to New York, and I'm going to do everything I can to make them very sorry they made this decision."

He said senior department officials who had briefed him about the grants made clear that they were unimpressed with the city's plan.

For example, New York spends a large share of its grant money to cover overtime costs for police officers who are guarding high-risk targets, like bridges or the subways, a recurring expense.

New York, in the coming year, also intended to spend about $80 million in grants to install a security camera system in the Wall Street area, allowing the police to monitor details as small as license plates, an approach similar to the so-called Ring of Steel in London, said Paul J. Browne, the deputy police commissioner.

But the emphasis on spending on recurring costs — like overtime — was cited as a factor in the relatively low rating the city's application received, one federal official said.

New York officials were given a one-page tally that explained, in part, how the region's risk-based standing was calculated. The document said the region had no "national monuments or icons," four banking or financial firms with assets of over $8 billion, 28 chemical or hazardous material sites, as well as nearly 7,000 other possible important, high-risk targets, like hospitals or major office buildings, a tally that some city officials said had major omissions or errors.

"It's outrageous that these bean counters don't think the Statue of Liberty, Empire State Building and Brooklyn Bridge are national monuments or icons," said Jordon Barowitz, a spokesman for Mayor Bloomberg.

The $711 million in so-called Urban Area Security Initiative grants was one piece of a larger $1.7 billion pool awarded to states on Wednesday, which is hundreds of millions less than was available last year.

Over all, New York State will get $183.7 million, a 20 percent drop from last year. That means that the state's per capita share of grant money, which totals $2.78 a person, will drop to an even lower level compared with some rural states, like Wyoming, which will get $14.83 a person this year, according to a calculation by Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of New York.

In the first three years that grants were made, New York and Washington received more than any other urban areas. To date, New York has collected $404 million, while Washington has $167 million, compared with $71 million for Houston, $120 million for Chicago, $12.8 million for Charlotte, which all received increases this year.

Ms. Henke, while not explicitly making this point on Wednesday, did say that the department had taken into account regions that had the most work to do to raise their level of preparedness to a national standard.

"It does not mean in any way that the risk in New York is any different or changed or any lower," she said.

Security Funds Shifted From New York, D.C. Area (WT)

By Audrey Hudson And Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

The two cities targeted in the 2001 terrorist attacks -- Washington and New York -- will receive dramatically less money in homeland security grants this year, while some Southern and Midwestern states will get more, officials said yesterday.

All but 12 states will receive grants from a $757 million Urban Areas Security Initiative budget to help local officials prepare for terrorist attacks or natural disasters. The allocation is a $500 million cut over last year.

The National Capital Region, which encompasses the District and parts of Maryland and Virginia, will receive $46.4 million, which is $32 million less than last year. New York City is still the top municipal grant recipient with $124 million, down from $207 million last year.

"I think it was very shortsighted for the federal government to gut our homeland security funding program," said D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams. "We learned the hard way on September 11 that terrorists want to kill innocent Americans and that Washington, D.C., and New York City are among their top targets. I firmly believe that this area could be attacked again at any time, and now is not the time to back off on our efforts."

Funding was increased to California, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, North Carolina, Nebraska and Wisconsin. Cities added to the list include Fort Lauderdale, Fla., $9.9 million; Orlando, Fla., $9.4 million; Memphis, Tenn., $4.3 million; and Milwaukee, $8.5 million.

In a conference call with reporters, Tracy Henke, spokeswoman for the Homeland Security Department's grants and training office, said a panel of 100 homeland security "peers" in 47 states decided how to allocate the money, but she declined to say what cities the "peers" represented.

Funding was based on risk to geographic areas and "anticipated effectiveness of state proposals" on how the money will be spent, she said.

"Risk is ever-changing," Ms. Henke said. "Understand, the department is much better today than last year or the year before, or three years before, on its risk analysis capabilities. We have a much broader insight into information pertaining to those threats than ever before."

Asked whether the risk is still higher in the Washington and New York areas she replied, "There is risk throughout the nation."

Funding was cut from $9.3 million to $4.6 million for New Orleans, which is recovering from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita while preparing for this year's Atlantic hurricane season, which begins today.

Kansas City and St. Louis received more than $9 million, Louisville, Ky., was given nearly $9 million, and Detroit got $18.6 million.

Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, called the allocation "disgraceful" and "indefensible."

"New York City has been attacked twice and is doing more than any other city in the country to defend itself and our nation," Mr. King said. "As far as I'm concerned, [the Department of Homeland Security] and the administration have declared war on New York City, and I am going to fight this as hard as I possibly can. This raises very serious questions about the quality and sincerity of management at every level of the department."

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, New York Democrat, agreed. "This administration's approach to homeland security can be summed up in one word: incompetence," said the chairman of the House Democrats' homeland security task force. "What competent person would possibly think that slashing security funding for the nation's top terrorist target is a smart idea?"

Ed Reiskin, D.C. deputy mayor for public safety and justice, said the city requested $190 million and officials were surprised to receive a funding cut.

Terror Fears Hamper U.S. Muslims' Travel (NYT)

By Neil MacFarquhar

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, May 31 — Azhar Usman, a burly American-born Muslim with a heavy black beard, says he elicits an almost universal reaction when he boards an airplane at any United States airport: conversations stop in midsentence and the look in the eyes of his fellow passengers says, "We're all going to die!"

For Ahmed Ahmed, a comedian, it is even worse. His double-barreled name matches an occasional alias used by a henchman of Osama bin Laden. "It's a bad time to be named Ahmed right now," he riffs in his stand-up routine, before describing being hauled through the Las Vegas airport in handcuffs.

Taleb Salhab and his wife say they too were dragged away in handcuffs at the border crossing in Port Huron, Mich., as their two preschool daughters wailed in the back seat of their car. The Salhabs were discharged after four hours of questioning, with no explanation from customs officers.

Getting through United States airports and border crossings has grown more difficult for everyone since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11. But Muslim Americans say they are having a harder time than most, sometimes facing an intimidating maze of barriers, if not outright discrimination. Advocacy groups have taken to labeling their predicament "traveling while Muslim," and accuse the government of ignoring a serious erosion of civil rights. Next month, the American Civil Liberties Union will go back to court to broaden a suit on behalf of Muslims and Arab-Americans who are demanding the United States government come up with a better system for screening travelers.

The delays, humiliation and periodic roughing up have prompted some American Muslims to avoid traveling as much as possible. Some even skip meeting anyone at the airport for fear of a nasty encounter with a law-enforcement officer. Those who do venture forth say they are always nervous.

"I find myself enunciating English like never before, totally over-enunciating just because I want the guy to know that I am an American," says Maz Jobrani, an Iranian-born, Berkeley-educated actor. "Middle Easterners are just as scared of Al Qaeda as everybody else, but we also have to be worried about being profiled as Al Qaeda. It's a double whammy."

Many Muslim Americans fault the Department of Homeland Security and its various agencies, chiefly the Transportation Security Administration, as failing to develop an efficient system to screen travelers. In particular, they deplore the lack of a workable means for those on the federal watch list by mistake — or those whose names match that of someone on the list — to get themselves off.

Mr. Salhab, 36, says his family remains shaken by their treatment at the border. Officers, their hands on their guns, swarmed around his vehicle, barking at him to get out as alarm bells clanged, he said.

"If I had sneezed or looked the wrong way, who knows what would have happened," Mr. Salhab said in a telephone interview. "I feared for my life."

Now, he said, every time his daughter, 4, sees uniformed officers, she asks if they are going to take him away.

"What happened to me at the border is inexcusable," Mr. Salhab said.

A complaint filed with the Department of Homeland Security in January got Mr. Salhab a form letter saying the government was looking into the situation. There has been no further response.

A number of American Muslims similarly upset by how federal agents treated them and their families are seeking relief through the courts. About eight men with Muslim or Arab roots are joining a suit already filed last year by the American Civil Liberties Union branch in Illinois demanding that the government improve its treatment of returning American citizens.

But similar suits have made little headway. In general, the Constitution protects all Americans against unreasonable search and seizure. But much more aggressive searches have been deemed reasonable at airports and at the border than elsewhere. Just how elastic that standard can be is what the lawsuits are addressing.

The Department of Homeland Security denies engaging in racial profiling. Agents should not base their decisions on a face or a name, said Dan Sutherland, head of the Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties. "They should look at behavior, concrete action, observable activities," he said.

Mr. Sutherland said the department was aware of some problems with the watch list, but he argued that many Muslim Americans traveled without encountering difficulties.

Still, traveling makes many Muslim Americans feel like second-class citizens. Mr. Ahmed, the comedian, often travels wearing a T-shirt that says "Got rights?"

"That's the whole question of my existence right now," he said. "Do we have rights? I'm a taxpayer and I'm an American, and I want to be treated like one."

The problem has become such a part of being a Muslim American that some comedians have built routines around it. Mr. Ahmed and Mr. Jobrani both perform on The Axis of Evil Comedy Tour. Mr. Jobrani jokes about his heightened state of anxiety as he passes through security.

He says, "If anything beeps in the metal detector, I think, 'Dammit, I'm a terrorist! I knew it!"

But underneath the one-liners, the treatment grates. Mr. Ahmed, 35, now avoids flying on the day of a show lest he be barred from his flight. The stress reached a level that the whiskers in his beard started to fall out, he says. ("Your body is trying to de-Muslimize," Mr. Jobrani said jokingly, sitting next to him in a Los Angeles coffee shop. "Next, your skin will get lighter.")

Mr. Ahmed was handcuffed in the Las Vegas airport in November 2004, and, he said, a young black police officer leaned over and said, "Yo man, now you know what it was like to be a black man in the 60's."

It is an apt comparison, Mr. Ahmed feels, noting that after the 1995 Oklahoma City terrorist bombing by a white former soldier, Timothy J. McVeigh, not every blond with a buzz cut was pulled over.

"I know I have to be demure and humble when I approach a ticket agent," Mr. Ahmed said. "If you show any ounce of negativity or righteousness, they'll deny you, they'll say, 'You're not getting on this flight, I don't like your attitude.'"

When he called a phone line for those with travel problems like his, he said, he got no response. "I understand the need for security, but they go overboard, they always have to put on this public display," he said. Mr. Usman, 30, and part of a different comedy act called Allah Made Me Funny, draws big laughs when joking about his obviously Muslim appearance. "If I was a crazy Muslim fundamentalist, this is not the disguise I would go with," he cracks.

He refuses to shave his beard. "I have a problem that people associate a certain look with Muslim terrorists," he said by telephone from his native Chicago. "The look of someone trying to live a religious life, having a long beard, has been around a lot longer than Osama bin Laden and will be around a lot longer than Osama bin Laden."

Most of those wrongly placed on the watch list seethe with frustration and anger, finding it unbelievable that a technologically advanced country like the United States has been unable to develop a list that can distinguish between a lurking terrorist and a harmless citizen with a Muslim name.

Khurrum Wahid, a lawyer, said that the Transportation Security Administration had made empty promises for years about making improvements. "If the name John Smith was on the designated list," Mr. Wahid said, "I guarantee they would have come up with some way to check that list."

Dr. Sam Hamade, 33, was born in Lebanon and carries a Canadian passport but is a permanent United States resident and is seeking citizenship. A senior resident at Upstate Medical University in Syracuse, Dr. Hamade legally changed his name from Osama to Sam to make his patients more comfortable.

In the last two years, driving back from Canada after visiting relatives or his fiancée, Dr. Hamade said, he has been detained at least six times. He has found himself weeping with frustration, he said, because the same thing happens every time — he is photographed, fingerprinted and his body groped — and every time the border police say that they are just following procedures.

Dr. Hamade was handed a "Fact Sheet" instructing him to write to the Border Patrol's "Customer Satisfaction Unit" in Washington. He wrote, but has received no answer. A complaint filed with the Department of Homeland Security in April has also elicited no response.

"It's a nightmare," Dr. Hamade said.

Cover Blown, But Air Marshal Still Flies (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON—The Federal Air Marshal Service continued to put a marshal on commercial flights after he intentionally blew his cover to try to show that agency rules make the undercover officers easy to spot.

Spencer Pickard, who was featured on ABC's 20/20 program May 19, said Wednesday that he flew, armed, three times last week.

Marshals are supposed to fly incognito so terrorists can't overpower them and seize their pistols to hijack a plane.

Marshal service spokesman Dave Adams said Pickard “is still an active air marshal, he's still on our books, and he's going to still be flying missions.”

Adams said air marshals “are supposed to blend in with the passengers.” But he and another spokesman for the service, Conan Bruce, declined to address why Pickard could still fly.

Pickard was featured for about 2½ minutes on an eight- minute, 40-second segment. The May 19 edition of 20/20 was watched by 8.2 million viewers, according to the Nielsen ratings service. The video was still available on ABC's website Wednesday.

Billie Vincent, who oversaw air marshals from 1982 to 1986 as Federal Aviation Administration security chief, said Pickard should no longer work as an air marshal. “After you go public, how can you blend in?” Vincent asked. “If a terrorist can identify a marshal and they have a knife, they can walk by, slit their throat and take their gun.”

Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., chairman of the House aviation subcommittee, said it would be “very hard for anyone to pick him out” and noted that “there's quite a bit of information out about marshals.”

Air marshals fly undercover on planes in teams of at least two. The service, started in 1961, expanded dramatically after the 9/11 attacks.

Pickard, 34, said he expected to be fired or grounded after the TV show, which charged that the Air Marshal Service's rules and procedures make marshals conspicuous in airports and aboard planes.

“I was willing to take this risk to get these issues out there,” Pickard said. He has been an air marshal for four years. In 2004-05, he was a vice president of the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association, a group that has clashed with air marshal management.

Pickard said he was “ordered to fly” on May 22, 23 and 24 but did not fly on May 26 or on Wednesday. Marshals assigned to fly with him on those two days sought different partners because they felt their security was jeopardized by Pickard's exposure, he said.

Pickard's TV appearance coincided with a congressional report criticizing the service for failing to protect marshals' anonymity. The House Judiciary Committee report cites the boarding procedures for marshals and says the service has “shared tactics, methods and procedures, many of which should be considered sensitive, with local and national media.”

Bruce, the spokesman, said policies cited in the report “have either been changed or are going through changes” under Dana Brown, who took over the service in March.

The Right Kind Of Security (WP)

IT WAS THE Dubai port uproar that didn't roar: When a House committee voted this spring against an amendment that would have required all cargo containers bound for this country to be individually inspected in their ports of origin, Congress temporarily put to rest what could have been yet another hyped-up wave of politically motivated anxiety about American port security. Although the House later passed a bill that provides extra funding for nuclear screening and other measures, Democrats vowed to bring up the inspection issue again -- and ran advertisements around the country attacking Republicans who oppose it. Before the "inspect every container" mantra becomes a national war cry, it's important to point out that this is a terrible idea.

Someday, perhaps, advanced X-ray technology may be developed to the point where it's possible to beam a scanner at each one of the 11 million U.S.-bound containers at every port in the world and obtain an instant assessment of what's inside. But while some promising technologies are available, none is perfect, and all of them require a human being to analyze the scans. This not only takes time but also presumes the existence of thousands of trained scan readers around the world. In the absence of such workers, U.S. port and customs authorities examine information about each container -- where it's coming from, which shipping company is carrying it -- and determine whether it is risky enough to merit inspection, either here or abroad. In practice, this results in inspections of about 5 percent of all containers. Even now, U.S. customs officers must rely on the cooperation of foreign authorities to carry out this many inspections.

Homeland security officials could do more. Only about half of incoming containers are subjected to a radiation scan, a number that should rapidly be brought up to 100 percent, as the new House bill requires. Ports are also vulnerable because drivers and dockworkers are not thoroughly screened. Raising the number of U.S. inspectors in foreign ports could also make the inspection system safer. But "inspect 100 percent of containers" is a slogan, not a solution, and we hope lawmakers resist the temptation to use it in the election season to come.

Remaking The Memorial Foundation (NYT)

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Gretchen Dykstra's resignation last Friday as head of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation took almost no one by surprise. Some of the blame for the foundation's problems will surely fall to Ms. Dykstra's account. But the real difficulty is structural. The foundation, which is private, was given a job it should never have had: to build the memorial. That made its real job — raising money for the memorial — harder than it should have been.

Now is the time to fix this mess. The vague relation between the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation and the Memorial Foundation should be clarified. The development agency, in partnership with the Port Authority, should take over the task of building the memorial.

That will put the emphasis back where it belongs. All along, the Memorial Foundation has seemed far more interested in building a 9/11 museum than the memorial itself. In part, this was simply the attraction of creating something the foundation could take credit for, as opposed to a memorial whose design was stipulated in advance. But the foundation's emphasis on the museum also stems from its belief that without a museum the memorial is incomplete. That may be. But there will be time to design and build a museum after the memorial has been set back on the right track.

The foundation lost sight of a simple fact: the memorial designed by Michael Arad was the result of a careful public process. The museum is an afterthought that has never been vetted publicly. But while there were many advocates for the museum at the foundation, it was hard to find any for the memorial, thanks in part to some very confused allegiances on the board of directors.

The time to end that confusion is now. If the Memorial Foundation can raise money for the memorial — and, down the road, a museum — then it should do so. If it can't, then it's hard to say why it should exist at all.

Is Everyone Ready? (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Hurricane season begins today.

Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center in Miami, says people have to wake up.

“People who get hit by a couple of hurricanes still tend to chalk it up to bad luck or a fluke and don't think it can happen again,” he says.

State and local governments along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts are heeding the alarm of last year's record onslaught and forecasts of another worse-than-normal hurricane season this year. Mock disaster drills from the Northeast to Texas have tested local and regional response. States and cities have revamped evacuation plans and set up websites to encourage residents to prepare and store extra provisions. The Federal Emergency Management Agency, roundly criticized for its slow response to Katrina, has tripled its stock of relief supplies.

Flood barriers in New Orleans are mostly back to pre-Katrina strength after more than $700 million in repairs. But that doesn't mean they could withstand another big hurricane. Other major metro areas along the coasts — Houston, Miami, Tampa-St. Petersburg, even New York City — are taking fresh steps to try to avoid having a hurricane nail them the way Katrina crippled New Orleans.

Despite gales of pre-season publicity, Mayfield says many people along the USA's hurricane coasts are not poised for the next tropical storm, let alone for a monster like 2005's Katrina. The Census Bureau says more than 34.6 million people live in the most at-risk coastal zones, from the Carolinas to Texas. That's more than triple the population there in 1950.

Mayfield, who has barnstormed hurricane country for weeks to preach the gospel of readiness, sees trouble in a recent poll of coastal residents in 12 Atlantic and Gulf states. The survey of 1,100 people by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research found that more than half don't feel vulnerable to hurricanes, and three in five have no family disaster plan.

The poll, released in mid-May by the National Hurricane Survival Initiative, a public-private partnership that includes the hurricane center, also found that more than two-thirds of the respondents have no hurricane survival kit. And half erroneously believe that masking tape makes windows shatterproof in a storm. Thirteen percent say they wouldn't evacuate, even if ordered to leave.

“The folks there in Mississippi and Louisiana who made a conscious decision not to evacuate (in Katrina) were not just tempting fate, they were playing Russian roulette,” Mayfield says.

He says he was heartened by the unprecedented turnout of media for the center's five-stop “hurricane awareness” tour this spring along the Gulf Coast. But news coverage “is all for nothing if we can't translate that into individuals taking personal responsibility and developing their own hurricane plan.”

One reason for apathy may be timing. Although hurricane season starts today, June and July rarely record a tropical storm more than once every other year, according to records dating to 1886. The heart of hurricane season normally is mid-August through October. The official end is Nov. 30. Last year's record assault brought two named storms in June and five in July. There also have been tropical storms in the last two Decembers.

This year's forecast is for up to 16 tropical storms, eight to 10 of them hurricanes and as many as six of them major, meaning a Category 3 or higher with winds of at least 111 mph. But when and where will the storms occur, and will any of them strike the USA?

“Right now no one knows exactly what areas of the coast, or which states or locations,” Mayfield told a Senate panel last week. “Could it be Florida again? Maybe. How about New England or New York City? That's possible. … The bottom line is that all coastal states from Texas to Maine are vulnerable.”

Most vulnerable this year is the battered Gulf Coast. An estimated 110,000 people who lost their homes to Katrina, Rita and Wilma now live in 39,000 government trailers. The temporary quarters are no match for a strong storm, let alone any hurricane, Mayfield says. These people must be ready to leave — quickly.

“I can identify very well with those folks,” Mayfield says. His home in a Miami suburb was damaged by Hurricane Andrew in 1992, forcing him to live in a trailer for more than six months.

Whenever the first storm of 2006 arrives, it will be named Alberto, from one of several alphabetical lists that rotate each year. Last year's list of names ran out, so the hurricane center had to use Greek letters to complete the record tally of 28 named storms, 15 of which were hurricanes.

Preparedness exercises this spring added more names of fake hurricanes: “Alicia” in New Orleans' evacuation test; “Zoey” in Florida's statewide drill; “Eunice” in Texas; and “Xena” in a two-week exercise at the U.S. Northern Command, the military branch of the nation's homeland defense. Even the White House joined in last week with “Boudreaux,” an imaginary Category 5 storm blasting New Orleans again in a tabletop test for the president's Cabinet.

Besides holding disaster drills, states and agencies such as the Red Cross continue to stress self-preparedness. They say residents should be ready to subsist on their own for 72 hours after a storm.

Florida, the most hurricane-prone state, last week unveiled its “Get a Plan!” campaign of broadcast ads and billboards and a new website to help families and businesses prepare for storms. One broadcast spot plays 911 calls from people who didn't evacuate before Hurricane Ivan in 2004. They were unreachable by rescuers because the danger was too great.

Florida also is holding a 12-day holiday from paying state sales tax on purchases of hurricane supplies, ending today.

North Carolina, second to Florida in hurricane strikes, also launched a website in May to help residents prepare for natural disasters. “Our main concern is that there are so many people moving into North Carolina from other places that maybe have not been through a hurricane,” says Renee Hoffman of the Department of Crime Control and Public Safety.

DOJ_NMG_0030925

Texas has overhauled evacuation plans after dozens of people died in the gridlocked exodus of more than 2 million people from Houston and Galveston last September as Hurricane Rita approached.

The plans include quicker re-supplying of gas stations along evacuation routes. Rest stops will have more water, ice and medical stations, says Rachael Novier of the governor's office. A contractor has guaranteed to provide 1,100 buses for evacuation. A pre-storm registry using the state's "211" phone information line aims to identify ahead of time any elderly, sick or other people who need a ride out.

Another key change in Texas: It will be OK to evacuate with pets. Past bans on animals in shelters deterred some residents from fleeing dangerous storms. "One way that we are sure people move to safety is to say, come on and bring your dog," Novier says.

Emergency managers in New York City, which would have to evacuate up to 2.5 million people in a major hurricane, say Katrina caught people's attention. "New Yorkers who normally are complacent are starting to take hurricanes seriously," says Jarrod Bernstein of the Office of Emergency Management. It now features hurricane advice prominently on its website.

"Take Rockaway peninsula," Bernstein says, referring to the city neighborhood most exposed to an Atlantic hurricane. "We go out there every year to talk about hurricanes, and they're like, 'No way we're leaving.' This year it's, 'You know what? If the man says it's time to go, we're going to go.' "

He says emergency planners debriefed 1,000 New York fire, rescue and police employees who went to the Gulf Coast in Katrina's aftermath to revise the city's hurricane plan. Next week, they'll stage a tabletop exercise, then a live field drill in mid-July with buses and several hundred people at one of the city's 65 evacuation centers.

"Katrina only brought it into sharper focus," Bernstein says. "We need to make that decision to evacuate early. We know that is going to be an unpopular decision if it's 70 degrees and balmy. … While the probability of a Category 4 storm for New York City is low, it only has to happen once."

Forecasters are beefing up with more staff and better tools. The hurricane center has hired four more tropical storm specialists — to predict storm movement and behavior — for a total of 10.

Among the data they draw on are a dozen computer forecast models. An upgrade this year to one of them will zero in on the "loop current," an extra-warm ribbon of water in the Gulf of Mexico. That current was responsible in part for the rapid strengthening of both Katrina and Rita as they approached the coast.

The hurricane center also will post new color-coded contour maps on its website that predict the range of wind speeds at landfall for a tropical storm days before it hits. The maps can help coastal communities in the wide zone of a possible strike to better gauge how strong the storm will be.

In the Florida Keys, the National Weather Service has completed a $5.1 million office built to withstand a Category 5 storm.

"I feel so strongly that the battle against the hurricane is won now, outside the hurricane season," says Mayfield, 57, who has traveled so much this spring to conferences, interviews, hearings and meetings that he caught bronchitis. "You just can't afford to wait for the hurricane to come knocking on your door before you get prepared."

Last week was a typical blur. On May 22 in Miami, Mayfield announced the hurricane season forecast. Then he flew to Texas to meet with emergency managers prepping for the season. The next day, he did news interviews, spoke at a Texas hurricane conference and then flew to Washington to testify on Capitol Hill. Last Thursday brought more meetings, a lunch speech, a huddle with Florida's congressional delegation and a briefing on new weather satellites. He flew home to Miami that night.

He's at it again this week. Wednesday, he went to the Florida Keys for two hurricane workshops and a TV show. Today, Mayfield is scheduled for TV interviews.

"I've worked my whole career to prevent a large loss of life like what happened in Katrina. If there's anything good that can come out of the last hurricane season, I hope it's the motivation to create that culture of preparedness."

Category 5 Foolishness (LAT)

By David Helvarg

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

TODAY MARKS the beginning of the 2006 hurricane season, one that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration predicts will be "above normal," with four to six major hurricanes expected to form in the Atlantic — storms that could make landfall anywhere from Boston to Galveston.

Everyone agrees that we're into a decades-long cycle of intensified Atlantic hurricanes linked to a periodic 1-degree warming in the North Atlantic. Add an additional degree of ocean warming since 1970 from anthropogenic — human-caused — carbon-dioxide emissions, and you have the makings of a hurricane cycle that may never return to a more tranquil phase. Yet when it comes to the way we live in hurricane territory, we're stuck in the 1970s and 1980s, when a lull in storm activity aided and abetted unprecedented development along the Atlantic seaboard, helping assure that 17 of the 20 fastest-growing counties in the U.S. were coastal.

Florida, which was lucky last year in comparison with Louisiana and Mississippi, is still a poster child for hurricane devastation. Flying into Fort Lauderdale, it looks like someone scattered blue Chiclets across the landscape. That's how many blue tarps cover roofs blown away by Hurricane Wilma. At the Broward County courthouse, windows are still covered in plywood eight months after the storm.

What might be called "early greenhouse century" hubris abounds. A woman I met in Key West told me about her retired parents who had to flee their home four times in the last two years. Instead of moving, they're investing in an "evacuation RV" so they can flee the next storm in comfort. And in Miami, the skyline is swarming with construction cranes as developers build high-rise condos as close to the ocean as possible.

Congress has approved funding that will allow the Federal Emergency Management Agency to pay off $23 billion in property claims from last year's storms without making any commitment to reforming the flood insurance program. The levees in New Orleans are being rebuilt to something like pre-Katrina levels of safety, again paid for with federal money. The Bush administration and the Department of Homeland Security have been bragging about the pre-positioning of emergency relief supplies. Yet federal policymakers continue to ignore the causal factors that transform major storms into human catastrophes, such as the loss of protective wetlands and coastal sprawl.

So far, none of the tens of billions of dollars of hurricane relief funding that have gone into the Gulf region has been earmarked for wetlands restoration. Wetlands in Mississippi and Louisiana have historically acted as effective hurricane buffers. One often-cited Army Corps of Engineers study found that every 2 1/2 miles of marshes and trees reduce storm surge by a foot. But in the 1990s, Biloxi wetlands were replaced by floating casinos and waterfront development. And in Louisiana, Hurricane Katrina destroyed 118 square miles of wetlands and barrier islands on top of the average 30 square miles of wetlands lost every year in recent decades because of dredging and subsidence from Army Corps of Engineers and oil industry operations. "Even though I'm fairly jaded, I thought we'd have found the courage and the vision to at least begin the process of restoration, but so far nothing has changed," said Mark Davis, executive director of the Coalition to Restore Coastal Louisiana, a private group that has spent a decade pushing a $14-billion plan to bring back the wetlands.

Congress also has failed to show the courage to stand up to the coastal real estate developers lobby, and some coastal homeowners, and implement needed change. Proposals have included limiting federal flood insurance to owner-occupants rather than second-home owners and owners of rental properties, moving to a real market insurance rate (rather than a subsidized one) for high-risk properties and extending areas that require flood insurance to cover a wider zone of potential destruction. With a FEMA study suggesting one in four homes built within 500 feet of the ocean will be destroyed in the next 45 years, a new approach is needed to discourage shoreline and barrier island construction and encourage a planned retreat from along our coasts.

The facts are simple. The best available science tells us that we're faced with a projected sea-level rise and an increase in Category 4 and 5 hurricanes. We need a pragmatic approach to a changed reality. Those who think they can rebuild in harm's way using the same assumptions that worked in the last century, or who believe they can manage nature by stockpiling generators and water bottles, are living a dangerous fantasy. Unfortunately, theirs is a fantasy we're all having to pay for.

Hurricane History Isn't Worth Repeating (USAT)

By Orrin H. Pilkey

USA Today (editorial), June 1, 2006

In the mid-1960s, my engineer father was assigned to the Saturn space rocket test site near Waveland, Miss. My parents loved the weather, the beaches and the people.

But the tranquility of small town life came to a crashing end in 1969 when Hurricane Camille paid a visit. My parents' house was flooded, and falling trees punctured the roof. Their plight, however, was nothing compared with those in the first two blocks next to the beach, where essentially every building was destroyed.

Waveland was eventually rebuilt, my parents have both since passed on and the impact of Camille has become a faded memory — until the morning of Aug. 29, 2005, when Hurricane Katrina's eye passed right over Waveland. This time, the total destruction extended five or six blocks back from the beach.

I recently visited a cousin whose house is not far from the concrete pad that marks the former site of my parents' house. I was impressed by the large number of volunteers still helping in the recovery effort — eight months later. Many were from church groups, as evidenced bybuses emblazoned with various Baptist or Catholic church names.

Also in the mix were Mennonites — a row of ladies with long dresses and bonnets raking up debris — and college students who bypassed Cancun or Panama City to spend spring break in Waveland.

Still, I couldn't help but notice a number of distressing scenes, such as the proliferation of "For Sale" signs posted along the beach road. Some listed the price — one lot was selling for $685,000 and another for $700,000. Each lot featured nothing but a stark, white concrete pad, surrounded by nothing but empty concrete pads for as far as the eye could see.

At the west end of Waveland was a new billboard, nestled among twisted I-beams and fragments of a destroyed pier, advertising a soon-to-be-built four-tower, 36-story beachfront condominium. It will be the first high-rise in Waveland and will dramatically increase the town's population.

One problem with the condo is that everyone must escape the next hurricane down a two-lane beachfront road. The incongruity between volunteers helping the people of Waveland and developers seeking to profit from reconstruction in an obviously dangerous zone couldn't be greater.

An illustration of the town's vulnerability came about a month ago, when a small storm from the south flooded parts of Waveland and portions of the beachfront road.

There's no question that whatever gets rebuilt will again be destroyed. The only question is when. Waveland is adjacent to a broad flat continental shelf responsible for past storm surges in excess of 20 feet. The sorrowful end point is that Katrina likely will become nothing more than an urban renewal project, just as Camille was 36 years earlier.

If the complete destruction of six blocks next to the shore doesn't precipitate changes in coastal development, I'm afraid nothing will. Improving building codes or nourishing the beach won't work because rebuilding a community to withstand a future Category 4 or 5 hurricane with a 20-plus foot surge is an economic impossibility.

Today, the new hurricane season begins, in a time of rising sea levels and increasing intensity of storms. It makes no sense to simply rebuild and even increase building density after Katrina. It might be difficult to accept, but reconstruction near the beach should be prohibited. Strong consideration should also be given to halting future federal storm bailouts, including taxpayer-supported flood insurance and the handout of post-storm cleanup and reconstruction funds — all of which only encourages rebuilding in the most dangerous locations. Government purchase of vulnerable beach properties, as costly as it might be, would pay off in the long term.

Will we ever learn? Near the remains of City Hall is a still-standing historic sign thanking the volunteers who helped Waveland recover from Camille in 1969.

Perhaps Waveland should construct a new sign thanking the volunteer workers who came down after Camille and Katrina, but leave additional space to thank those who come after the next "big one."

Once More Into The Breach (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT has spent more than $700 million in recent months to shore up Louisiana's levees in time for the 2006 hurricane season, which begins today. In California's Central Valley, however, some levees are at risk almost every day; much of the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta lies below sea level and, as in New Orleans, the ground is slowly sinking.

Nevertheless, local officials in parts of the Central Valley are doling out permits to develop what were once farms and open spaces. The urge to convert is driven not just by profit-seeking landowners but by cities and counties eager for property tax receipts. And it's abetted by flood-insurance rules that assume the levees offer more protection than they really do.

Researchers have found numerous problems in the levee system, prompting California lawmakers to provide $500 million this year for levee improvements and to propose a $4-billion bond issue for additional upgrades. Assuming the federal government covers its share of costs, that money will improve the situation facing cities, suburbs and other developed areas.

But those upgrades aren't likely to reach the segments of the 1,600-mile levee system that stand between the floodwaters and farms, wetlands and other undeveloped land. Flooding farms is bad enough, but as homes, industrial parks and Costcos sprout on those lands, the risks from a catastrophic breach grow. And under a 2004 ruling by a state appeals court, state taxpayers can be held liable for the damage caused when a levee breaks.

That's why Assemblyman Dave Jones (D-Sacramento) wants to make local officials pause before letting developers turn an orchard into an Orchard Supply Hardware. His bill, AB 3050, would hold cities and counties jointly liable with the state to the extent that, by approving a project on undeveloped land, they increase the property damage caused by a flood.

Naturally, developers and local governments are opposed to the measure. The latter argue it's not fair to hold them liable when it's not their job to maintain levees. True enough. But they shouldn't be allowed to remain willfully blind to the risks. And that is exactly what is happening in parts of the Central Valley, where land that was flooded a decade ago is being readied for development.

Ever since Hurricane Katrina hammered New Orleans, no one in local government should be relying on levees to safeguard property — particularly not when the state's taxpayers are on the hook to cover the losses. The Assembly rejected Jones' bill last month, but it should reverse course and approve the bill when it comes up for reconsideration today.

Support Your Local Banker (NYT)

By Otis White

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Atlanta

AFTER winning re-election as New Orleans's mayor, C. Ray Nagin promised a new beginning and an economic boom for his city fueled by federal financing for reconstruction. But in fulfilling that pledge, Mr. Nagin and his fellow Gulf Coast political leaders lack a vital resource that their predecessors of even a decade ago had: strong and engaged local bankers.

One example, from Amarillo, Tex., would be Donald E. Powell, President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding. Mr. Powell built a career the old-fashioned way: starting out as loan officer at a savings and loan in his hometown, jumping to the biggest bank in town and working his way to the top. By 1987, he was the chief executive of First National Bank of Amarillo and, in time, he wore every civic badge worth wearing: chairman of the chamber of commerce, member of the city housing authority, patron of the local boys' ranch, trustee of High Plains Baptist Hospital. Had disaster struck Amarillo in the mid-1990's, Mr. Powell could have stood at the front of the room and told federal officials every project worth supporting and every politician to avoid.

Bankers rarely lead cities that way anymore, and their exit from the stage speaks to how communities have changed — and why it may be harder to mend them when disasters strike.

From the 1950's to the 1980's, bank chiefs were the capi di tutti capi of civic leaders in most cities, the bosses of all bosses. They ran important companies, but that wasn't why they were powerful. Their power came from continual involvement in civic work, an intimate knowledge of their communities and their occasional boldness.

Ivan Allen Jr., the former mayor of Atlanta, provided a snapshot of one banker as leader when he wrote about a meeting with the president of Citizens and Southern National Bank, Mills B. Lane Jr., in the mid-1960's. Mr. Allen wanted to bring a Major League Baseball franchise to Atlanta but lacked a credible plan for building a stadium.

"How bad do you want this stadium, Ivan?" Mr. Lane asked.

"Bad."

"You've got it," said Mr. Lane, who added that he would pledge the full credit of his bank to build the stadium and that he and other local executives would oversee construction. "And if that's not enough to get it done, you and I can't get it done."

Mr. Allen was stunned that Mr. Lane was willing to venture the bank's money on such a speculative civic project (as it turned out, the stadium was built and the investment returned), but such things were possible in the 1960's because banks were joined at the hip to their communities. The law prohibited bank companies from owning banks outside their home states and sometimes even outside their home counties. So Citizens and Southern could grow only if Atlanta grew too.

And today? In most cities, the chief executives of the largest banks are no more involved in civic work than the branch managers of I.B.M. That's because, since the 1980's, bank-holding restrictions have eased, local banks have been bought by out-of-state companies and the people who run the banks have become branch managers.

The numbers tell part of the story: there are now about 7,600 commercial banks in the United States, down from 13,000 in 1980. But this decline, as big as it is, underestimates the impact on civic leadership, since the consolidations have been greatest among the larger banks that once led their communities. Today, the top three banks in Chicago, Dallas, Denver, Houston, Los Angeles, Washington and scores of other cities are owned by companies headquartered elsewhere. (In New Orleans, only one of the top three is owned locally.) Even Mr. Powell's old bank, First National of Amarillo, was bought in the 1990's, first by Boatsmen's Bancshares, then by NationsBank (now Bank of America).

Bank presidents have become corporate nomads. A few years ago, I calculated how long bank executives from First Union Bank (now part of Wachovia Bank) stayed in Atlanta. From June 1994 to September 2000, there were three regional chief executives. With gaps, as one left and the next arrived, the average tenure was 20 months, barely time to attend a few chamber of commerce meetings, much less to lead the organization.

The decline of bankers as leaders has made cities more dependent on political leadership. Thankfully, there have been some gifted mayors in recent years, but where there haven't been, cities have suffered. There are few Mills Lanes around to instruct mayors on how to get things done.

Nor are there many bankers left with the knowledge or authority to invest their banks' resources in bold rebuilding efforts. As the main federal contact for congressional, state, local and private leaders in supporting the recovery of the Gulf Coast, Mr. Powell must already be painfully aware of their passing.

For Many, Education Is Another Storm Victim (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

BAKER, La. — For hundreds of children at Renaissance Village, this is their lost year. After fleeing Hurricane Katrina, they have landed in a vast gravel moonscape of government trailers, lacking even a playground.

All day they play video games, ride bikes or sit at a picnic table, watching men play horseshoes. They are not in school.

Of the 560 children who are evacuees and were enrolled in the Baker school district in mid-September, only 190 were still attending when the school year ended on May 19.

Part of the decline occurred because some families moved, but as of April there were still more than 800 children under 18 at Renaissance Village and the other trailer parks run by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Child health experts and advocates for evacuees say that Baker, on the outskirts of Baton Rouge, is not unique. Throughout the areas where hurricane evacuees ended up, they say, are pockets where education has fallen by the wayside, raising the possibility that thousands of children could become permanent dropouts.

More alarming, said Sister Judith Brun, who works with children at Renaissance Village through the Baton Rouge Area Foundation, is that the problem is not limited to high school students. "I think the big reason is that school has not engaged them, not comforted and motivated them," she said. "They all had terrible stories racing around in their heads."

Since many of the parents did not graduate from high school, the children's relationship to school was already tenuous, Sister Judith said. "Any breeze is adequate to keep them out of school, any vicissitude."

On a recent Thursday at the park, children were plentiful. "I don't go to Baker Middle no more," said David Williams, an eighth grader who was hanging out under one of the two white tents that provide virtually the park's only shade. "I stopped going."

Lisa Casborn, 15, agreed. "Everybody stopped going to school," she said.

"Sometimes I get up and I look out the window for the bus," Lisa said, "and if the bus ain't out there, I go back to bed."

Parents, children and educators give a variety of reasons for the children's truancy. Most families have moved several times since the hurricane, and children grew frustrated when they could not catch up.

Some parents never enrolled their children because they thought they would be able to return home much sooner. Parents and children also cited separation anxiety and the perception that they were not welcome by their host students or teachers.

Linda W. Lewis, the principal of the Capitol Pre-College Academy for Girls, where many evacuees enrolled while they were living at the large shelter at the Baton Rouge River Center, had another explanation. "I think it's just apathy," she said.

Ms. Lewis said that some of the students from New Orleans, whose school system was notoriously poor, had trouble with the strict routine at Capitol.

In Baton Rouge and Houston, fights have occurred between New Orleans teenagers and their hosts. Dozens of New Orleans children were expelled or suspended and never went back. In Baker, children who were expelled had no alternative but private school, which their families could not afford.

"They were thrown into a big classroom without close monitoring, without the necessary mental health help that they needed, and the only thing they had left that they owned was their ego," said Tommy Cowsar, a volunteer who has been teaching children on site at Renaissance Village. "When they were pushed slightly, they pushed back."

Michael Lewis, an eighth grader who was expelled from Baker Middle School for fighting, said he had not gotten into similar trouble back in New Orleans. "You can't really hardly communicate with other people" in Baton Rouge, he said. "I don't know why they have such a grudge on us. They just do."

If it were not for the hurricane, Michael said, he would be enrolled. "I love school," he said. "There's no place I would rather be, during school hours, than school."

Mr. Cowsar said Michael had asked to join his group, whose efforts to become an official charter school have faltered. The group lost financing for the two teachers it had in the fall, and it had only a couple of volunteers to handle about 15 children ages 4 to 14. There was no room for Michael.

Michael said he had wanted to go to summer school, for which parents must pay in some districts. At any rate, he said, his mother did not have time to sign him up. "I want to stay in a child place," he said, "but life keep putting me in a man's place."

One parent, Trinest Sylve, said that two of her children liked their East Baton Rouge school but that one, her son Holden, stopped going after repeatedly getting into trouble. The school called frequently while she was at work, asking her to pick him up, she said.

Like many children, Holden did not view his absence from school as permanent. Some thought, however optimistically, that in the coming fall they would be back at the schools they left last August. Others, like Lisa and Michael, said they wanted to take summer school to make up for what they missed.

But Dr. Irwin Redlener, a professor at the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University and the president of the Children's Health Fund, said children who disconnected from school would suffer more than just an academic setback, especially if they had untreated mental health issues. "It's almost like we're creating conditions for them that are virtually impossible to overcome," he said.

One problem, Dr. Redlener said, was that so many major questions about the future of New Orleans remained unanswered. "The kids really cannot afford to wait until all those big things are resolved before they stabilize the basics," he said.

While some children seem to have simply lost interest, others have found their enthusiasm thwarted. Chris Waller, a junior, said he was turned away by several area high schools that told him they were full. "I said, 'How can you deny a kid an education?' " he recalled. "And they said, 'Sorry.' I was stunned."

Chris's father, James Waller, a manager at a fast food restaurant and a leader of the Renaissance Village residents' council, said he waited until his son turned 17 in December and then enrolled him in GED classes for adults. He spoke from the front steps of his trailer, painted in the purple and gold of Louisiana State University, where Chris had planned to attend.

"Now my chances of going," Chris said, "are slim to none."

WAR NEWS:

In First Comments On Case, Bush Promises Justice In Military Investigation Of Civilian Deaths (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 31 — President Bush said Wednesday that he was troubled by the allegations that American marines killed 24 Iraqi civilians in an unprovoked attack, and he vowed that "those who violated the law, if they did, will be punished."

"I am troubled by the initial news stories," Mr. Bush said in his first public comments about the accusations. "I am mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on. If, in fact, the laws were broken, there will be punishment."

Mr. Bush also said he had spoken with Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about the killings last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, 150 miles northwest of Baghdad. As many as 24 civilians there died in gunfire after a Marine patrol was attacked, and survivors say many of the victims were offering no resistance. "I know this," Mr. Bush said. "I've talked to General Pete Pace about the subject, who is a proud marine, and nobody is more concerned about these allegations than the Marine Corps." Mr. Bush spoke in response to a question from a reporter during an appearance with President Paul Kagame of Rwanda.

The killings, first reported in March by Time magazine, represent the most serious allegations of military misconduct in Iraq since reports in 2004 that soldiers had abused prisoners at the American-run military prison at Abu Ghraib. Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld was taken to task by the president at that time for failing to inform him promptly.

On Wednesday, mindful of that history, White House officials were trying to put together a timeline of who knew what and when.

Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said officials had put together "a tick-tock on Haditha," beginning about Nov. 19, 2005, the day the 24 Iraqis were killed in the aftermath of a roadside bombing that killed one of the marines assigned to the Third Battalion, First Marine Regiment. But Mr. Snow said the "concern about subsequent reports of people being massacred or people being killed was really stimulated" in January, after Time reporters made inquiries.

The military began an investigation on Feb. 14, and Mr. Bush was informed of it sometime after that by his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, according to Frederick Jones, the National Security Council spokesman. Mr. Jones said Mr. Hadley could not recall a precise date.

At the Pentagon, the press secretary, Eric Ruff, said Mr. Rumsfeld was first told about the Haditha accusations in mid-March. He said senior military officers described to Mr. Rumsfeld what had been learned in an initial investigation and plans for opening a criminal inquiry. At that time, Mr. Ruff said, the secretary "was trying to determine how comprehensive the investigation was and whether it was being handled at a senior enough level."

But it is not clear whether Mr. Rumsfeld personally briefed the president on the episode.

With polls showing the American public deeply uneasy over the course of the war, and the Congressional midterm elections just months away, the Haditha investigation could quickly turn into a political problem for the White House and

Republicans. On Capitol Hill, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has said he will hold hearings after Congress returns from recess.

The Pentagon has said military investigators are wrapping up work on two separate inquiries, including a criminal investigation that American officials say they expect to result in murder charges. One senior Republican Congressional aide said the members of his party on Capitol Hill were nervous about the political impact of the episode and wanted to get information out quickly to avoid a "drip, drip" of news stories leading up to November.

"You've got an election that the White House is doing everything possible to prevent from being a forum on the president and Iraq," said the aide, speaking on condition of anonymity to avoid appearing to criticize Republicans. "And here you have the biggest P.R. problem since Abu Ghraib running right smack into the summertime before a major campaign."

Bush 'troubled' By Haditha Allegations (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, June 1, 2006

President Bush promised on Wednesday that if any Marines are found to have been involved in murders of Iraqi civilians, they will be punished.

"I am troubled by the initial news stories," Bush said in his first public comments about the deaths of about two dozen civilians at Haditha in November. "I'm mindful that there's a thorough investigation going on. If in fact, laws were broken, there will be punishment."

The shootings came after a bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Residents of Haditha said Marines then went into nearby houses and shot members of two families, including a 3-year-old girl.

In Iraq, meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki declared a state of emergency Wednesday in oil-rich Basra — a response to violence spreading from Baghdad to the country's southern economic heartland.

In an address to about 700 tribal sheiks, religious leaders, officials, army officers and residents, al-Maliki vowed to restore security. It was his first major policy speech since his government was sworn in May 20.

"We shall use an iron fist against the leaders of the gangs or those who threaten security," he said. "And we shall ask all security departments to draw up an effective and quick plan to achieve security."

Al-Maliki declared a month-long state of emergency, which broadens arrest powers for Iraqi security services and establishes a curfew. It was the only state of emergency in effect in Iraq, Maj. Gen. Ahmed al-Khafaji, Interior Ministry undersecretary, said from Basra, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad.

Other cities where violence is rampant, such as Baghdad and Ramadi, just have curfews.

Tensions have been worsening in the Shiite-dominated Basra area. Mostly Shiite militias have been attacking Sunni Arabs and battling each other and Iraqi and British members of the U.S.-led coalition.

The Shiite prime minister traveled to Basra with the Sunni Arab vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi. Both leaders said security must be restored before prosperity can return to the port city.

"Basra is no exception from what is taking place in Baghdad, Anbar, Nineveh and Diyala," al-Hashimi said, referring to other volatile provinces. "There are malignant agendas to deepen divisions among Iraqis."

Police Capt. Mushtaq Kadhim said nearly 140 people — mostly Sunnis, but also Shiites and policemen — were killed this month in Basra, which until the past few months had been a fairly calm area.

In the latest violence:

·U.S. forces killed two Iraqi women — one of them about to give birth — Tuesday when the troops shot at a car that failed to stop at a prohibited area in Samarra, north of Baghdad, police Capt. Laith Mohammed and the U.S. military said Wednesday.

·Ali Jaafar, 25, a sportscaster for state-run al-Iraqiya TV, was gunned down in a drive-by shooting near his home in southwestern Baghdad, police Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohammedawi said. His death came two days after CBS News correspondent Kimberly Dozier was seriously wounded and two of her crewmembers were killed by a car bomb in Baghdad.

·A mortar attack killed nine people and wounded 20 on Wednesday in Baghdad's southern Dora district, Police 1st Lt. Mohammed Kheyoun said.

·A car packed with explosives hit a police patrol in Mosul, 225 miles northwest of Baghdad. At least five policemen died and 14 were injured, police Col. Abdulkarim Ahmed said.

Bush Upset With Iraq Killings Reports (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, May 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030932

President Bush promised on Wednesday that any Marines involved in the alleged murders of Iraqi civilians will be punished. A senior officer said the case could undermine Iraqis' support for the presence of American troops.

"I am troubled by the initial news stories," Bush said in his first public comments about the deaths of about two dozen civilians at Haditha last January. "I'm mindful that there's a thorough investigation going on. If in fact, laws were broken, there will be punishment."

Military investigators have evidence that points toward unprovoked murders by Marines, a senior defense official said last week.

The shootings came after a bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Residents of Haditha said Marines then went into nearby houses and shot members of two families, including a 3-year-old girl.

At first, the American military described what happened as an ambush on a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol, with a roadside bombing and subsequent firefight killing 15 civilians, eight insurgents and a Marine. The statement said the 15 civilians were killed by the blast, a claim the residents strongly denied.

With some in Congress alleging a cover-up, the Bush administration offered assurances the facts will be made public.

Bush's spokesman, Tony Snow, urged patience as the Marines conduct what he called a vigorous investigation. He said a report will come out in "a matter of weeks, not a matter of months" and include public release of photographic evidence. "We're going to see everything," Snow said.

Once that investigation is completed, a senior Marine commander in Iraq will decide whether to press charges of murder or other violations of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

At the Pentagon, Army Brig. Gen. Carter Ham would not discuss any aspect of the probe, but he stressed the potential harm caused by allegations alone.

"Allegations such as this, regardless of how they are borne out by the facts, can have an effect on the ability of U.S. forces to continue to operate," said Ham, a deputy operations director for the Joint Staff and a former commander of U.S. forces in northern Iraq.

"We do rely very heavily — and more importantly, the Iraqi security forces rely heavily — on the support from the Iraqi people," Ham said. "And anything that tends to diminish that, obviously, is not helpful to what we're trying to do."

The toll of Iraqi civilians climbed on Wednesday when two women, including one being taken to a maternity hospital, died when coalition troops shot at a car that failed to stop at an observation post in a city north of Baghdad. The U.S. military said the vehicle entered a clearly marked prohibited area but failed to obey repeated warnings.

The president was asked about the Haditha allegations during a photo opportunity with the president of Rwanda, Paul Kagame.

Bush said he had discussed Haditha with Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "He's a proud Marine. And nobody is more concerned about these allegations than the Marine Corps. The Marine Corps is full of honorable people who understand the rules of war."

"If in fact these allegations are true," Bush said, "the Marine Corps will work hard to make sure that that culture — that proud culture — will be reinforced. And that those who violated the law, if they did, will be punished."

Until now the most infamous violation of military law in Iraq was the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse involving Army soldiers, which came to light in April 2004. Bush said last week he considered Abu Ghraib to be the most costly U.S. mistake of the war.

Probe Into Iraq Deaths Finds False Reports (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The U.S. military investigation of how Marine commanders handled the reporting of events last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, where troops allegedly killed 24 Iraqi civilians, will conclude that some officers gave false information to their superiors, who then failed to adequately scrutinize reports that should have caught their attention, an Army official said yesterday.

The three-month probe, led by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell, is also expected to call for changes in how U.S. troops are trained for duty in Iraq, the official said.

Even before the final report is delivered, Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is expected to order today that all U.S. and allied troops in Iraq undergo new "core values" training in how to operate professionally and humanely. Not only will leaders discuss how to treat civilians under the rules of engagement, but small units also will be ordered to go through training scenarios to gauge their understanding of those rules. "It's going to include everyone in the coalition," the official said.

The promotion of a top Marine general also has been put on hold.

Bargewell has pursued two lines of investigation: not only whether falsehoods were passed up the chain of command, but also whether senior Marine commanders were derelict in their duty to monitor the actions of subordinates. The inquiry is expected to conclude by the end of this week, the official added. He said there were multiple failures but declined to say whether he would characterize it as a "coverup," as alleged recently by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a former Marine.

The Bargewell report, which is expected to be delivered to top commanders by the end of the week, is one of two major military investigations into what happened at Haditha on Nov. 19, 2005, and how commanders reacted to the incident. The other is a criminal inquiry by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service. That sprawling investigation involves more than 45 agents and is expected to conclude this summer, Pentagon officials and defense lawyers said yesterday. No charges have been filed, but people familiar with the case say they expect charges of homicide, making a false statement and dereliction of duty, among others.

President Bush, in his first public comment on the Haditha incident, said yesterday that if an investigation finds evidence of wrongdoing, those involved will be punished. "I am troubled by the initial news stories," Bush said after a meeting with Rwandan President Paul Kagame. "I am mindful there is a thorough investigation going on. If in fact laws were broken, there will be punishment."

The Bargewell investigation is likely to be explosive on Capitol Hill, because it focuses on questions that have haunted the Bush administration and the U.S. military since the scandal over abuse at Abu Ghraib prison emerged two years ago: How do U.S. military leaders in Iraq react to allegations of wrongdoing by their troops? And is the military prepared to carry out the long and arduous process of putting down an insurgency as part of the first U.S. occupation of an Arab nation?

One of Bargewell's conclusions is that the training of troops for Iraq has been flawed, the official said, with too much emphasis on traditional war-fighting skills and insufficient focus on how to wage a counterinsurgency campaign. Currently the director of operations for a top headquarters in Iraq, Bargewell is a career Special Operations officer and therefore more familiar than most regular Army officers with the precepts of counterinsurgency, such as using the minimum amount of force necessary to succeed. Also, as an Army staff sergeant in Vietnam in 1971, Bargewell received the Distinguished Service Cross, the Army's second-highest honor, for actions in combat while a member of long-range reconnaissance team operating deep behind enemy lines.

In anticipation of the Bargewell report, the Marine Corps has placed on hold its plan to nominate Maj. Gen. Stephen T. Johnson, who was the top Marine in Iraq when the Haditha incident occurred, for promotion to lieutenant general, a senior Pentagon official said. That decision reflects concern that the report may conclude that leadership failures occurred at senior levels in Iraq. It also stands in sharp contrast to the Army's handling of the Abu Ghraib scandal, when the Pentagon forged ahead with plans to nominate Army Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, who had been the top commander on the ground in Iraq, for a fourth star. Sanchez's promotion has been in limbo for more than a year.

"I don't think the decision's been made" to scuttle the nomination, a Marine officer said. "I think we're going to wait and see."

In another reflection of top-level concern, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, the Marine commandant, has been traveling around Iraq this week and has visited nearly every Marine post in the country, an officer in Iraq said. Also, the Marine Corps issued a directive to its generals telling them not to discuss details of the Haditha case because such comments could compromise "the integrity of the investigative and legal processes" and because "it is not in the interests of the Marine Corps to 'further this story' by providing details or confirming information gathered from other -- mostly unnamed -- sources."

One of Bargewell's findings is that two failures occurred in reporting the Haditha incident up the Marine chain of command. The first is that Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, a squad leader alleged to have been centrally involved in the shootings, made a false statement to his superiors when he reported that 15 Iraqi civilians had been killed in the roadside bombing that killed a Marine and touched off the incident. (The other nine dead initially were reported by the Marines to have been insurgent fighters but are now believed to have been civilians.) That report was entered into an official database of "significant acts" maintained by the U.S. military in Iraq, the Pentagon official said.

A civilian attorney for Wuterich said he only recently had been retained by the Marine and has yet to interview his client, so could not comment on the case.

A second and more troubling failure occurred later in the day, this official said, when a Marine human exploitation team, which helped collect the dead, should have observed that the Iraqis were killed by gunshot, not by a bomb. The team's reporting chain lay outside that of the other Marines -- who were members of the 3rd Battalion of the 1st Marines -- and went up through military intelligence channels directly to the 1st Marine Division's intelligence director, he said. Had this second unit reported accurately what it witnessed, he indicated, that would have set off alarms and prodded commanders to investigate, he explained.

Bargewell's report also is expected to address why the Marine Corps let stand statements issued by official spokesmen that were known to be false at least two months ago. On Nov. 20, the day after the shootings, Marine Capt. Jeffrey S. Pool told reporters that the Iraqis died in a crossfire, stating that, "Iraqi army soldiers and Marines returned fire, killing eight insurgents." Time magazine, which first began making inquiries about the incident in January, reported that when one of its staff members asked Pool about the allegations, he accused the journalist of being duped by terrorists. "I cannot believe you're buying any of this," the magazine said the officer wrote in an e-mail. "This falls into the same category of any aqi [al-Qaeda in Iraq] propaganda." Another military representative, Lt. Col. Michelle Martin-Hing, told the magazine that insurgents caused the civilian deaths by placing the Iraqis in the line of Marine fire.

In March the magazine broke the news that Marines had killed Iraqi civilians at Haditha.

The Bargewell investigation evolved from a preliminary inquiry conducted in January by Army Col. Gregory Watt, the New York Times reported yesterday. Watt was asked by senior commanders to look into why there had been no formal Marine Corps review of the Haditha incident. After reviewing death certificates that showed the 24 Iraqis had been killed by gunshot rather than a bomb, as the Marine report had stated, Watt recommended a broader inquiry.

When the Marine leadership in Washington reviewed his report, a senior Marine said yesterday, it asked that an Army general step in to conduct the investigation, another indication that the actions of Johnson and other top officers have been a subject of Bargewell's review.

Bargewell did not respond to e-mails seeking comment.

Bush Seeks Truth In Iraq Probe (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

President Bush yesterday said if an investigation into charges that U.S. Marines killed unarmed civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha turns up evidence of wrongdoing, those involved will punished.

"I am troubled by the initial news stories. I am mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on. If, in fact, the laws were broken, there will be punishment," the president said in his first public comments about the accusations.

A preliminary military inquiry found evidence that Marines killed two dozen Iraqi civilians in an unprovoked attack in November, contradicting the troops' account.

In addition, forensic evidence from those killed showed the victims had bullet wounds, despite the initial statements by Marines that the civilians were killed by a roadside bomb that also took the life of a soldier, a defense official said.

"The forensics painted a different story than what the Marines had said," the official told the Associated Press.

"I know this: I've talked to Gen. Pete Pace about the subject, who is a proud Marine, and nobody is more concerned about these allegations than the Marine Corps," Mr. Bush said. "The Marine Corps is full of men and women who are honorable people who understand rules of war."

The killings in Haditha, 125 miles northwest of Baghdad in an area that has seen terrorist activity by Sunni insurgents, came after an improvised explosive device blew up a military convoy Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, who has advocated withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Iraq, charged that Marines killed unarmed civilians in a taxi at the scene and went into two homes and shot others.

Two investigations continue in the matter: A criminal probe that might result in murder charges against Marines; and another investigation into whether Marines tried to cover up the true nature of the incident, officials said.

When the military investigation is complete, which is expected this month, a senior Marine commander in Iraq will decide whether to press charges of murder or other violations of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday there is no firm date for release of the investigative report.

The new Iraqi ambassador to the United States, Samir al-Sumaidaie, who was received by Mr. Bush at the White House Tuesday, said there appeared to have been other killings of civilians by Marines in Haditha, where some of his family lives.

The ambassador told CNN that Marines fatally shot his cousin during a house-to-house search several months before the November incident.

"I believe he was killed intentionally," said Mr. al-Sumaidaie, adding that three other unarmed youths were fatally shot by Marines in a later incident in the area.

Can The Military Effectively Investigate Itself? (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - For the second time since the war in Iraq began, the United States is awaiting a military investigation into sensational allegations of its troops' misconduct.

DOJ_NMG_0030935

Two years ago it was Abu Ghraib. American alarm at the pictures of depravity was accompanied by questions about whether the military would be able to honestly investigate itself. Now, as the military looks into allegations that marines murdered as many as two dozen innocent civilians in Haditha last year, its justice system is again under the public microscope.

For Americans weaned on the openness of the O.J. Simpson trial, military justice can seem remote and impenetrable. For their part, experts dismiss the notion that the military system is any more corrupt or ineffective than its civilian counterpart.

But they acknowledge that it faces its own unique challenges - from the culture of silence that can pervade the most tight-knit military units to the lack of any department "district attorney" to follow up on leads. The concerns are longstanding, but with citizens getting a fuller picture of the mechanics of warfare - both on the battlefield and off - there is pressure to ensure that Americans have confidence in their military's means of justice.

"The system is a very good one once it is up and running," says William Banks, director of the Institute for National Security and Counterterrorism at Syracuse University College of Law in New York. "It is getting things launched that is the issue."

In the Haditha case, it has been a primary issue. Though the military is currently conducting two investigations into the incident, both followed independent investigations by an Iraqi journalism student and Time magazine. Conflicting accounts

Initially, the marines insisted that 15 civilians and eight insurgents had been killed by a bomb blast and subsequent firefight. But video footage of the bodies taken by the journalism student showed that the Iraqis had been killed by shots to the head and chest - wounds inconsistent with a bomb blast or crossfire. A Time investigation suggested that the civilians - including women and children - might have been killed as a reprisal for the original bomb attack, which killed a marine.

It was only after these accounts that the military took public action, fostering a perception of a military loath to police itself. But experts draw a different conclusion.

"Once [allegations are] revealed, American citizens should have absolute confidence in the military-justice system to investigate and prosecute," says Walter Huffman, judge advocate general of the Army from 1997 to 2001. "But there is a camaraderie among small military units that conceivably can lead to atrocities being committed by that unit and never revealed."

"Do we know every one of the incidents that ever occurred?" he asks. "Probably not, and we don't know what we don't know."

He says this not to suggest that the Haditha allegations point to rampant lawlessness. To the contrary, he and others believe that instances of murder are rare. But just as American police forces have their so-called "wall of silence," military units can be insular and fiercely loyal.

Moreover, with America engaged in a war that has no fixed battle lines, civilians are at greater risk. "To go and kill civilians is damnably unusual," says William Eckhardt, a prosecutor in the My Lai case, where a soldier was convicted of murdering civilians during the Vietnam War. "But this is in a changing environment.... You can almost expect this to happen periodically."

As of yet, they are rare enough that the only obvious parallel to the current allegations in the history of military law is My Lai itself. There, Mr. Eckhardt says the military-justice system proved its worth - pressing forward against the wishes of Congress, the president, and some elements of the military. In others, however, experts see the pressures of the day impacting the proceedings. Prosecuting soldiers

After the Korean War, an American soldier freed from a Korean prisoner of war camp was prosecuted for being a communist sympathizer. "During the cold war, we didn't want soldiers to look like communists," says Elizabeth Hillman, a military-justice expert at Rutgers School of Law in Camden, N.J. "Today, we don't want our soldiers to look like terrorists."

The danger, she says, is in proceedings that become less about justice and more about the broader culture wars: "It's very hard for a justice system - civilian or military - to work when it is under so much pressure."

Though neither military investigation has been released yet, there are indications that they will take a hard line. Two weeks ago, Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, a critic of the war in Iraq, said one report would claim that marines had killed the civilians "in cold blood." Since then, several media reports have indicated that the probe will include at least one murder charge.

To some, the whole process has been an example of the system working correctly. Though the media accounts provided a catalyst for the investigations, "these things are helpful," says former judge advocate general Mr. Huffman. "We can't be everywhere."

"The onus is on the military to act quickly" once the allegations surface, he says.

Others, however, see the need for reform. There is no position in the Department of Defense akin to an attorney general - someone whose job it is solely to follow up on credible allegations. Under the current system, investigations are convened by local commanders, who have many other duties - and perhaps conflicts of interest.

Says Eugene Fidell, president of the National Institute for Military Justice: "The bar has been raised for the public's expectation of transparency."

Haditha Recounts A Deadly Day (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0030936

By Megan K. Stack And Raheem Salman

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The killing began shortly after sunrise on a November day in Haditha. As a U.S. patrol rolled through the sleepy riverside city, a homemade bomb exploded beneath the belly of a Humvee, rocking the town.

"The Americans who were in the first vehicle came back to the damaged car. They started to scream and shout," said a graying shopkeeper who would only give his name as Abu Mukarram. He said he watched the scene unfold from his bedroom window. "After some minutes, everything was quiet. During this quiet, no bullets were shot. They were moments of expectation."

Ten minutes passed in silence. Then Abu Mukarram heard the crack of the first bullets.

Planted by insurgents at the edge of the road, the bomb had killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas, a 20-year-old Marine from El Paso, Texas. According to survivors and witnesses, Terrazas' death drove some of the soldiers into a murderous rage.

Survivors say that furious Marines rampaged through a quiet street, bursting into homes and gunning down Iraqi civilians -- including children, women and an old man in a wheelchair. Their account appears to match details emerging from a military investigation into the deaths of 24 Iraqi civilians on the morning of Nov 19.

In the United States, the killings are joining the Abu Ghraib torture case as an emblem of how American soldiers in Iraq can come unhinged amid mistrust, fear and bloody violence. President Bush said Wednesday he was "troubled" by news reports of the killings.

"I am mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on. If, in fact, the laws were broken, there will be punishment," Bush said in his first public comments on the incident, remarks during a photo session with President Paul Kagame of Rwanda.

In Iraq, by contrast, word of the deaths has spread slowly out of Haditha these last months, blurring into the steady background noise of daily horrors. To a public that's endured more than three years of combat, rampant bombings and executions, news of two dozen more lost lives grabbed few headlines.

Sliced in half by the waters of the Tigris and nestled in fruit groves, Haditha is a quiet farming community of 90,000 people in the midst of barren western desert. Farmers tend date orchards, and raise oranges and apples in the shadow of the palms.

This account of the Nov. 19 killings comes from witness and survivor interviews conducted by Iraqi reporters for the Los Angeles Times in Baghdad and Haditha. The Iraqi reporter who traveled to Haditha cannot be named for security reasons.

After the roadside bombing, the U.S. soldiers arrived first at the door of Abdul Hamid Hassan Ali, an 89-year-old retiree who had been using a wheelchair after his left leg was amputated. They shot him dead, then turned their guns on his three sons and their families, survivors said.

Waleed Abdul Hameed, a 48-year-old worker in Al Anbar religious affairs office, was among the first of the family members to be gunned down. His 9-year-old daughter, Eman, who survived, said she was still wearing her pajamas when the soldiers arrived. Her brother, Abdul Rahman, 7, also survived, and said he hid his face with a blanket when his father was shot.

A few minutes later, the boy saw his mother fall to the ground, dying.

"I saw her while she was crying," he said. "She fell down on the floor bleeding." Speaking days ago in Haditha, months after the attacks, the boy broke down crying, covered his eyes with his hands, and began to mutter to himself. At his side, his older sister began to speak again. She described how the two siblings waited for help, the bodies of their dead family members sprawled on the floor.

"We were scared," she said. "I tried to hide under the bed." With shrapnel injuries to her legs, she lay still for two hours. Around her, seven family members died in the shootout: Ali and his wife; their three sons and one daughter-in-law; and their 5-year-old grandson. Only one of the household's adults lived through that morning.

In the first moments of shooting, Hibba Abdullah snatched her 5-month-old niece off the floor. The baby's mother had dropped her in shock after seeing her husband gunned down. Clutching the child, Abdullah scampered out of the house. She and the baby girl, Asia, both survived.

The baby's mother "completely collapsed when they killed her husband in front of her," she said. "I ran away carrying Asia (the baby) outside the house, but when the Americans returned they killed Asma, the mother of the child." Abdullah's 39-year-old husband also slipped out of the house and ran to warn his nearby cousins about the killings. But he crossed paths with the American soldiers on his way back home; he died of gunshot wounds to the shoulder and head, his wife said.

The soldiers stopped next at the home of 45-year-old customs official Younis Salim Nusaif and his wife, Aida Yassin. The mother of six children, 42-year-old Yassin was lying in bed that morning, recovering from a recent operation. While she recuperated, her sister had come to stay with the family and help with the housework.

Everybody was at home when the gunmen arrived. And except for one 12-year-old daughter, the entire family was wiped out. Four girls and one boy, their ages ranging from 4 to 15, were shot dead by the Marines, neighbors and the surviving child said.

Safa Younis Salim, a schoolgirl, said she lay on the ground, covered with her sister's blood, and pretended to be dead while her family died around her. Her sister's blood spurted fast; it was like a water tap, she said.

During a meeting with a reporter, Salim was withdrawn and reluctant to talk about the attack. Only after her relatives coaxed her to speak did she describe how she played dead to stay alive that morning. The American soldiers yelled in the faces of her family members before they shot them, she said. After they were shot, they kicked them and hit the bodies with their guns.

"I feel sorry. I was wishing to be alive," said Salim. "Now I wish I had died with them."

The soldiers moved along the street. Next, they shotdead four brothers, whose ages ranged from 20 to 38 years old, their mother said. At that home, the soldiers herded the women outside, pointed guns at their heads and ordered them to stay still, according to the woman, who did not want her own name published.

The men were grouped inside. Then gunfire rang out.

"After some minutes the soldiers ran out and left the house," she said. The women went inside, and found the men dead.

"They were shot in different parts of their bodies," she said. "Spots of blood covered the place. Blood was coming out."

The last five men to die came upon the scene by chance. Four university students, two of them brothers, and their taxi driver drove too close to the spot where the families had been killed. Witnesses said U.S. soldiers stopped their car, ordered them to get out and shot them dead.

When the killing was over, the Americans continued to guard the street, keeping relatives away, townspeople said. Eventually, the soldiers took the bodies to the hospital, a medical source in Haditha said.

Since that November day, the people of Haditha have been haunted. The survivors described sinking into depression.

Much of the talk in town has centered on the U.S. offer of $2,500 in compensation for each death. Some of the families say they turned down the money. In March, the townspeople said, American investigators arrived. They brought cameras to record the witnesses, and toys for the surviving children.

U.S. Troops Kill 2 Women, And Iraqi Death Toll Grows (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, May 31 — The American military command said Wednesday that United States troops had fatally shot two Iraqi women whose vehicle failed to stop after entering a "prohibited area" near the restive city of Samarra, about 65 miles north of Baghdad. The Iraqi police said one of the women may have been pregnant and on her way to a hospital.

After the police in Samarra reported the deaths of the two women in the morning, the United States command in Baghdad issued a statement to The Associated Press. It said the vehicle carrying the women entered "a clearly marked prohibited area" near an American observation post outside Samarra, a major center for insurgent activity, and failed to stop despite "repeated visual and auditory warnings."

"Shots were fired to disable the vehicle," it said. "Coalition forces later received reports from Iraqi police that two women had died from gunshot wounds." It added, "One of the females may have been pregnant."

The women were among 54 new victims of the war reported by the Iraqi police and the American military command on Wednesday. They came on top of a toll in the previous 48 hours — at least 58 people reported killed across the country on Monday, and more than 40 on Tuesday, for a three-day total of more than 150 — that pointed to the relentless violence across Iraq that has followed the swearing-in of the new government 12 days ago.

American and Iraqi officials had hoped that the accession of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki at the head of the cabinet of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, five months after 12.1 million Iraqis went to the polls to elect the first full-term government since the toppling of Saddam Hussein, might be a watershed that would bring a cresting of the violence.

If anything, the opposite appears to have occurred, with the new government facing intensified challenges on a broad front. They have included a new surge in sectarian and insurgent violence in Baghdad, deadly feuds between rival Shiite militias in Basra and elsewhere in the south and a newly aggressive thrust by Sunni insurgents in the western province of Anbar, especially in the provincial capital of Ramadi.

Sunni insurgents in Ramadi have posed such serious challenges in recent weeks that the top American military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., has ordered the deployment to Anbar of additional troops from a 3,500-member brigade of the First Armored Division that had been held in reserve in Kuwait. At least some of those troops will reinforce Marine units at Ramadi, military spokesmen say.

Only six months ago, top United States commanders had said they hoped to begin the process of ordering staged troop reductions by mid-2006, with a target of reducing American troop levels to about 100,000 by the end of the year, down more than 30,000 from current levels. Some senior officers now say significant reductions may have to wait until mid-2007, at the earliest.

The violence reported Wednesday also included the discovery of 42 bodies dumped around Baghdad, most of them shot in the head and showing signs of torture. The police said many of the bodies were found blindfolded and handcuffed, in the pattern of hundreds of others who have died in recent months in a wave of strife between Sunni and Shiite groups.

In the latest in a series of killings of people involved with sports, Ali Jaafar, a sports broadcaster for the state-owned television channel, Al Iraqiya, was slain by machine-gun fire as he left his home for work. Last week, three members of the national tennis team were gunned down on a Baghdad street.

The mayor of Miqdadiyah, a mixed Sunni-Shiite city about 70 miles northeast of the capital, was killed when a bomb hidden in an air-conditioner exploded, causing the governor of Diyala Province to declare the city under curfew.

In Mosul, the northern oil center that is Iraq's second-largest city, at least five police officers were killed by a bomb left in a parked car that exploded as their patrol passed by.

There were two new deaths among American troops, one of them a soldier killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad on Tuesday night, another of a soldier who was said by the American command to have died Wednesday morning of a "non-combat-related cause."

In Baghdad, a former governor of Diwaniya Province in southern Iraq was assassinated by gunmen as he left a restaurant on Tuesday evening, and a Shiite muezzin, the prayer-caller at a neighborhood mosque, was killed as left his home in a southern district of the city on Wednesday.

A member of the local council in Adhamiya, a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in central Baghdad, said in a telephone interview that 18 Sunni men from the area had disappeared Monday after leaving in two vehicles to give blood at the capital's largest medical complex in response to a bomb attack outside a local Sunni mosque that killed 12 people and wounded at least 25.

The American command reported Wednesday what it described as a major breakthrough in its hunt for insurgent leaders, the arrest Monday in Baghdad of a man it described as a principal organizer of the March 2004 attacks on Shiite pilgrims visiting mosques in Baghdad and Karbala that killed more than 180 people.

The command's statement said the suspect, identified as Sheik Ahmed Hussein Dabash, was "a major financier and facilitator of terrorism in Iraq," and said he had been captured Monday in a raid by American and Iraqi forces in the Amiriya district of western Baghdad. "Coalition forces consider his capture significant as they believe he will provide critical information on other terrorist groups," it said.

At the trial of Saddam Hussein and seven others for their suspected role in the persecution of the townspeople of Dujail, north of Baghdad, after an assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein in 1982, days of angry confrontations with defense lawyers led the chief judge, Raouf Abdel-Rahman, to order four defense witnesses detained Wednesday.

Court officials said the four were being held under a law that provides for "investigative detention" while the judge looked into suspicions that the witnesses had been coached by defense lawyers and had given false testimony intended to exonerate Mr. Hussein and his associates.

Monthlong State Of Emergency Declared In Basra (WT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

BASRA, Iraq -- Iraq's prime minister declared a state of emergency yesterday in once peaceful and oil-rich Basra, as the sectarian and militia violence engulfing the country's capital spread to its southern economic heartland.

In his first major policy speech since his government was sworn in May 20, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki vowed to restore security in Iraq as attacks across the country took more than 20 lives and wounded dozens.

"We shall use an iron fist against the leaders of the gangs or those who threaten security," he said, apparently referring to the militias as well as rival tribal groups. "And we shall ask all security departments to draw up an effective and quick plan to achieve security."

Meanwhile, with investigations pending into charges that U.S. Marines killed unarmed civilians, then covered up the incident, President Bush yesterday said that if the probe turns up evidence of wrongdoing, those involved will be punished.

"I am troubled by the initial news stories. I am mindful that there is a thorough investigation going on. If, in fact, the laws were broken, there will be punishment," the president said in his first public comments about the accusations.

In an unrelated incident the fatal shooting Tuesday of a pregnant Iraqi, apparently by U.S. troops, as she was rushing to a hospital, threw an additional spotlight on the issue of Iraqi civilian deaths.

Iraqi police and witnesses said the troops gunned down the woman and her cousin in their car. The U.S. military said the car entered a clearly marked prohibited area but failed to stop despite repeated signals; shots were fired to disable the vehicle, the military said.

Nabiha Nisaif Jassim, a 35-year-old who was pregnant, and her cousin Saliha Mohammed Hassan, 57, became the latest victims of what many Iraqis think is the American troops' disregard for life.

Mr. Al-Maliki promised to crack down on sectarian gangs in Basra and declared a monthlong state of emergency, which broadens arrest powers for Iraqi security services and establishes an evening curfew.

It was the only state of emergency in effect across Iraq, officials said. Other cities where violence is rampant, such as Baghdad and Ramadi, only have curfews.

"The state of emergency imposed in Basra for one month is made up of a group of exceptional measures imposed for a specific time by the prime minister for dealing with some events," Interior Ministry Undersecretary Maj. Gen. Ahmed Al-Khafaji said from Basra.

Mr. Al-Maliki, who traveled with his Sunni Arab vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, addressed about 700 tribal sheiks, religious leaders, officials, army officers and other residents in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad.

Tensions have been worsening in the Shi'ite-dominated area, where Britain has about 8,000 soldiers, and mostly Shi'ite militias have been attacking Sunni Arabs and battling each other.

Iran's hand also is rumored to be behind Shi'ite militias in Basra, although little evidence of a direct link has been made public.

Iraq's Premier Seeks To Control A City In Chaos (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

BASRA, Iraq, May 31 — Iraq's new prime minister made an urgent visit to this increasingly lawless city on Wednesday, imposing a state of emergency and ordering leaders to cease their violent struggle for power and allow order to return to this oil-rich region.

Once seemingly immune to the violence that has plagued the rest of the country, Basra Province, the heart of Iraq's Shiite south, has sunk into chaos. Shiite political parties and their militias are fighting to control the provincial government and the region's oil wealth, contributing to some of the worst rates of killing since the invasion, with 174 killings in the past two months — double the amount from the previous two months, according to the Basra police.

Trying to stamp his authority on the region, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki arrived here in an American helicopter with Iraq's Sunni Arab vice president and three other senior Iraqi officials, and he berated local leaders for the chaos. He ordered the Iraqi Army to take over Basra's streets — a demand that apparently came as a surprise to the British Army, which patrols the region, and that could prove difficult, as units would have to be brought from outside the city.

"I declare strongly and frankly that we will strike with an iron fist on all gangs that are manipulating security," Mr. Maliki said, addressing an auditorium crowded with political and tribal leaders and other Basra locals. "Security comes first, second and third."

It is the first serious test of Mr. Maliki's authority since he became prime minister last month and pledged to deal decisively with political militias and criminal gangs whose growing power is now threatening the existence of the Iraqi state.

The surge in violence has posed new difficulties for the British military, which has adopted more strenuous policing measures to contain it. In two operations on Sunday, the British detained a total of 10 people and reported a large find of bomb materials.

"In our view, we need to do more, and that's what we're doing," Brig. James Everard, the commander of forces in Iraq's four southeastern provinces, said in an interview.

In May, nine British soldiers were killed, the second-deadliest month for the British since the invasion, exceeded only in January 2005 when the crash of a British military plane killed 10 soldiers.

Mr. Maliki spoke directly to the increased violence, using blunt language and a firm and measured tone.

"What are these assassinations?" he asked. "What is this killing? What are the gangs that kill and kidnap? What is going on in this city, which sacrificed so much through history?"

To a large degree, the violence has resulted from a power grab by Shiite factions left practically on their own to run the region and impose their own version of democracy while American and Iraqi officials in Baghdad have fought insurgents elsewhere.

"Freedom of speech, freedom of expression: it just hasn't quite worked out the way it was planned," Brigadier Everard said. "They're not prepared to debate. They tend to do things at the end of a gun."

In a city that welcomed the American invasion, threats against Iraqis working for the American Embassy are now so widespread that they have not picked up its trash or pumped its sewers for three weeks.

One large prize is control of Basra's oil exports. The city is near the country's only seaport, and nearly all of Iraq's current exports flow through it. Political parties accuse one another of skimming from the flow and trying to control it.

"As long as we have parties, it's impossible to ensure security," said one of Basra's senior security officials. "If you print this," the official added nervously, explaining why he wanted his name withheld, "I'll be killed."

One of the ways the parties have wielded influence is through control of portions of this city's 15,000-man police force, which is about double it's the authorized size. Rival parties and gangs fight one another through their own police units. The police chief, Maj. Gen. Hassan Swadi al-Saad, has said he trusts only a small fraction of his forces.

Mr. Maliki used the trip, his first as prime minister, as a warning to local leaders who have used the months that Baghdad was busy assembling a government to build their own fiefs and profit from their positions. He specifically referred to the impotence of the police force, and directly rebuked political leaders for manipulating it.

"What worries us and hurts the heart of Iraq is that these apparatuses are practically helpless," he said. "It is impermissible to have a scared or disturbed military or police officer because of political interferences."

A plain model of Toyota, known by the people of Basra as Batta, Arabic for duck, has been used in so many assassinations that it has become synonymous with killing.

"Why can't we control this Batta?" said Wathib al-Amood, a member of the provincial council. "We are walking in the dark on a spiked floor."

At the heart of the struggle in Basra are political parties and a web of allegiances that is baffling to outsiders. The governor, Muhammad al-Waeli, belongs to the Fadhila Party, a religious Shiite party, which controls the most seats in the provincial council. A bloc led by the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri, detests Mr. Waeli and wants to remove him, but has failed to garner the two-thirds majority needed to do so.

The struggle has raised questions about the balance of power between Baghdad and the provinces. A law drawn up under the former American administrator, L. Paul Bremer III, and that is still in effect gives the provinces full control over their police forces and their local governments, virtually cutting Baghdad out of the process — a fact that Mr. Waeli's supporters are quick to point out.

Aqil Taleb, a council member from the Fadhila Party, said that because of the law, removing Mr. Waeli would be difficult. "They can't get the votes they need," he said, adding, "Even Maliki can't change the governor without them."

The meeting with Mr. Maliki on Wednesday was attended by about 400 Basra citizens, including the governor, who arrived late, and the police chief, whom he has tried to fire.

The officials from Baghdad included Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni Arab; Khalid al-Atiya, the deputy speaker of Parliament; Bahaa al-Aaraji, a Parliament member close to the anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose influence and militia in Basra are strong; and Safa al-Safi, the minister of state for Parliament affairs.

Mr. Maliki's political acumen was tested immediately. An hour after the meeting began, the discussion descended into a shouting match, with tribal sheiks hurling insults at the chairman of the provincial council, Muhammed Sadoon al-Abadi.

Mr. Abadi, of Fadhila, said local leaders had done the best they could with few resources and blamed the news media for painting too ghoulish a security picture. "Don't put all the blame or all the mistakes or all the collapse on the local government here," he said.

Shortly after that, tribal sheiks began to shout from a few rows back.

"Liar!" one yelled. "None of this is true. You are a liar."

When organizers proposed that participants break for lunch, there was more shouting. "We don't want to eat, we want to talk!" someone said. "All the tribes are here and if we don't have a solution we will make a revolution."

Then, Mr. Maliki, dressed in a dark suit and tie, silenced them.

"My brothers, peace," he said, and led them in a quick prayer.

"The loudest voice is not usually the winner," he added.

While Mr. Maliki focused on security, Mr. Hashemi, the Sunni Arab vice president, took leaders to task on the oil industry and sectarian cleansing.

"I hoped to receive news from Basra that the Southern Oil Company exceeded its planned output," he said in a speech to the gathering. "I hoped that Basra ports would have attracted ships from the gulf."

"But unfortunately we have come to deal with a serious problem that has exhausted the poor people of Basra."

Iraq's Prime Minister Orders Army To Take Control Of Basra (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

Knight Ridder, May 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030941

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Wednesday ordered thousands of Iraqi troops to Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, to disarm the Shiite Muslim militias that have taken control there, a move that underscores how little of the country the central government in Baghdad has secured.

Al-Maliki said Iraq's 10th Army Division would set up checkpoints and round up illegal weapons from the assortment of militias, gangs and tribes that had seized control in Basra. He said the state of emergency would last a month.

His declaration, issued in a nationally televised speech from Basra, came the same week that U.S. officials announced that they'd send another 1,500 troops from Kuwait to Anbar province in western Iraq in a renewed effort to wrest much of the province from the control of Sunni Muslim insurgents.

"This month is the month of security in Basra," al-Maliki said in his address, flanked by a high-ranking government delegation. "We will beat with an iron fist on the heads of gangs who are manipulating security."

Iraq's violence has intensified in recent weeks, despite the country's swelling security forces. A new Pentagon report released this week said 263,400 security force members had been trained so far.

But that's done little to cut violence or hasten the withdrawal of U.S. troops, whose number will grow to more than 135,000 with the arrival of the reinforcements from Kuwait. The report noted that the average number of weekly enemy attacks rose 13 percent from February to April, compared with the previous few months.

The Pentagon report, titled "Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq," called Iraq's enemy elements resilient and complex and suggested little likelihood that they'll be quelled soon. The report noted that the enemy includes the Sunni insurgency and Shiite militias.

"To categorize the violence in Iraq as a single insurgency or a unified `opposition' is both inaccurate and misleading," the report said. "It is unlikely that the Coaltion and Iraq Security Forces will make progress against each of these violent factions at the same pace."

Al-Maliki's announcement was official recognition that violence in the Shiite south is far worse than previously acknowledged. At least 200 people have died in shootouts, kidnappings and executions in Basra in the last month, and British and local Iraqi officials told Knight Ridder recently that militias had largely taken control of police forces and other government institutions.

On Tuesday, the chairman of Basra's provincial council, Nussaif Jassim al-Abaidi, said the mostly Shiite police forces themselves were undisciplined and corrupt.

Many officers "are more loyal to their parties than their jobs," al-Abaidi said.

Whether sending in the army will help is unclear. The same Shiite militias that are competing for influence in Basra have infiltrated the security forces.

Basra's most active militias, the Mahdi Army, loyal to fiery cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, and the Badr Organization, the armed wing of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, are closely allied with key members of the political coalition that put al-maliki in office.

Al-Maliki didn't mention what steps would be taken to reduce Iranian assistance to the militias. While it's not clear how involved Iran's government is in aiding the groups, British and Iraqi officials in the south told Knight Ridder that money and weapons were reaching the militias from Iran and some militia members were training in Iran.

British officials said they thought that the Iranian assistance was an attempt to drive coalition forces from the area and pave the way for Iran-friendly clerical rule in southern Iraq.

Iran has close ties to many in al-Maliki's Shiite-dominated government. Al-Maliki lived in Iran for several years after he went into exile in 1980 during the rule of Saddam Hussein. He also lived in Syria and Lebanon.

While some Sunni politicians expressed skepticism that al-Maliki is politically able to challenge the militias, initial Sunni response was muted.

Tareq al-Hashemi, a Sunni and one of Iraq's two vice presidents, said al-Maliki's initiative didn't go far enough, and that more action was needed.

"There is a host of reforms that should go side by side," al-Hashemi said. "If we all - the governor, the governorate's council, political forces, tribes and religious figures - cooperate together, we will find, within a month's time, that things are much better."

During Saddam's reign, Basra was one of Iraq's most dynamic cities, known for its nightlife and bustling economy. After the U.S.-led invasion, when much of the country fell to violence, Basra was considered relatively stable, and U.S. officials often suggested that it would be one of the first areas to return to Iraqi control.

But militias were seeping into the populace, driving out minority Sunnis and calling for a more conservative province. The change became most notable when attacks on British forces spiked. In the last month, nine British service members have been killed, including five in a helicopter crash. British officials told Knight Ridder they suspect that an Iranian-supplied missile shot down the chopper.

Al-Maliki announced his plan as leaders were still debating who will lead the Defense and Interior ministries, which oversee the army and police, respectively.

He said a special committee would be appointed to oversee the Basra operation.

Time Is Short For Iraq To Stabilize, U.S. Envoy Warns (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

Iraq's new government has three to six months to bring more stability to the country, or it could collapse, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq said Wednesday.

"Unless there is increased security … a lessening of and containing of sectarian violence, this government will face huge challenges that might pose a problem for the viability and success of the political process," Zalmay Khalilzad said from Baghdad.

Khalilzad said the new, U.S.-backed government led by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki understands the challenge presented by increased fighting among Iraq's factions and militias.

The ambassador spoke in a telephone interview shortly after al-Maliki declared a state of emergency in the southern city of Basra, where Shiite militias and tribal gangs have been battling in the streets.

"The next three to six months will be critical in terms of this government's image and impact on the Iraqi people," he said.

Under a compromise reached last year to try to win Sunni Arab support for Iraq's new constitution, the government now has four months to consider changes to the constitution and two more months to hold a referendum on any amendments.

Khalilzad said that Iraq's long-term "strategic problem" is getting Sunnis to participate and remain in the government, and that its more immediate "tactical problems" involve controlling Shiite militias.

On other issues, the U.S. ambassador said:

·Al-Maliki will name Interior and Defense ministers in "the next three to four days." The government took office May 20, but disagreement over who to place in charge of the security ministries delayed those appointments. Sunnis, including the Muslim Scholars Association, had accused the previous Interior minister, Bayan Jabr, of allowing Shiite death squads to operate under cover of police and other forces.

·The United States remains ready to talk to Iranian diplomats about Iraq, but "the Iranians have been sending conflicting messages on that. In the morning, they say 'no.' In the afternoon, they say 'maybe.' "

Khalilzad said that the Iranians were providing money and training to militias and extremist groups in Iraq but that an investigation was not complete into whether Iran provided missiles used to shoot down a British helicopter in Basra on May 6.

·U.S. officials "have not seen any political or military" fallout from allegations that U.S. Marines intentionally killed civilians in the western Iraqi town of Haditha last November. An investigation into the allegations is not complete.

The military initially attributed 15 civilian deaths to a car bomb and firefight with insurgents in the town.

Tearing Iraq Apart (NYT)

By Thomas X. Hammes

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Oxford, England

THE White House is right to insist that our postwar goal is a unified Iraq, as opposed to one divided along ethno-religious lines. So why is the administration taking so many actions that make holding the country together virtually impossible?

In January, President Bush diverted nearly half the money allocated to reconstruction in Iraq to other needs, including security. Given that our current strategy is nicknamed "Clear-Hold-Build," where does that leave us? Clear-Hold-Hope? Mr. Bush's decision sent a terrible signal to the Iraqis about our resolve. It is even less understandable since the expense of the critical reconstruction program is a small fraction of our annual cost in Iraq.

Next, the administration deeply cut financing for democratization efforts, many of them undertaken by nongovernmental groups. The proposed budget for fiscal 2007 asks for a paltry $63 million. This token sum — in a war that costs some $200 million a day — may simply reflect a belief that the security situation prevents such efforts from being effective. But democratization has always been one of the administration's cherished goals, and cutting spending there sends the wrong message.

The latest administration budget also recommends cutting overall Army and Marine troop strength. If Mr. Bush and his advisers are really committed to sustained support for the "long war" in Iraq, how do they reconcile that with cutting the budgets for the most engaged forces?

President Bush and his aides have also repeatedly hinted at significant troop reductions in Iraq this year — perhaps to as low as 100,000 from the current 130,000. This is despite the growing violence in Baghdad and the fact that our military leaders in Iraq have consistently said that we can withdraw troops safely only if conditions improve. The administration may simply be talking fewer troops to reassure the electorate before midterms. Unfortunately, American voters are not the only audience. What do the Iraqis think?

The administration has long stated that the so-called Provincial Reconstruction Teams — groups of 100 or so political, economic, legal and civil-military relations specialists who help distribute aid and advise regional Iraqi officials, which have had success in Afghanistan — are critical to our strategy in Iraq. Yet The Washington Post reported in mid-April that only 4 of the proposed 16 teams had even been inaugurated.

In addition, the Army staffs and units in Iraq, even those training Iraqi security forces, continue to be undermanned. Meanwhile, former colleagues outside the war zone — in the Joint Forces Command, the European Command and the Pacific Command — tell me their commands remain at full strength. It seems the Pentagon does not consider the Iraq war important enough to shift from its peacetime manning models.

Last, the administration has repeatedly said efficient and law-abiding Iraqi security forces are central to our strategy, yet has failed to provide them with more than minimal equipment. Three years after the fall of Saddam Hussein, most Iraq troops are still using open-backed trucks and unarmored S.U.V.'s.

Let's face it: this laundry list of inaction on the part of the Bush administration leaves a prudent Iraqi with no practical choice but to prepare for a United States withdrawal long before the Iraqi central government and security forces are capable of running the nation. For most Iraqis — Arab or Kurd, Sunni or Shiite — this will mean looking to religious and ethnic militias, criminal gangs and Islamist insurgents for protection. This, in turn, greatly increases the chance of civil war.

The militias are already looking ahead: some are carving out safe areas they will use as bases in the coming war by driving Iraqis of other ethnic and religious groups out of mixed neighborhoods and villages. Iraqi government officials estimated that more than 100,000 families have already fled their homes. This falling back on militias and preparing for internecine conflict is not a new phenomenon. It is exactly what we saw in Afghanistan nearly two decades ago. Once the Afghans believed the Soviet troops were finally pulling out, the various insurgent groups stopped fighting the invaders and began positioning for a multisided civil war. That conflict, of course, lasted until the United States invaded Afghanistan in 2001.

The Bush administration, despite all its missteps since the fall of the Baathists, has clung to one correct idea: that an intact Iraq is a better outcome than a splintered one. To keep it unified, however, the White House must commit to long timelines and to providing the money necessary for both the military and reconstruction efforts. The alternative is for Mr. Bush to change his mind and tell the American and Iraqi people that we must start planning for a peaceful division.

In any case, the uncertainty resulting from trying to have it both ways will result in the worst possible outcome: open civil war.

Iraqi Students Are Tested By Battle Outside (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Saad Al-izzi

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 31 -- For many of the 12-year-olds bent over their final exams in classrooms where the stifling heat already edged toward 100 degrees by 9 a.m., Wednesday's tests would signal the end of their families' days in Iraq.

With the school year reaching its close, and life in Baghdad unbearable for many, some of the mothers at al-Mahaj school in north Baghdad's Adhamiyah neighborhood began collecting the school records that their sons and daughters would need in new homes in other countries. They would soon join a three-year exodus of the middle class from Iraq, where outbound flights are booked near-solid through June, travel agents say.

School guards with AK-47 assault rifles stood watch around al-Mahaj. Fathers chatted outside, their own pistols discreetly hidden under shirts or tucked away close by in their cars: Kidnapping is rampant in wartime Baghdad.

Sometime after 9 a.m., bullets started flying. The 12-year-olds, well into their math tests, "were terrified," screaming and sobbing, said Um Bakir, a mother who recounted the battle. The parent of a sixth-grader, she would identify herself over the telephone only by her family name, which means mother of Bakir. She refused to identify her son, citing fears for the family's safety.

The shooting sprawled over three neighborhoods -- one Sunni Arab, one mostly Sunni, one Shiite -- where busy streets form the otherwise unremarkable dividing lines. Insurgents, Shiite militias, Iraq's overwhelmingly Shiite police, the slightly more trusted army forces -- all were said to be in the fight. Residents could not be sure, or tell how it started. In the fights that roil many of Baghdad's neighborhoods, with automatic-weapons fire heavy and explosions sounding, no one without a gun sticks his neck out to investigate.

Motorists on one main street turned around and sped back out, flashing their headlights to signal oncoming drivers to do likewise. Iraqi forces blocked another street as a vehicle carrying Iraqi soldiers rushed through.

In the official account, provided by Col. Sami Hassan at the Interior Ministry's operations center, insurgents had attacked an army checkpoint. The insurgents then withdrew, seeking cover "inside residential structures," Hassan said. Soldiers chased them through the area, past shops and schools.

Hassan said three policemen and eight insurgents were killed in the fighting.

Rumors flew among residents. Noor Taha, a newlywed awakened on her first morning in her husband's home by explosions and gunfire in her new neighborhood, said she was told that the clashes began after militiamen loyal to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr held a funeral for three of their fighters.

Ahmed al-Omari, a worker at an Education Ministry office, heard heavy shooting near a Sunni mosque at an intersection bordering the three neighborhoods. He had been told that police were firing on insurgents inside the mosque. He stood in the courtyard of the education office trying to discreetly scope out the firing.

As he spoke on his cellphone to a friend, Omari suddenly interrupted himself. "A bullet just hit near my foot," he said, gunfire rattling clearly in the background.

"Get inside," his friend said.

"That's what I'm trying to do," Omari said, and ran.

Back at the school, the barrage caught some of the parents outside, away from their children.

"Bullets were falling on us like rain," Um Bakir said. Events went by in a blur, with parents and teachers rushing toward screaming children.

Iraqi soldiers and police burst in. "Get away from the windows!" they screamed at the children. "Get down!"

The soldiers and police made the children curl up on their sides on the floor, as if asleep, Um Bakir said. Some of the 12-year-olds already had fainted, she said.

As gunfire continued, the police and soldiers started rushing the children out of the school in groups.

Um Bakir hurried home with her boy and three other children, hustling them inside for safety.

Once home, she washed their faces, cleaning away the dirty tear marks. She made them something to eat. She called the other children's parents. "Your kids are okay," she told each. "But don't come yet. It's not safe."

To the south, Omari left work at noon, stepping over spent bullet cartridges as he walked to a main street for a taxi.

A bullet-riddled car sped by.

There were no bodies in sight. Shops were starting to reopen. For this part of Baghdad, street battles were nothing new.

Parents collected their children from Um Bakir's house. She sat through the heat of the afternoon, as generators that serve in lieu of city electricity in wartime Baghdad kicked on and off.

She said that for her, there would be no flight to safety overseas at the end of the school year. Her husband no longer had a job; they had no money to start a new life.

There was the summer to get through, and then the next school year. But first, there were the next three days.

"My son has at least three more exams," Um Bakir said.

"We are going to go tomorrow, and see how things turn out," she said. "We are terrified."

U.S., In Reversal, Says Troops Fired At Crowd In Kabul (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, May 31 -- U.S. military officials acknowledged Wednesday that American troops had fired at an angry mob that surrounded the scene of a traffic accident in the Afghan capital Monday morning. Officials previously had said the troops fired only into the air.

In the fatal accident, the driver of a U.S. military cargo truck lost control and struck 12 vehicles in rush-hour traffic, killing one person and injuring six, the military said. The incident sparked violent, day-long riots that ended with 20 dead, 160 injured and dozens of buildings badly damaged.

The incident has exposed deep public resentment against the presence of foreign troops here and shaken investor confidence in the fledgling postwar economy at a time when Afghanistan faces a mounting threat from armed Taliban fighters and other insurgents in the countryside.

"Initial indications from our investigation are that coalition soldiers did in fact use their weapons in self-defense," Col. Thomas Collins, a U.S. military spokesman, said at a news conference here. He said it appeared that gunfire had come from the crowd and that the troops had "used their weapons to defend themselves."

Collins said he had no further details but that an investigation was underway.

Several people taken to hospitals in Kabul on Monday were suffering from gunshot wounds, but it was not clear who had shot them. During the day, rioters clashed repeatedly with Afghan police and burned down their checkpoints. Some rioters were armed with AK-47 assault rifles, witnesses said.

Collins repeatedly expressed regret for the accident and the deaths. But he also said the truck driver had done everything possible to avoid hitting pedestrians and occupied vehicles after his brakes failed on a steep hill leading down to a busy intersection.

After the accident, he said, U.S. troops in the convoy began to aid injured civilians but were quickly surrounded by an angry crowd of 300 to 500 men who started to throw stones at them. He said that city police soon arrived and formed a barricade around the halted convoy, but that the crowd became increasingly hostile. The U.S. troops decided to leave, firing some shots in the process, he said.

Collins said no U.S. soldier had been injured, but he added, "That doesn't mean they were not in serious, immediate danger of injury or death." He said victims of the accident and their families would be compensated.

News videos of the scene showed a large group of men shouting and throwing stones, then ducking and running as Humvees and other military vehicles sped past, amid sounds of gunfire.

As word of the accident and possible civilian shootings spread through the city, enraged mobs swarmed into downtown Kabul, attacking banks, hotels and foreign aid offices and burning dozens of cars. Many shouted anti-American slogans. It was the worst violence in the Afghan capital since the overthrow of the Taliban in 2001.

A curfew was announced Monday night and calm had returned to the city Tuesday, but Afghan army troops have been heavily patrolling the area since. Many Afghans have condemned the street violence, but they have also blamed U.S. troops for causing the accident and expressed broader anger at their aggressive driving and treatment of civilians.

Collins said that he was aware of such criticisms and that coalition officials "take that feedback very, very seriously." He said the U.S.-led forces were here "at the request of the Afghan people and we must always act responsibly." Afghans "have a right to know" exactly what happened Monday, he said, "and we want to know, too."

Americans Fired Into Crowd, Afghan Says (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, May 31 — American soldiers involved in a vehicle crash here on Monday that set off rioting then fired into the crowd of protesters and killed four people, according to the chief of the highway police in Kabul, Gen. Amanullah Gozar, who saw the accident.

Three people died in the crash caused by a runaway United States Army truck, and four people died of gunfire from the last vehicle in the convoy as the American forces extricated themselves from an increasingly hostile crowd, General Gozar said in an interview on Wednesday.

He dismissed rumors that had spread through the city that the American soldiers deliberately rammed vehicles, even including his own car. "I can say clearly it was an accident," he said.

The United States military initially said in a statement that the truck had a mechanical failure and called the incident "a tragic accident." It said there were "indications" that "warning shots over the crowd" had been fired from at least one military vehicle. General Gozar's account is the first declaration from a senior Afghan official that American soldiers directed lethal fire on the crowd.

An American military spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, said he had not heard that the last vehicle had fired into the crowd or that four people had been killed by Americans. "Our soldiers believed fire was coming from the crowd, and they fired their weapons in self-defense," he said.

He said soldiers in one vehicle had fired their weapons over the heads of the crowd, adding that a thorough investigation was under way and that all the soldiers would make statements to the investigators. "We are examining all information; it will all be part of the investigation," he said.

The deaths of civilians, in the initial car crash and in the protests that followed, prompted the worst anti-American riots in Kabul since the fall of the Taliban four years ago. Protesters fought the police and ransacked the offices of foreign organizations across the city. Twelve people were killed, including one policeman, and 138 were wounded as the police and Afghan Army soldiers struggled to contain the violence, police officials said.

General Gozar, who is a powerful commander of the Northern Alliance, which fought the Taliban, dismissed suggestions that politics, or factions opposed to President Hamid Karzai, had driven the protests, and blamed the violence on criminal elements who took advantage of the situation. He also criticized the Kabul police for not being prepared to contain the violence and said the president had asked him at midafternoon on Monday to move to the center of the city with his highway police officers to help put down the riots.

Colonel Collins said the soldiers stayed at the crash scene for 45 minutes until a relief vehicle arrived to tow the broken truck away, and reported that one civilian man had been killed in the car crash and six had been injured, two of them seriously. The soldiers provided first aid to the injured until ambulances arrived to take them away, he said.

General Gozar, whose house overlooks the main road into Kabul from the north, said he heard a truck horn on Monday morning and looked out his window to see the driver of a heavy military truck waving frantically to people to get out of the way. The truck hit a station wagon, then two military vehicles in the convoy, and then was swallowed by a dust cloud at the foot of the hill, he said.

When he arrived at the crash scene a few minutes later, the American soldiers had stopped their convoy and were treating the civilians injured in the other cars, while others stood guard, he said. A crowd of shopkeepers and pushcart operators gathered and began pelting the soldiers with stones. The police could not contain the crowd, and finally the American soldiers escaped, he said.

"The first American vehicles were firing in the air, but the last one fired at the people," he said. As the American soldiers escaped, leaving four people dead, the crowd turned on the Afghan police, burning one of their cars and stabbing a policeman, he said. The riot quickly spread. "People were really angry," he said.

General Gozar briefed President Karzai on the episode, and said he told the president that while it was clearly an accident, the behavior of the Americans had contributed to the people's anger. Arrogant driving — driving fast or not allowing cars to overtake their convoy — irritated people, he said. People were also angered when the soldiers prevented them from approaching the crashed cars to help the injured, he said.

In more violence in southern Afghanistan, Taliban insurgents overran and burned down the administration and police offices of a district in Oruzgan Province on Tuesday night, in one of the most blatant challenges to the government and foreign forces stationed in the province.

About 40 police and administration officials fled the district center to another location under siege by Taliban militants, said Ruzi Khan, the former police chief of the province. A Taliban spokesman, Qari Muhammad Yousuf, confirmed that the attack had occurred.

In a separate insurgent attack, the deputy police chief of neighboring Zabul Province was killed Wednesday in an ambush.

U.S. Troops May Have Fired At Kabul Crowd (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — The U.S. military is investigating the possibility that soldiers fired into a crowd of Afghans at the scene of a fatal traffic accident that sparked a day of rioting here this week.

"There are indications, as part of our initial investigation, that coalition soldiers did in fact use their weapons in self-defense," Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for U.S. forces here, said Wednesday at a news conference.

In a statement released Monday, Collins had said there were "indications that at least one coalition military vehicle fired warning shots over the crowd." On Wednesday, he said that the initial assessment had been based on news footage, and added that the investigation was continuing.

The U.S. military reported that one person was killed in the road accident, whereas President Hamid Karzai's office said five people died. Afghan health authorities have informed the U.S. military that about 20 people died and more than 160 were injured in the accident and the unrest that followed, Collins said.

No U.S. soldiers were injured.

"Just because coalition soldiers weren't hurt or injured doesn't mean that there wasn't an imminent danger of serious bodily injury or death to them," Collins said. "Our people are very well trained. They know how to react to situations."

About half an hour after a heavy U.S. military cargo truck rammed into Afghan vehicles at an intersection Monday morning, a crowd of 300 to 500 angry people began throwing rocks and firing small arms at U.S. soldiers and Afghan police officers, Collins said.

Witnesses say the crowd was trying to prevent the troops from leaving the scene to ensure that victims were compensated and that police had time to investigate the accident and arrest anyone responsible. They also say some military vehicles drove over people and crashed into shops in their hurry to leave.

Emphasizing that the investigation was in its early stages, Collins said U.S. troops had stayed at the scene to help the injured and recover the damaged truck, whose brakes had apparently failed.

"From our post-event analysis, it is strongly believed that there were agitators in the crowd who wanted to use these events for their own criminal purposes, totally counter-productive to the police and government's efforts to provide aid and assistance to the accident victims," Collins said.

A special session Tuesday of Afghanistan's parliament called on the government to prosecute U.S. soldiers responsible for the accident. The truck's driver is at the Bagram air base but is not under arrest, Collins said.

"We have no indications at this time that he acted inappropriately," he said.

A preliminary investigation has determined that the accident, which caused the worst unrest since the Taliban regime's fall in 2001, occurred when a 12-vehicle U.S. military convoy heading from the Bagram base entered Kabul at 8:12 a.m. Monday.

Two minutes later, the driver of a large cargo truck carrying bridging equipment, weighing more than 60,000 pounds, lost control of the vehicle as it came down a long hill, Collins said.

The truck was inspected before it left Bagram, but its brakes apparently overheated and failed as the driver tapped them to slow the vehicle, preliminary results of the investigation showed.

"The driver, very experienced in the operation of this type of vehicle, applied the primary emergency brake," Collins said. "He took evasive action to avoid hitting pedestrians, to avoid hitting several unoccupied vehicles that were parked along the side of the road, in an effort to slow, or stop, the vehicle's movement."

But he couldn't avoid hitting as many as a dozen vehicles with people in them as the truck passed through an intersection, Collins said. "Coalition soldiers in the convoy immediately stopped to provide medical assistance to those who were injured."

About six minutes after the accident, Kabul city police officers arrived to form a barrier to control the growing crowd, Collins said. A second U.S. convoy arrived shortly after and provided additional security while removing the damaged truck.

In southern Afghanistan, Taliban fighters Wednesday killed at least 12 Afghan policemen in two separate attacks and kidnapped several, Afghan officials said.

Afghanistan, Unraveling (NYT)

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Something has gone alarmingly wrong in Afghanistan, previously touted as the Bush administration's one quasi-successful venture in nation-building. Afghanistan's rising carnage still has not reached Iraq-like levels. But the trend is running in decidedly the wrong direction. Poorly thought-out American policies are at least partly to blame.

Unless Washington starts correcting its mistakes, parts of Afghanistan could start tumbling back toward the kind of anarchic chaos that once made such areas an attractive sanctuary for international terrorists like Osama bin Laden.

The warning signs go well beyond this week's deadly outbreak of anti-American rioting in Kabul — the worst violence there since the Taliban were evicted from Afghanistan's capital in 2001. And Kabul is widely acknowledged to be the most secure place in Afghanistan.

The past few months have also seen a stronger than expected Taliban military revival (with open help from supporters in Pakistan), a lengthening list of Afghan civilians accidentally killed in American military operations, a badly flawed United States-backed opium eradication program, and rising public disenchantment with Washington and its leading Afghan ally, President Hamid Karzai.

Afghans have long been renowned for their hostility toward foreign troops on their territory, as the 20th-century Russians and the 19th-century British learned the hard way. Until now they have made a conspicuous exception for the 21st-century Americans, who helped them shake off Taliban misrule and then promised their poor and war-shattered country an international rebuilding effort on the model of the post-World War II Marshall Plan.

More than four years later, Afghanistan's patience is running out. America's military presence is seen as narrowly focused on Washington's own agenda of hunting down Al Qaeda fighters and indifferent to Afghan civilian casualties and Afghanistan's own security needs.

Armed militia commanders still rule many areas. Some provincial cities and villages are back under the control of the same corrupt officials the Taliban won cheers for chasing out a decade ago. Farmers have fallen victim to a poppy eradication program unaccompanied by realistic plans for alternative economic development.

The answer is not for Washington to scale back legitimate American objectives. Pressing the fight against Al Qaeda is essential to America's own national security. Combating Afghan's growing narcotics trade is a vital precondition for any healthy economic development there.

What Washington needs to do is fight a lot smarter. It should begin talks at once with Afghanistan's government to arrive at a mutually satisfactory agreement on basic ground rules governing American military personnel in their interactions with Afghan civilians. It should reinforce its anti-narcotics drive with development programs that allow farmers to find adequate replacement livelihoods in more constructive lines of work.

Most Afghans do not want to go back to the horrors of the recent past. Washington needs to re-enlist their support by demonstrating that it cares not just about Afghanistan's strategic geography, but also about a decent future for its people.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

One Guilty And One Acquitted In Enron Broadband Trial (NYT)

By Kate Murphy

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

HOUSTON, May 31 — In the sixth day of deliberation, a federal jury convicted one of two former executives of Enron's Broadband unit yesterday in connection with a $111 million accounting fraud.

The executive, Kevin A. Howard, 43, the former chief financial officer, was found guilty of five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records.

A second executive, Michael W. Krautz, 37, a former accountant at Enron Broadband Services, was acquitted of the same charges.

The verdict brought to an end a trial that had been going on next door to that of the two former Enron chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, who were found guilty last week of fraud and conspiracy.

Prosecutors accused Mr. Howard and Mr. Krautz of setting up sham deals to manufacture millions in earnings from a failed video-on-demand deal. The broadband unit dissolved when Enron declared bankruptcy in 2001.

"We're very surprised at the result," said Jack B. Zimmerman, one of Mr. Howard's lawyers. Although he has not talked with jurors, Mr. Zimmerman said, "It may be that they made a distinction between the relative positions these men held at the company."

A spokesman for the Department of Justice, Bryan Sierra, said, "Juries obviously sometimes make the decision to acquit but we're obviously very pleased that they agreed with us on the guilt of Mr. Howard."

Mr. Howard's sentencing is scheduled for Sept 11. He faces up to 30 years in prison, prosecutors said.

The trial was the second for the two executives. A three-month trial of the two men and other former Enron Broadband executives ended in July with no convictions and 24 acquittals on 202 charges.

The government reindicted all five defendants but on fewer counts, and Judge Vanessa Gilmore of Federal District Court separated them into three different trials.

Mr. Howard held a more senior position at the broadband unit, and prosecutors argued that he organized the team that put together a questionable finance vehicle in which an outside investor was given a no-risk guarantee.

The prosecution contended that executives set up a bogus sale of an interest in a failing joint venture with Blockbuster to provide video-on-demand. That deal, known as Braveheart, resulted in $111 million in revenue being generated in 2001, allowing the division to meet its projected earnings.

The defense's argument was similar to those used by lawyers for Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay: that no crimes were committed and all deals were vetted by outside lawyers and accountants. Another similarity in the trials was the argument by defense lawyers that prosecution witnesses were lying to get favorable plea agreements.

Mr. Zimmerman said, "We are absolutely reviewing our options for an appeal."

After the convictions of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling last week, lawyers for the two men in the broadband trial asked Judge Gilmore to halt proceedings to ask jurors if they were influenced by the verdicts. She refused since she had already instructed jurors to ignore media reports.

The other three Enron Broadband executives facing trials are Joseph Hirko, 49, the former chief executive; Rex Shelby, 54, former senior vice president for engineering and operations; and Scott Yeager, 54, former senior vice president for business development.

Mr. Yeager's trial has been postponed while he appeals the government's effort to retry him. The others are scheduled to be tried in September.

Jury Splits In Enron Case Retrial (WP)

By Kristen Hays

HOUSTON, May 31 -- Jurors on Wednesday rendered a split verdict in the retrial of two former executives from Enron Corp.'s defunct broadband unit, convicting one while acquitting the other of all charges.

Former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard was found guilty on five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records. Former in-house accountant Michael Krautz was acquitted of the same charges, concluding a month-long retrial after their original case ended with a hung jury last year.

The verdict came six days after another local jury convicted Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay and former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling of fraud, conspiracy and other charges.

Lay and Skilling were convicted of conspiring in a fraud by repeatedly lying to investors and employees about Enron's financial condition. The company entered bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Howard and Krautz were accused of participating in a small piece of that fraud in a scheme to manufacture earnings for Enron's struggling broadband unit in late 2000. The deal involved selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that disintegrated a few months later.

Howard, 43, closed his eyes as U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore announced the jury's decision.

Krautz, 37, said: "I feel very sorry for Kevin and his family. I do not feel like they got the justice they deserved."

Howard declined to comment. Jim Lavine, one of Howard's lawyers, said he would appeal.

Gilmore scheduled Howard's sentencing for Sept. 11, the same day Lay and Skilling are to be sentenced.

Howard and Krautz were the first of five broadband executives to be retried in separate cases after the original trial of the entire group ended in a hung jury. Although Enron was primarily an energy trader, the broadband unit was created in 1998 during the dot-com boom.

The first trial began in April 2005 and focused mostly on three other executives accused of overhyping the capabilities of Enron's broadband network and operating software. After that case ended with a hung jury, the five defendants were split into three separate cases and re-indicted on fewer counts.

Howard and Krautz were charged with one count each of conspiracy, another of falsifying records and three counts of wire fraud. Howard faces a maximum of 25 years in prison -- five years for each count.

Of the other three defendants, former vice president Scott Yeager's retrial on charges of insider trading and money laundering has been postponed indefinitely pending an appeal. Joseph Hirko, former broadband unit chief executive, and Rex T. Shelby, former senior vice president, are scheduled to be retried Sept. 5 on conspiracy, fraud and insider-trading charges.

Enron Broadband Jury Convicts Former Executive Of Fraud, Conspiracy; Other Acquitted (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kristen Hays, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Jurors on Wednesday convicted one of the former executives from Enron Corp.'s defunct broadband unit to be retried after his original case ended in a hung jury last year.

Former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard was convicted of five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records while former in-house accountant Michael Krautz was acquitted of the same charges after a monthlong trial.

The verdict came six days after another jury convicted Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling of fraud, conspiracy and other charges in one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history.

Lay and Skilling were convicted of conspiring to run a massive fraud through repeated lies to investors and employees about Enron's financial strength. The company careened into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001.

Howard and Krautz were the first of five broadband executives to be retried in separate cases after the original trial of the entire group ended in a hung jury last year. Although Enron was primarily an energy trader, the broadband unit was created to sell movies over the Internet in a diversification move.

The government contended that Howard and Krautz conspired to manufacture earnings for the failing broadband unit in late 2000 by selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that disintegrated a few months later.

The two men each testified - as they did in their first trial - that the deal was legitimate. The investors were not bought out and lost their money along with other creditors when Enron collapsed in late 2001.

The first broadband trial began in April 2005 and focused mostly on three other executives accused of overhyping capabilities of Enron's broadband network and operating software. After that case ended with a hung jury, the five defendants were split into three separate cases and re-indicted on fewer counts.

Howard and Krautz were charged with one count each of conspiracy, another of falsifying records and three counts of wire fraud.

Howard faces a maximum of 25 years in prison; five years for each count.

Unlike most of their former Enron colleagues, Howard and Krautz remained on the energy company's payroll after it crashed. They were fired in March 2003, the day their indictment became public.

Of the other three defendants, two are slated to be retried in September and the second trial of the third is postponed indefinitely pending an appeal to drop the case.

Jurors in the original trial gave up efforts to reach verdicts on all counts after four days of deliberations. The panel acquitted the technology defendants on a handful of charges, but were hung on the rest. Jurors were hung on all 15 counts of fraud and conspiracy that were pending against Howard and Krautz.

Of the other three defendants, former vice president Scott Yeager's May 30 retrial on charges of insider trading and money laundering has been postponed indefinitely pending an appeal. Joseph Hirko, former broadband unit CEO, and Rex Shelby, former senior vice president, face retrial Sept. 5 for conspiracy, fraud and insider trading.

Lay and Skilling are to be sentenced Sept. 11.

Judge Throws Out Charges Against Ex-Gateway CEO (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

A federal judge threw out civil-fraud charges against the former chief executive officer of Gateway Inc., dealing federal regulators an unusual loss.

In a decision dated May 23 but made public Tuesday, Judge Roger Benitez of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of California ruled that the Securities and Exchange Commission didn't offer sufficient evidence to support charges that former Gateway CEO Jeffrey Weitzen made material misstatements in a regulatory filing and subsequent news release for third-quarter 2000 earnings.

In granting Mr. Weitzen's motion for summary judgment, the judge rejected the SEC's theory that Mr. Weitzen's "substantial participation" and "intricate involvement" in the formulation of the regulatory filing was enough to hold him liable for false statements even though Mr. Weitzen didn't sign the quarterly filing.

"The court's decision was clear and unequivocal: There was no evidence to connect Jeff Weitzen to any of the alleged accounting or disclosure improprieties at Gateway. Mr. Weitzen should not have been charged in the first place," said his lawyer, Richard Marmaro of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP. An SEC spokesman declined to comment pending review of the decision.

In the opinion, the judge said the SEC relied solely upon Mr. Weitzen's signature on the management representation letter submitted to the company's auditor to prove his knowledge of a material false filing. "A reasonable fact-finder could not find this to be substantial in relation to the preparation of the entire quarterly filing. The SEC therefore may not impute any alleged misstatements in the Q3 2000 10-Q to Weitzen," the judge said.

The SEC in November 2003 sued Mr. Weitzen, former Chief Financial Officer John Todd and former Controller Robert Manza, charging them with fraud, lying to auditors and other securities-law violations in connection with a series of transactions that took place in the third quarter of 2000. According to the SEC complaint, the executives were involved in a series of revenue-recognition and accounting gimmicks to "close the gap" between analysts' expectations and the actual earnings, which were reported in the public filings. All three defendants left the company in 2001.

Gateway was also sued in 2003 and settled the allegations without a fine by agreeing to not violate securities laws in the future. The case against the two other defendants is pending.

It is a rare loss for the SEC, which has lately won a string of complex financial fraud cases against individuals and corporations. While the case raises questions about the theory pursued by the SEC, the decision may not be far-reaching on CEO accountability. CEOs and chief financial officers weren't required to certify quarterly and annual reports until the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which in addition to increasing the accountability of senior executives also made filing false certifications a criminal offense with sentences of as much as 20 years. Mr. Weitzen didn't sign the company's quarterly report and his case preceded the change in law.

A spokesman for the Irvine, Calif., personal-computer maker said: "Gateway wasn't a party to this case. While we're pleased with the recent developments, we put this matter behind us years ago and are focused on continuing to grow our business world-wide."

SEC, 15 Banks Settle Auction-Rate Bond Claims (WP)

By Otis Bilodeau

Citigroup Inc., Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and 13 other banks agreed to pay a total of $13 million to settle claims that they favored some customers in the $200 billion market for auction-rate bonds.

The firms violated securities laws from January 2003 to June 2004 by allowing customers to change their orders in the supposedly blind auctions and by giving select clients an advantage when deciding how much to bid, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday.

A two-year investigation of the securities, whose rates are reset periodically by auctions, found industry-wide violations, Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's enforcement chief, said in a written statement.

The SEC asked the brokerages two years ago to provide reports "detailing any potentially deceptive, dishonest or unfair practices," according to a memo sent to members in May by the Bond Market Association, the Securities Industry Association and the American Bar Association.

Firms in the settlement today also include Bear Stearns Cos., Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Merrill Lynch & Co., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Morgan Stanley & Co.

The settlement also requires the firms to more fully disclose how they conduct the auctions and gives each firm's chief executive or general counsel six months to certify that they have implemented procedures to "prevent and detect" abuses, the SEC said. None of the firms admitted or denied wrongdoing.

Also yesterday, the Bond Market Association, the New York-based industry trade group, issued a draft of "best practices" for broker-dealers of auction-rate securities.

The draft sets the firms' obligations to issuers and investors, bidding by broker-dealers, and resales of auction securities by broker-dealers, Marjorie Gross, senior vice president and regulatory counsel at the Bond Market Association, said in a written statement.

"We're pleased to resolve the matter and are committed to ensuring our auction practices meet the highest industry standards," Citigroup spokesman Joseph Christinat said.

J.P. Morgan spokeswoman Kristin Lemkau could not be reached for comment. Morgan Stanley spokesman Mark Lake declined to comment.

Milberg Weiss Case Highlights Waiver Controversy (LAW)

By Leigh Jones, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, June 1, 2006

As the government's demands for waiver of privilege in white-collar prosecutions have sparked the ire of attorneys worried about the sanctity of client communications, the waiver issue in the Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman case is presenting an especially prickly problem.

The recent announcement that a grand jury had indicted the securities class action giant and two of its partners was a triumph for prosecutors in the ongoing investigation. The government alleges that the firm paid clients more than $11 million in kickbacks to serve as plaintiffs in as many as 150 class action and derivative lawsuits.

But Milberg Weiss' case, while in some ways typical of recent corporate corruption prosecutions, also involves a key distinction -- because it is a law firm -- which some experts say makes the potential infringement on attorney-client communications all the more grave.

"The privilege issues are much more complicated, much more expansive," said Jonathan Polkes, a former federal prosecutor who practices white-collar defense at New York's Weil, Gotshal & Manges. "You're talking about a defendant that lives and dies by privilege."

The issue of waiver in what have become run-of-the-mill prosecutions against corporations has raised the hackles of both defense and plaintiffs attorneys. In April, American Bar Association President Michael Greco issued a statement saying that the attorney-client privilege was "under attack" by prosecutors coercing corporations to waive their protections to qualify for leniency by the government.

In addition, a bipartisan group of lawmakers is considering asking the U.S. Department of Justice to change its policy of demanding waivers as evidence of defendants' cooperation.

After U.S. Attorney Debra Wong Yang in the Central District of California announced an indictment on May 18 against Milberg Weiss, the law firm in its own statement asserted that prosecutors had demanded access to communications with its counsel, Zuckerman Spaeder of Washington, in exchange for deferred prosecution. Milberg Weiss' refusal to grant access to that communication led to its indictment, the firm said.

Also indicted were name partners David Bershad and Steven Schulman. In addition, some clients serving as plaintiffs in class actions have pleaded guilty to receiving kickbacks.

Last week, sources involved in the case said that a reason Milberg Weiss did not waive its privilege was because its communication with Zuckerman Spaeder involved communication and work product related to Milberg Weiss' own clients and other attorneys. Milberg Weiss was not entitled to waive privilege with Zuckerman Spaeder because of its duty of confidentiality to Milberg's clients, the sources said.

In a written statement last week, a spokesman for Yang's office said that the U.S. Attorney would not comment on settlement discussions. The statement also said that "waivers of attorney-client privilege are requested in rare circumstances and only when justified by a need to obtain factual information that is not readily available through other means."

DIFFICULT ENTANGLEMENT

While it remains unclear exactly what caused deferred prosecution negotiations to collapse in the case, any request by prosecutors for Milberg Weiss' waiver of privilege likely was plagued by problems.

Professor Stephen Gillers of New York University School of Law said that two sets of communications -- those between Milberg Weiss and Zuckerman Spaeder and those between Milberg Weiss and its class action clients -- likely are entangled, which would make it difficult for Milberg Weiss to fulfill its duty of confidentiality to a client and simultaneously waive privileged communications with Zuckerman Spaeder. "It's asking Milberg to do what it cannot do," he said.

While Milberg Weiss is free to waive its own privileged and confidential protections, Gillers said, it is not free to waive the privileged and confidential protections of its clients.

Ironically, Milberg Weiss' situation regarding deferred prosecution, as it describes it, is one that some of the companies targeted by securities class actions have confronted. Like those corporations, it is facing the powerful leverage that the government has gained in white-collar corruption cases by dangling the threat of indicting the corporation, as opposed to the individuals working for it.

Practitioners and scholars point to the demise of one-time accounting giant Arthur Andersen as a seminal case. Charged, among other things, with shredding documents related to the Enron accounting fraud scandal, a criminal prosecution eventually felled the accounting firm, putting thousands of employees out of work. Since then, dozens of companies, including KPMG LLP, Computer Associates and Monsanto Co., have yielded to waiver requests and paid hefty settlements ostensibly to avoid the same fate as Arthur Andersen.

But the action against Milberg Weiss in some ways is "worse" than the Arthur Andersen case, said Greenberg Traurig attorney Leslie Corwin, whose practice focuses on ethical issues and business law. In Milberg Weiss' case, a waiver could give prosecutors access to the law firm's strategy in pursuing its class action litigation and other details about clients' representation, a situation that would violate "the most sacred right we have in the legal profession," he said.

"It involves the mental impressions, conclusions and legal theories of an attorney," Corwin said. He added that the federal rules preclude prosecutors from going after such information.

"Shame on them," he said.

But the option to defer prosecution is a choice, Polkes said. He acknowledged, however, the argument made by defendants that their choices are limited to waiving attorney-client privilege or risking the company's destruction if the government pursues criminal charges.

Particularly troublesome in the Milberg Weiss case, noted Polkes and others, is the difficulty the government has in parsing out a waiver request narrow enough to block out protected client communication, which theoretically could involve "every communication" between a firm's lawyers and its hired counsel, he said.

"The privilege waiver is potentially far less circumscribed," he said, comparing Milberg Weiss' situation to a typical white-collar investigation.

DO EXCEPTIONS APPLY?

Exceptions to an attorney's duty of confidentiality to its clients do exist, noted Gillers, with New York University. But he questions whether they would apply in Milberg Weiss' case.

A 1975 decision from the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, In re Friend, 411 F. Supp. 776, held that an attorney who faced an indictment and sought a court order enabling him to reveal to a grand jury confidential documents related to the representation of a client could do so to avoid the stigma of an indictment. But that case involved disclosure of limited information about a single client, not the wholesale waiver apparently sought here, Gillers said.

In addition, the government could assert the so-called crime-fraud exception to the privilege, which would enable it to defeat a privilege claim on a case-by-case basis, if it could show probable cause to conclude that a client used the firm to commit a crime or fraud, he said.

The legal troubles that Jenkens & Gilchrist of Dallas and Sidley Austin have experienced with their involvement in the sale of allegedly illegal tax shelters may shed some light on Milberg Weiss' situation.

In those cases, clients of the firms sought to block their law firms from turning over to prosecutors what they argued was privileged information. But decisions in those cases have been mixed.

A Fight Over Homeland Security Funds

The Department of Homeland Security said intelligence about terrorism threats and risks was a key component to its decision-making process that awarded $1.7 billion of grants to states and cities to prevent and respond to attacks, and, to a lesser extent, disasters like hurricanes.

But many politicians and officials, especially from cities and states that saw cuts in funding this year, say they saw little intelligence in the department's grant program. "The Department of Homeland Security's decision to cut funding to New York by more than 40% is absolutely indefensible and disgraceful," said an outraged House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King (R., N.Y.). "As far as I'm concerned, DHS and the administration have declared war on New York City, and I am going to fight this as hard as I possibly can."

King said the move raised "serious" questions about "the quality and sincerity of management at every level of the department."

Preparing to Process Illegal Immigrants

The immigration service says it's up to the job of processing the residency applications of millions of illegal immigrants who might be allowed to stay as part of the Senate immigration bill. But it worries that Congress will repeat a "confidentiality" provision that was in the last big immigration bill, 20 years ago, and preclude it from turning over to the police any criminal evidence it uncovers while processing illegal immigrants.

Emilio Gonzalez, director of the Citizenship and Immigration Services office, says Congress hasn't asked him how much money he'll need or what kind of documentation he'll ask of immigrants if a Senate bill that aims to grant permanent residency to perhaps eight million illegal immigrants also passes in the House. He said he would expect those issues, and other major details, to arise when Senate and House negotiators meet to reconcile differences in their immigration bills.

The office already is notorious for its huge paperwork backlogs and the long waits legal immigrants face for permanent residency. Gonzalez says the agency is studying "models" for the additional job of processing millions of illegal immigrants, including outsourcing some of the work.

He also defends the idea of charging immigrants hefty processing fees, contending that "American citizenship is worth the cost."

He frets, though, about congressional moves that would prevent his agency from turning over evidence of lawbreaking that it might uncover during processing of that huge group of illegal immigrants. That confidentiality provision was in a 1986 amnesty law for illegal immigrants, but doesn't apply to legal immigrants in their dealings with the agency.

Immigrant groups say people with criminal backgrounds aren't eligible for the program anyway — and certainly wouldn't come forward to face certain deportation. But neither may otherwise law-abiding immigrants, who could fear that the new law is a trap, says Cecilia Munoz of the National Council of La Raza, an advocacy group. But because some of the 9/11 hijackers were in the U.S. legally, the agency is wary of sitting on criminal evidence. "That's clearly inappropriate," says Gonzalez. –June Kronholz

Minding the Map and Money

"Managing Expectations." That's the subject line for a private memo House Democrats' campaign committee chairman, Chicago's Rep. Rahm Emanuel, circulated to his colleagues as they headed home for the Memorial Day recess week. With President Bush and the Republican-led Congress dragging in the polls, and Democrats growing cautiously optimistic about their chances of recapturing the House majority after 12 years, Emanuel noted that the Democrats "are headed into structural impediments (e.g. map and money)."

On the national map, he noted that Republicans' gerrymandering of House districts after the 2000 census has so limited the number of competitive seats that the nonpartisan Cook Political Report lists 35 such seats this year compared to 100 in 1994 — the year Republicans ousted the Democrats' majority. Democrats need a net gain of 15 to have a majority of the 435-member House. As for money, Emanuel said the Republican National Committee has a 4-to-1 cash advantage over the Democratic National Committee; Emanuel and his Senate campaigns counterpart, New York Sen. Charles Schumer, have sparred with DNC Chairman Howard Dean for funds since the RNC has promised millions for Republican House candidates.

But Emanuel had good news on the money front, as well. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee "has the resources necessary to compete and Democratic candidates are in a better position financially than ever before," he wrote. The DCCC was nearly equal to House Republicans' committee in the most recent campaign-finance reports, with about $23 million. Candidates' most recent reports show that 40 Democrats challenging Republican incumbents have at least $250,000 on hand — 10 times the number of two years ago.

Citing several of the Democratic challengers by name, he claimed, "Democrats are succeeding in framing and nationalizing the debate this election cycle as a campaign for change." And citing last week's primary results in Indiana and Pennsylvania, Emanuel concluded, "it is clear that Democrats are energized and Republicans are demoralized." –Jackie Calmes

Higher Phone Bills?

Monthly bills of Internet and wireless-phone customers could be going up soon, under a plan proposed by Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin.

The plan would require Internet phone companies to pay into a $7.3 billion federal fund that subsidizes phone services for low-income and rural consumers. Internet phone companies have never been required to directly pay into the fund before, which is one reason why they've been able to charge slightly less than some competitors.

The FCC is trying to shore up the federal Universal Service Fund, which subsidizes phone services. In August, the USF fee charged on high-speed Internet customers expires because of a decision last summer by the FCC to deregulate Internet lines. To make up for the expected revenue shortfall, which could run into hundreds of millions of dollars, Martin has proposed increasing the amount of revenue wireless and Internet phone companies would contribute into the fund, FCC officials say. Contributions by wireless companies would increase 9% under the proposal. Internet phone companies would also be required to directly fund the program for the first time, and at a much higher rate than wireless companies.

Phone companies pay into the fund but usually pass along those charges to consumers. The charge is usually listed as the Universal Service Fund line item on their bills. It's not clear how much more consumers would have to pay under the new plan. The increase could actually slightly lower bills for consumers who use traditional long-distance phone services, since it would increase the number of consumers actually paying into the fund.

Phone companies aren't happy about the change. They prefer a proposal floated by Martin to charge a per-phone number fee on all customers instead of tweaking the current system. That plan has stalled, however, under criticism by several special interest groups, including the NAACP and American Association of People with Disabilities, which say it would unfairly place more of a burden on low or fixed-income consumers.

The proposal to increase fees on wireless and Internet phones has begun circulating at the FCC, but it's not clear if work on it will be done in time for the agency's regularly scheduled meeting in two weeks. One reason for a potential delay: newly confirmed Republican Commissioner Robert McDowell, who would vote on the item, hasn't been sworn in yet. –Amy Schatz

Senate Panel to Grill Fannie Executives

The Senate Banking Committee is calling Fannie Mae's current chief executive officer, Daniel Mudd, and former chief Franklin Raines to testify as early as next week on federal regulators' allegations that the giant mortgage company engaged in fraudulent accounting.

Also being asked to discuss their investigations are James Lockhart, acting director of Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, Fannie's main regulator, and Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission. After Ofheo's report was released last week, Lockhart said he has directed Fannie's board to grab back any unjustified compensation paid to senior executives as a result of accounting misdeeds.

Committee Chairman Richard Shelby (R., Ala.) is planning a wide-ranging hearing, including probing whether Mudd is the right person to lead the mortgage giant. While not accused of wrongdoing, he was a senior Fannie executive for a few years during which the books were cooked. –Michael Schroeder

Big Bonuses Still Flow, Even If Bosses Miss Goals (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

It was the kind of mistake that wage slaves can only dream of. Because of what the company called an "improper interpretation" of his employment contract, Sheldon G. Adelson, chairman, chief executive and treasurer of the Las Vegas Sands Corporation, received $3.6 million in salary and bonus last year, almost $1 million more than prescribed under the company's performance plan.

DOJ_NMG_0030955

Four more top executives of the Las Vegas Sands, which owns the Venetian Resort Hotel and Casino, received more than they should have. The total in excess bonus payments for the five men was $2.8 million.

The compensation committee of the board conceded that it had made an error. But it said that "the outstanding performance of the company in 2005" justified the extra money, and it allowed the executives to keep it.

Shareholders of Las Vegas Sands did not fare as well. The value of their holdings fell 18 percent last year.

As executive pay packages have rocketed in recent years, their defenders have contended that because most are tied to company performance, they are both earned and deserved. But as the Las Vegas Sands example shows, investors who plow through company filings often find that executive compensation exceeds the amounts allowed under the performance targets set by the directors.

Executives of companies as varied as Halliburton, the military contractor and oil services concern; Assurant, an insurance company; and Big Lots, a discount retailer, all received bonuses and other pay outside the performance parameters set by the boards of those companies.

It is the equivalent of moving the goalposts to shorten the field, compensation experts say.

"Lowering the hurdles is especially disconcerting because very often the goals are not set all that high to begin with," said Lucian Bebchuk, professor at Harvard Law School and author with Jesse Fried of "Pay Without Performance." Mr. Bebchuk said shareholders should be especially alert to increases in bonuses because more companies were shifting away from stock options and into cash incentives.

Some employment agreements actually stipulate that they will provide bonuses even if company performance declines. The agreement struck in 2004 by Peter Chernin, president and chief operating officer of the News Corporation, entitles him to a bonus even if earnings per share fall at the company. If earnings rise by 15 percent in any given year, Mr. Chernin's bonus is $12.5 million. But if they fall 6.25 percent, Mr. Chernin's bonus is $4.5 million, and an earnings decline of 14 percent translates to a $3.52 million bonus.

Last year, Mr. Chernin received $8.3 million in salary and $18.9 million in bonus pay. A company spokesman declined to comment on the bonus structure. He confirmed that the company's chief executive, Rupert Murdoch, has a similar bonus arrangement. Company filings show that Mr. Murdoch received a bonus of $18.9 million last year.

While bonus and other incentive pay figures are included in company filings, shareholders hoping to calculate precisely what performance objectives executives must meet to receive such pay can be confounded.

Descriptions of bonus targets are typically vague and often include a laundry list of measures that the board may or may not consider. The board may factor in sales, earnings, stock price, capital expenditures, cash flow, even inventory levels. Company officials often explain the practice by saying that too-specific information on performance hurdles can give away corporate secrets or invite rival organizations to lure executives away by offering them contract terms that are easier to achieve.

Compensation experts counter that lists of vague hurdles may allow carefully chosen measurements to be met in both fair weather and foul.

Indeed, shareholders often find that the performance measures used by the company to determine pay can be very flexible. For example, Assurant, which is based in New York, says its compensation committee can adjust incentive payments for extraordinary events, "including, but not limited to, acquisitions or dispositions of businesses, litigation costs, tax or insurance recoveries or settlements, changes to accounting principles, asset impairment and restructuring."

For bonuses paid in 2004, Assurant adjusted the earnings performance measure to exclude losses related to hurricanes along the Atlantic coastline. This adjustment helped to increase the company's net operating income and therefore raised bonuses to the company's executives in 2004.

It is impossible to pinpoint precisely how much the hurricane exclusion bolstered the Assurant executives' bonuses in 2004. Company filings stated that without two exclusions, one of which was the hurricane impact, bonuses would have been equal to half of their target. Thanks to the adjustments, bonuses were paid at 1.72 times their target.

As James F. Reda, an independent compensation consultant in New York, pointed out, shareholders cannot adjust their results for things like hurricane losses, or losses on divestitures or discontinued operations, all of which deplete shareholder equity.

"What a lot of these plans are trying to look at is core business, and it is a decent argument," Mr. Reda said. "But sometimes people get lazy and put all sorts of stuff in the restructuring bucket that don't belong there — like operating expenses. Once you give management a little wiggle room, being smart people, they can figure out ways to take advantage of it."

Often, company officials include everyday expenses — like those relating to sales and administration — in restructuring costs, making the company appear to be far more profitable.

In some cases, performance measures appear to reflect basic operational tasks expected of an executive, not something worthy of extra pay. Last year, Assurant's compensation committee chose four elements to determine whether its executives deserved a bonus. Three were fairly typical financial measures: net operating income, revenue growth and return on equity at the company.

The fourth measure, though, was how well Assurant's executives complied with Sarbanes-Oxley, the law enacted in 2002 after Enron and WorldCom collapsed. According to company filings, one-quarter of an executive's bonus calculation related to his or her "compliance with Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act," a part of the law that relates to a company's internal financial controls.

Last year, J. Kerry Clayton, Assurant's chief executive; Robert B. Pollock, its president, and Lesley Silvester, an executive vice president, all received bonuses that were 1.62 times their targets.

The compensation committee of Assurant's board is headed by Beth L. Bronner, chief marketing officer of Jim Beam Brands, a division of Fortune Brands. She is joined on the committee by Charles John Koch, vice chairman of the board of the Citizens Financial Group; Michele Coleman Mayes, general counsel for Pitney Bowes, and John M. Palms, president emeritus of the University of South Carolina.

Melissa Kivett, head of investor relations at Assurant, said that the hurricane exclusions in 2004 were appropriate. Because of a substantial increase in Assurant's stock price, she said, "the compensation committee of our board felt that on this one occasion they needed to make an adjustment to net operating income to recognize and compensate management for this record performance."

As for the bonuses relating to Sarbanes-Oxley, Ms. Kivett said they were designed "to ensure that we had all the processes in place to meet compliance goals. The result was we did have a clean SOX opinion." She added that this year, the portion of the bonus related to Sarbanes-Oxley was smaller than it was in 2005.

But Paul Hodgson, senior research associate at the Corporate Library, an institutional research firm in Portland, Me., said paying a bonus for compliance with a law was unusual. "I can see making compliance a requirement," he said. "Because they were not a public company until 2004 they didn't have to comply with Sarbanes-Oxley before. But actually giving them a bonus for it is taking it a step further than my logic can let me go. Compliance with the law is part of your day-to-day work, not something you have to be incentivized for."

Another company that gave extra pay to executives for regular business activities was Halliburton. Its top executives received special bonuses last year for settling asbestos litigation in which the company was a defendant.

Halliburton's filings described the asbestos settlement as a "historical achievement" requiring a "tremendous amount of effort and sacrifices on the part of the employees who worked diligently over the last three years orchestrating and implementing this uniquely creative and complicated strategy."

In recognition of their performance, the company paid cash bonuses totaling $5.5 million to 36 employees. Among them were C. Christopher Gaut, Halliburton's chief financial officer; Albert O. Cornelison Jr., the company's general counsel, and Mark A. McCollum, the chief accounting officer. Mr. Gaut received $750,000, Mr. Cornelison received $1 million and Mr. McCollum received $50,000.

David J. Lesar, the company's chief executive, did not receive cash for his contribution to the asbestos settlement. He decided to take an option grant of 100,000 shares, worth $2.04 million at the time, as his extra pay for his settlement work.

Halliburton's compensation committee is made up of Robert L. Crandall, former chief executive of AMR, the parent of American Airlines; Kenneth T. Derr, the committee's chairman and a former chief executive of Chevron; W. R. Howell, a former chief executive of J. C. Penney; and Debra L. Reed, president of the San Diego Gas and Electric Company.

None of the directors returned phone calls seeking comment about the asbestos awards. Cathy Mann, a Halliburton spokeswoman, said: "This additional compensation was for the extraordinary amount of time and effort these individuals exerted, which was above and beyond what is normally expected of them in relation to their job responsibilities."

At least Halliburton and Assurant produced strong returns to shareholders last year before handing over more to executives.

Perhaps most exasperating to shareholders are bonuses to executives who fail to meet their basic performance targets. Consider what was paid to Dan W. Matthias, chief executive of Mothers Work, a maternity retailer, and his wife, Rebecca C. Matthias, the company's president.

According to the company's filings, Mr. and Mrs. Matthias were not entitled to either a cash bonus or an option grant during the year because the company failed to achieve the expected growth in earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization.

Each of the Matthiases, though, received a grant of 40,000 stock options in fiscal 2005, on top of half-million-dollar salaries. The company's compensation committee wanted to "recognize the progress made in the past year in both the development and launch of the company's strategic business initiatives, which included its Destination Maternity superstores and expansion of the company's relationship with Sears and a new tie with Kohl's, another retailer," its filing said.

"The compensation committee believes that the stock options grant is consistent with aligning the interests of these senior executives with the stockholders and will serve to reinforce the importance of improving stockholder value over the long term," the filing said.

Those stock options, if they have not been cashed in, are now worth $2.8 million.

The compensation committee of Mothers Work is overseen by Joseph A. Goldblum, a private investor; David Schlessinger, founder of Five Below, a discount retailer; and William A. Schwartz Jr., chief executive of U.S. Vision, an optical products retailer.

A spokeswoman for Mothers Work said neither the company nor its directors would comment on the option grant.

"What is often missing in these after-the-fact changings of the bonus rules of engagement is a sufficient — or any — quid pro quo," said Brian Foley, an independent compensation consultant in White Plains. Mr. Foley suggests that companies instead delay paying part of the bonus or stretch out the performance period to link the payout to an improvement in performance.

Like Mothers Work, Big Lots paid bonuses to executives last year even though performance was lagging. Big Lots, a discount retailer based in Columbus, Ohio, is going through a restructuring and last year hired a new chief executive, Steven S. Fishman. Performance criteria set by the compensation committee were not met, its proxy filing pointed out.

Still, four executives received one-time bonuses in 2005, on top of other pay. Brad A. Waite, executive vice president of Big Lots, received a bonus of $375,000; John C. Martin, also executive vice president, received $279,000; Lisa M. Bachmann, senior vice president, received $187,500, and Joe R. Cooper, chief financial officer, received $175,000.

As the Big Lots filing explained, without those one-time bonuses, the executives' cash compensation would have been below the market average. The committee determined that the pay additions would not be excessive.

Big Lots' shares started 2005 at $12.13 and ended the year at $12.01. Charles W. Haubiel, general counsel at Big Lots, said the bonuses were given to keep the company's talent intact during a time of uncertainty. "The compensation committee identified a core group of executives," he said, "and devised a retention program that said if you stay on during the year during the C.E.O. search process, you will receive a retention bonus equal to the target bonus you are typically eligible for."

The compensation committee of Big Lots is headed by David T. Kollat, president of 22 Inc., a research consulting firm, who is also on the board of Wolverine World Wide, a shoe manufacturer, and Select Comfort, a maker of air-bed mattresses. The committee's other members are Brenda J. Lauderback, a former president of the wholesale division of the Nine West Group, a shoe maker, who is also on the board of Wolverine Worldwide and Select Comfort; and Dennis P. Tishkoff, chief executive of the Drew Shoe Corporation.

These examples indicate that companies do not always practice what they preach about pay for performance. As a result, investors must read company proxies closely.

Back at the Las Vegas Sands, for example, the company's regulatory filings say that executive bonuses will be paid only when they are earned. Bonuses are generated, the company said, "only upon the attainment of the applicable performance goals during the applicable performance period." The compensation committee of the Las Vegas Sands' board establishes both the goals and the period during which they are measured, the filings state.

Last year's $2.8 million mistake proves otherwise, however. The mistaken payout was equal to almost 1 percent of the company's earnings.

The unearned bonuses are notable not only because they followed $62 million in bonuses paid to the five men in 2004 (to reflect the "significant value" they created for shareholders when they helped secure financing for a mall at the Palazzo Hotel and Casino, adjacent to the Venetian). They are also striking because they cannot be justified as performance-based under the tax code. The extra bonuses therefore were not deductible as a business expense, making them more costly for shareholders.

The error did prompt a meeting on March 1 of the four-man compensation committee of Las Vegas Sands' board, its filings stated. The committee considered what to do about the overpayments, and a majority concluded that the company's performance supported them. One member of the committee dissented, the filing said: James L. Purcell, who retired as a partner at Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison in 1999.

The members who voted to allow the executives to keep the unearned bonuses were Irwin Chafetz, a former executive at the Interface Group, a vacation tour operator that is owned by Mr. Adelson, Las Vegas Sands' chief executive; Charles Forman, a former executive at the Interface Group who is chief executive officer of the Centric Events Group, a trade show and conference business; and Michael A. Leven, founder of U.S. Franchise Systems, franchisor of Microtel Inns and Suites. Even though Mr. Chafetz and Mr. Forman have extensive affiliations, either present or past, with Mr. Adelson's Interface Group, they are considered independent directors according to New York Stock Exchange standards.

A company spokesman said that neither Mr. Purcell nor the other members of the compensation committee of Las Vegas Sands' board would comment on the bonus overpayments. Las Vegas Sands officials who might be able to discuss the bonuses were traveling and unreachable, he said.

Mr. Foley, the independent compensation consultant, said he had never seen anything like the multimillion-dollar mistakes last year at Las Vegas Sands. "There's nothing like playing by the house rules," he said, "when you own the house, the chips, the rules and the croupiers."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Black Caucus Backs Jefferson's Staying Put (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

Rep. William J. Jefferson has been asked by the House Democratic leader to step down from the Ways and Means Committee owing to the lingering FBI bribery investigation, but the Louisiana Democrat has refused and won the support of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC).

"Mr. Jefferson has not been charged with anything, so to forcibly remove him from a seat on the Ways and Means Committee would be unprecedented," the CBC said in a statement.

The 42 House members and one senator in the black caucus have not publicly discussed the scandal surrounding one of their own, but several staffers of CBC members have told The Washington Times that some lawmakers see a double standard in the resignation demand by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

The staffers said that she has made no similar demand for Rep. Allan B. Mollohan, West Virginia Democrat, who also is involved in an ethics scandal, to step aside from the House Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Jefferson has been upset with Mrs. Pelosi since she rejected his 2002 request to become chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in favor of her fellow California Democrat, the now-deceased Rep. Robert T. Matsui, who seconded her candidacy to become the party leader.

Mr. Jefferson has proclaimed that he is not guilty in the bribery case and has not been charged, but a former staffer and two associates have pleaded guilty to bribing him and helping his family members' business interests in Africa in exchange for favors. The FBI raided his office last month, touching off a tense battle between Congress and the Justice Department.

Mrs. Pelosi said she asked Mr. Jefferson to step down "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus." But she has not moved to remove him forcibly and likely will not, said a Democrat staffer, because that would take a full vote of the House.

"She could also ask for a vote of no confidence by the entire Democratic Caucus," the staffer said, but added that this also is unlikely.

The Jefferson bribery investigation comes while Democrats have tried to tag the Republican majority as one engaged in a "culture of corruption" and "unethical behavior." But the issue has also caused problems internally because of the perceived disparity in the way Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Mollohan are being disciplined, said some staffers of CBC members.

A conservative group in West Virginia called for an investigation into Mr. Mollohan's dealings with a distant cousin, who used his connection to the congressman to win work with a nonprofit that Mr. Mollohan established and a federal contract in his district that was pulled for noncompliance in the late 1990s.

The cousin, Joseph L. Jarvis Jr., owes the nonprofit $67,681 in unpaid rent, but he jointly owns 27 condominiums in the Remington, a building in Washington, worth $8 million. In addition, the inquiries delve into other foundations that Mr. Mollohan has established that collectively have received millions in federal tax dollars through the appropriations process.

Despite the apparent smell of pork-spending for personal gain, Mr. Mollohan has not been asked to step down from his seat on the House Appropriations Committee.

A Democratic House staffer said the cases are different, noting that Mr. Mollohan "cooperated" with the House leadership and voluntarily gave up his spot as ranking Democrat on the House Standards of Official Conduct Committee. The staffer also noted that the FBI has refused to confirm that Mr. Mollohan is being investigated, that no associates or staffers have pleaded guilty to anything and that there are no reports that he had been caught on tape taking bribes or making deals.

The black caucus, however, is not so sure that that removes the perception of a double standard, because Mr. Mollohan's position as an appropriator is a key part of the investigation.

"They basically asked him to step down from ethics, and he said, 'Thank you,' " one staffer said.

Op-Ed: Lawmakers' Offices Not Immune From Searches (BSUN)

By Steven P. Grossman

The Baltimore Sun, June 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030959

In a rare demonstration of bipartisan cooperation, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi together criticized the FBI's search of the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat who is under investigation in connection with the alleged acceptance of bribes.

How heartwarming it is that two people who seem to agree on little that can benefit the country have come together to defend the right of their colleagues to have some sort of special immunity from search warrants issued to uncover crimes committed by legislators. They said the investigators, like the investigated, are not above the law. A noble thought, but one that needs to be examined.

The Justice Department did obtain a search warrant to authorize the search of Mr. Jefferson's office. In other words, investigators prepared a sworn statement that demonstrated to a judge that there was probable cause, meaning it was more likely than not that there was evidence of a crime to be found in the congressman's office.

According to an FBI affidavit, agents videotaped Mr. Jefferson meeting about receiving money in exchange for favorable treatment of a business venture in Nigeria. It said he was shown being handed a briefcase containing $100,000 in cash and later was found to have secreted $90,000 in his refrigerator. The New Orleans congressman has not been charged with a crime.

The role of the courts in the warrant process cannot be overstated. The framers of our Constitution wrote the Fourth Amendment to protect us from illegal searches and seizures.

There are two separate and independent requirements the government must meet before it searches a private home or business. The first is that there must be probable cause for the search. The second is that the government must obtain a warrant from a magistrate authorizing and properly limiting the search.

The reason the framers included the warrant requirement was that they saw the courts as the intermediary between the forces of law and order and the citizenry.

They did not want the government intruding on people's privacy rights and freedoms based on a law enforcement officer's determination of whether probable cause existed. It is for this reason that President Bush's arguments in favor of wiretapping and telephone interceptions (considered to be searches under the Fourth Amendment) without seeking proper authorization from a judge have been so widely and correctly criticized.

Despite laws specifically designed to facilitate and speed up the process by which the government can obtain warrants from magistrates always at their disposal for these purposes, the Bush administration has invaded people's privacy rights without obtaining judicial permission. If you want to worry about government overreaching, worry about this.

Some critics of the search have legitimate concerns about the separation of powers between government branches and particularly express concern that such searches can be too political and too broad and can uncover documents not connected with the investigation and which the proper workings of government require to be kept private.

That is why we have courts and why the framers imposed requirements not just to authorize a search but also to ensure that the search is limited in scope and duration. The courts for years have limited searches in this way.

For example, in authorizing searches of newspaper offices for evidence that could assist a criminal investigation, the Supreme Court has made it clear that such searches must be limited in ways designed to minimize the likelihood that material protected by the First Amendment's freedom of the press requirement will be disturbed.

The same type of minimization requirements should be imposed when the courts authorize the search of a legislative office. There is nothing in the Fourth Amendment or case law, however, that immunizes congressional offices from legitimate government searches.

Despite Fourth Amendment protections, abuses can occur in obtaining and executing a search warrant for a legislator's office. But such abuses can and do occur every day when search warrants are used in criminal investigations. Such abuses tell us that we must be more vigilant than we have been in avoiding these abuses. They do not, however, tell us we should stop searching.

Office Raid Looking A Lot Like Overkill (NOTP)

By James Gill

New Orleans Times-Picayune, June 1, 2006

The question is on everyone's lips, but New Orleans criminal defense lawyer Pat Fanning asks it with rare eloquence.

Quoting from his e-mail here, "If they really do have video and audio tapes of the cash transaction, 90 large in the freezer, two rat flips dying to throw up all over poor Billy Boy, a good-looking, kajillionaire do-gooder for a victim, numerous other tapes and documents etc., etc. then what in the hell could be so damned important in Dollar Bill's office that they couldn't live without it?"

The feds aren't saying. Although they released the affidavit that secured the warrant to search the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, the section listing the evidence they sought was blacked out. Putting the affidavit in the public record before Jefferson has even been charged with a crime was an unusual move, but then this was a historic moment, the first time the G-men ever barged into the Rayburn Building.

It's not every day that Republicans take up the cause of an allegedly crooked Democrat either, but that is what the federal raid wrought. Such was the bipartisan squawk in Congress that President Bush, though brushing aside demands that the seized evidence be returned, did order the Justice Department not to take another gander at it for 45 days.

In what was decidedly not a first, the protesting members of Congress spouted a great deal of pishtosh, denouncing the raid as contrary to the separation of powers principle and a violation of the Constitution's speech and debate clause.

That clause stipulates that "for any Speech or Debate in either House, they (members of Congress) shall not be questioned in any other Place." Neither that, nor any other provision of the Constitution, seems to have been written in order to thwart the investigation of public bribery.

It is unlikely in any case that many voters bought the line that the brouhaha was over constitutional principle. This Congress has meekly acquiesced in too many executive power grabs to be taken seriously on that issue. Many citizens will assume the worm turned because dark secrets lurk in the recesses of other congressional offices.

If the raid generated sympathy for Jefferson in Congress, it does not seem to have had the same effect anywhere else. Still, the Justice Department will need to have uncovered some pretty juicy evidence if the raid is to be worth the resentment it stirred up in Congress and the consequent distraction and delay.

The affidavit filed with the warrant application gives the strong impression that the feds have enough on Jefferson to send him away for many years -- maybe, he being 59 years old, the rest of his life. Whatever else they found in their latest raid could hardly have made his plight any worse. So far as Jefferson is concerned the feds are just running up the score, although it may be that his files contained evidence against accomplices unknown to the public.

Legal experts speculated that the raid may have been staged to pressure Jefferson into a deal. But it is hard to imagine that, even with a guilty plea, Jefferson would be offered a sentence to jump at. Two accomplices have reached plea deals of their own and agreed to testify against Jefferson . The first of them to be sentenced, his former congressional aide Brett Pfeffer, just got eight years.

Although Pfeffer's sentence will probably be reduced if his testimony pleases prosecutors at trial, it does provide a benchmark that Jefferson might contemplate with a shudder. As the alleged criminal mastermind, Jefferson would have to get significantly more for his guilty plea than Pfeffer got for his, especially as judges like to tack on extra time for betrayal of the public trust. Jefferson is in such deep trouble that he might have little to lose by rolling the dice at trial.

Federal investigations are always reminiscent of molasses in February, but we are all wondering now what else is required for an indictment. The feds got Pfeffer, they got Vernon Jackson, who has confessed to paying serious sweeteners and they got Lori Mody a "good-looking kajillionaire" to Fanning but a "cooperating witness" in official parlance. Mody wore a wire when handing over $100,000 in cash that investigators say had been requested to bribe a Nigerian official but most of which was later discovered in a freezer when the FBI raided Jefferson's Washington residence.

Noe Pleads Guilty To Federal Campaign Fund-raising Charges (COLDIS)

By Mark Niquette, The Columbus Dispatch

Columbus Dispatch, June 1, 2006

Coin dealer faces likely 2-year prison sentence

TOLEDO -- Indicted coin dealer Thomas W. Noe pleaded guilty today to illegally using friends and associates to funnel $45,400 to President Bush's re-election campaign.

Noe changed his previous not-guilty pleas to three federal charges to "guilty" during a hearing before U.S. District Judge David A. Katz.

Katz delayed sentencing Noe until after a presentence report is completed, but authorities said that advisory guideline call for two to two-and-a-half years in prison plus possible fines.

Noe had faced up to 15 years in prison and fines up to $950,000 if convicted on all counts but can receive a reduced sentence for admitting responsibility. Federal prosecutors said they also plan to seek additional penalties for the loss of public confidence in the presidential election process.

Noe, 51, read a brief statement before pleading guilty, saying he came to court to voluntarily accept responsibility and to spare his family and friends the embarrassment of further court proceedings.

The former Maumee coin dealer pleaded not guilty after being indicted last October and was set to stand trial July 24. But he notified the court last month he wanted to change that plea.

Prosecutors said Noe circumvented the $2,000 federal limit on individual contributions by giving his own money to 24 people as "conduits" to donate illegally to Bush in their names.

Noe carried out the scheme to fulfill a pledge to raise $50,000 for the Bush-Cheney campaign at a 2003 fundraiser in Columbus, according to the indictment.

The former Maumee coin dealer was listed by the Bush-Cheney campaign as one of 19 Ohio "Pioneers" -- someone who raised at least $100,000 for the campaign.

Noe faced one count of conspiracy to violate the Federal Election Campaign Act, one count of violating the act and one count of causing the Bush-Cheney campaign to file a false campaign finance report.

Federal officials have said it is the largest conduit scheme ever prosecuted under new campaign-finance restrictions passed in 2002 and "one of the first and most important examples" of federal efforts to crack down on such activity.

"(It is) one of the most blatant and excessive campaign-finance criminal schemes we have encountered," Noel Hillman, head of the Justice Department's public-integrity section, said last fall after Noe's indictment.

Federal authorities have said that conduits -- or the "super conduits," who recruited other conduits in the scheme -- typically aren't prosecuted in such cases if they cooperate against the main target.

Even so, four current or former Toledo-area public officials who have been identified as conduits could face state ethics charges related to not reporting the money received from Noe. A special prosecutor has been appointed in that matter.

Separate from the federal case, Noe also faces 53 state felony counts related to his handling of an ill-fated $50 million investment in rare coins and other items for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation.

The charges against Noe include theft, forgery and engaging in a pattern of corrupt activity. Auditors determined more than $13.5 million was misspent.

Noe has pleaded not guilty to those charges and is free on bond. His trial is scheduled for Aug. 29 in Lucas County Common Pleas Court in Toledo, although Noe has asked to have the trial moved to another county because of pre-trial publicity.

Noe Pleads Guilty To Illegally Funneling Donations To Bush (TOLB)

By MIKE WILKINSON And STEVE EDER, BLADE STAFF WRITERS

Toledo Blade (OH), June 1, 2006

Former GOP fund-raiser Tom Noe admitted today that he used politicians, former aides to Gov. Bob Taft, coworkers, and friends to illegally pour thousands of dollars into the effort to reelect President Bush.

Noe entered a guilty plea before U.S. District Court Judge David Katz in Toledo to all three felony charges he faced for violating federal campaign finance law. Appearing with his sister and brother-in-law and three attorneys, Noe was calm and responsive to Judge Katz' questions during the 47-minute hearing.

Then, in a brief, 10-second statement, Noe said he voluntarily agreed to change his plea "to accept responsibility to spare my family and friends the further embarassment of any additional court proceeding. Therefore, I plead guilty."

No date was set for sentencing pending a pre-sentencing report to the judge. Noe, who lives in Florida, remains free on $350,000 bond.

With the admission, Noe faces a maximum of five years in prison on each count, but likely faces 24-30 months in prison. He also faces a potential fine of nearly $1 million, and possibly probation.

John Pearson, an assistant U.S. Attorney in the public integrity section of the Justice Department, said he would seek an even harsher penalty for Noe because of the "potential loss of public faith in the presidential race."

Noe, 51, was indicted in October on three charges related to the funneling of more then $45,000 into the Bush campaign at a $2,000-a-seat fund-raiser in Columbus in October, 2003. The Bush campaign later named Noe a “Pioneer” for raising at least $100,000 overall.

At the time of his indictment, a senior Justice Department official said the Noe case represented the largest campaign money-laundering scheme prosecuted by the U.S. Justice Department since new campaign finance laws were enacted by Congress in 2002.

The Noe probe identified several current and former politicians as “conduits,” including Toledo City Councilman Betty Shultz, Lucas County Commissioner Maggie Thurber, former Toledo mayor Donna Owens, and former state representative Sally Perz.

All face potential state ethics charges for failing to disclose the money from Noe. He still faces more than four dozen other charges in Lucas County Common Pleas Court on allegations that he stole millions of dollars from two rare-coin funds he managed for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation.

Coin Dealer Awaits Federal Sentence With State Case Pending (AP)

By ANDREW WELSH-HUGGINS, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio — A prominent GOP fundraiser no sooner pleaded guilty to breaking federal campaign finance law than he began fighting to stay out of prison with his trial over the state's ill-fated $50 million coin investment looming.

Tom Noe, also at the center of a state political scandal, pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges that he illegally funneled about $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign.

The investment scandal has been a major embarrassment for Ohio's ruling Republicans and has given Democrats a better shot this year at winning state offices, including the governor's office that the GOP has held since 1991.

Once a powerful political figure who raised hefty sums for a slew of Republicans, Noe admitted arranging a contribution scheme to fulfill his promise to generate $50,000 for a Bush fundraiser.

Noe said Wednesday that he decided to plead guilty to "spare my family and many dear friends" the ordeal of a trial. The former Toledo-area coin dealer who now lives in the Florida Keys remained free on bond.

Noe, 51, is charged in state court with stealing up to $1 million of the coin investment he managed for the state insurance fund for injured workers. He has pleaded not guilty and is scheduled for trial Aug. 29.

Noe's attorney argued his client's access to lawyers before that trial is crucial. Prosecutors told U.S. District Judge David Katz the upcoming trial was no reason to delay Noe's sentencing on the federal conviction.

"The fact he has other state charges does not mean he should receive special treatment for better or for worse," said John Pearson, an attorney with the U.S. Justice Department's public integrity unit.

Katz said he'll decide after reviewing court officials' sentencing report.

Prosecutors told Katz they would recommend a total sentence of two years to 2 1/2 years for all three convictions. The maximum sentence is five years in prison on each of the three counts and a combined $950,000 in fines.

Noe took the conviction in stride, chatting with family members on a bench outside the courtroom before the hearing began and making occasional calls on his cell phone.

Investigators have not said whether Noe used money from the state coin fund for campaign contributions. Pearson said Wednesday that wouldn't be a factor in determining Noe's federal sentence, but he added prosecutors would ask for a lengthier sentence because the case may have caused a loss of confidence in the presidential election.

Noe was charged with exceeding federal campaign contribution limits, using others to make the contributions and causing the Bush campaign to submit a false campaign-finance statement. Prosecutors said Noe gave $45,400 to 24 friends and associates who made the campaign donations in their own names, allowing him to skirt the $2,000 limit on individual contributions.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Seth Uram said Noe told his friends to tell investigators that the money was a loan. At least four told investigators they knew what they were doing was illegal, he said.

Noe wrote several checks just under the cap to avoid suspicion because he knew the scheme violated campaign finance laws since he had received literature from the Bush campaign outlining the federal rules, Uram said. Noe wrote the checks in the eight days leading up to a fundraiser in October 2003 at a downtown Columbus hotel.

Among those who donated money that came from Noe were several Toledo area officeholders and a former mayor. A lawyer for three said they were not in danger of being charged because they cooperated with investigators.

Investigations into Noe's coin investment, first reported in April 2005 by The Blade newspaper, led to Gov. Bob Taft's no contest plea and conviction in August to charges he accepted golf outings and other gifts that he didn't report.

Noe personally contributed more than $105,000 to Republicans including Bush and Taft during the 2004 campaign. The Bush-Cheney campaign donated $6,000 it received from Noe and his wife, Bernadette, to charity. The rest of the money donated at the Bush fundraiser in October 2003 remains with the Republican Party.

Democrats criticized Bush for keeping the contributions, with Ohio Democratic chairman Chris Redfern calling for the money to be donated to the state workers' comp bureau.

Aaron McLear, spokesman for the Republican National Committee, which represents the inactive Bush campaign, said the group is waiting for a directive it expects from the court about what to do with the money.

FBI Arrests 2 Pa. Legislative Aides (WP)

By Maryclaire Dale

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030963

PHILADELPHIA -- The FBI arrested two men who did computer work for a powerful state senator Wednesday on charges that they permanently deleted e-mails to thwart a federal investigation.

Leonard P. Luchko and Mark Eister performed electronic "wipes" of computers at Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's Senate offices, his home at the New Jersey shore and at a nonprofit with deep ties to Fumo, the FBI alleged in an affidavit.

"This was a deliberate, systematic and ultimately successful effort to interfere with a federal investigation," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said. "We have to assume that valuable information is lost forever."

The document does not name Fumo and he has not been charged, but Meehan said the probe is not over. The affidavit refers to an unidentified senator who clearly is Fumo.

Luchko and Eister, employees of a state Senate entity that provides computer services to its Democratic members, are charged with obstruction of justice.

The aides' lawyers say they were just doing their jobs, securing the privacy of communications. Prosecutors, however, say e-mails were deleted as the FBI demanded files as part of their grand jury investigation into Fumo's links to the nonprofit.

"Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness," Luchko wrote in a June 2004 e-mail, according to court documents. Prosecutors allege that Luchko wrote to Eister to same day, saying Fumo wanted all e-mail between him and his Harrisburg staff deleted weekly.

The investigation centers on whether Fumo used his office to extort corporate donations for the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, which benefits Fumo's South Philadelphia district. Investigators are trying to find out if the senator "benefited both politically and personally from expenditures made" by the nonprofit, according to court documents.

The nonprofit, which has helped finance charter schools and refurbished run-down properties in South Philadelphia, has obtained millions of dollars in donations from powerful entities that lobby the Legislature.

Prosecutors say they have numerous e-mails from third-party sources that show Fumo used the nonprofit to funnel money to projects and causes important to him.

Fumo, the ranking Democrat on the Senate appropriations committee, is one of the most influential politicians in Harrisburg. He has said requests for donations to Citizens Alliance were efforts to help his district and did not influence his policy positions.

"The government has made it clear that it will go to any length to get Senator Fumo," Fumo's lawyer, Richard Sprague, said in a statement. "These two individuals arrested today are unfortunately victims of the process of attempting to get the senator. Their trials will prove that."

Luchko, 49, of Collingdale, and Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, were arrested at their homes before daybreak, the FBI said. They were released on bail, ordered not to talk to Fumo staff members and told to return to court next week.

Luchko's lawyer, James C. Schwartzman, said he was surprised to learn of the arrests because he had repeatedly offered to have his client surrender. He promised to fight the charges and said Luchko was not under any pressure to please Fumo.

Eister's lawyer, Brian McMonagle, said his client routinely deleted e-mails for security reasons long before the FBI probe.

2 Fumo Aides Charged With Cover-up (PHI)

By Craig R. Mccoy, Emilie Lounsberry And Mario F. Cattabiani

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 1, 2006

Stepping up the pressure in their investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, federal agents yesterday arrested two low-level aides and charged them with a scheme to obstruct justice by hiding the senator's e-mails from the FBI.

The arrests, the first in the three-year investigation, were seen as a hardball move by federal prosecutors: an attempt to squeeze the computer technicians into striking deals and testifying against Fumo.

At 6 a.m., FBI and IRS agents rousted Leonard Luchko, 49, and Mark Eister, 36, taking them in handcuffs to the federal courthouse in Center City.

The two men were accused of wiping e-mail and other evidence from computers used by Fumo, his staff, and a wealthy nonprofit with ties to Fumo, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods.

There was more: Prosecutors released a richly detailed, 65-page FBI affidavit that quoted e-mails from the two technicians, saying they were following Fumo's orders.

"The FBI probe into the Senator has really set him off," Luchko wrote in one message found by the FBI. "... He wants all the Blackberries wiped."

DOJ_NMG_0030964

U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said that the deletions amounted to a "pervasive, deliberate and continual effort to stifle the investigation."

Meehan would not discuss Fumo's future, but he did say the inquiry was still under way. "I would suggest we're not finished with this yet," he said.

The affidavit also provides the government's first public disclosure of the scope of its investigation: whether Fumo was "engaged in extortion" in trying to get corporate contributions for Citizens' Alliance, and whether any of those contributions were used to benefit Fumo politically or personally.

Possible crimes in the case could include extortion, conspiracy, mail and wire fraud, honest-services fraud and tax crimes, the affidavit said.

Fumo's attorney said the two technicians were "unfortunate victims" of a campaign to bring down the powerful Philadelphia Democrat. "The government has made it clear that it will go to any length to get Senator Fumo," attorney Richard A. Sprague said.

Sprague said prosecutors stitched together "inaccurate and disputed facts" to draw a falsely sinister conclusion. He suggested the two men were merely following routine data-destruction procedures put in place years earlier.

Fumo, 63, who has served in the state Senate for 27 years, was not available for comment yesterday. Fumo "stands by his employees," Sprague said.

Fumo, who has not been charged with wrongdoing, is not named in the affidavit; he is referred to only as "the Senator." Details in the document make it clear that the senator is Fumo.

Defense lawyers for the two men said their clients have nothing to say to prosecutors. "They better come up with a better plan, if that's the plan," said Brian McMonagle, Eister's attorney.

Luchko, of Collingdale, and Eister, of Camp Hill, near Harrisburg, each face a maximum sentence of five years in prison if convicted. Luchko showed little emotion during a brief hearing yesterday. Eister appeared stunned. They were released on their own recognizance.

Luchko is paid $64,438 by the state. Eister makes $62,125. Both joined Fumo's large technical staff in the late 1990s.

As The Inquirer has reported, prosecutors in the investigation have sent a target letter to Ruth Arnao, a former top aide to Fumo who is executive director of Citizens' Alliance. In the parlance of federal prosecutors, a "target" refers to someone who is likely to be indicted.

In previous court hearings, prosecutors have alleged she, too, participated in the destruction of documents.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Robert A. Zauzmer and John Pease are leading the prosecution. Zauzmer said yesterday that the lost documents had taken a toll on the inquiry. "They haven't destroyed it, but we have to assume that valuable information was lost forever," he said.

The investigation began focusing on the corporate donations after The Inquirer reported in 2003 that Peco Energy Co. - engaged in negotiations with Fumo about deregulating electricity rates - had secretly given $17 million to Citizens' Alliance.

Fumo sought money from Verizon Communications at a time when he was backing away from a plan to break up the company. Verizon refused to contribute.

While federal authorities said they ultimately seized 84,000 e-mails during the probe, they said fewer than 125 pertained to Citizens' Alliance.

They said that this showed how pervasive were the deletions and computer wipes, using products with names like SecureClean and PGP Free Space.

How, then, did the prosecutors learn about the deletions?

According to prosecutors, the software experts failed to follow their own instructions and delete their own e-mails.

Prosecutors said they also recovered e-mails from "third-party" recipients, such as outside political consultants.

The affidavit was written by FBI agent Vicki Humphreys; she and agent Kathleen McAfee are the lead agents in the probe.

In the document, Humphreys repeatedly cites the publication dates of Inquirer articles - and then tracks deletions and system wipes that followed.

In November 2003, The Inquirer published its first investigative articles on the nonprofit.

The following month, the affidavit said, Luchko wrote in an e-mail that Fumo had "called me into his office today and told me to start going around and checking everyone's computer and make sure they were not saving his mail."

On Jan. 25, 2004, after The Inquirer reported the federal probe was under way, Luchko sent a mass e-mail to Fumo and staff saying Fumo had ordered tighter computer security.

"The FBI probe into the senator has really set him off," he wrote in another e-mail that night. "He wants us to start doing a number of security checks starting tomorrow... . He wants all of the Blackberries wiped... . S- has [definitely] hit the fan."

At one point, Luchko wrote: "He REALLY wants that mail gone." He added that if Fumo "goes [down], we all go down."

He also justified the deletions, saying the FBI was out to get Fumo. "I don't blame the senator. The FBI is really coming at him hard and he is innocent. I truly believe that or I wouldn't do this."

In 2004, the nonprofit turned over 10 boxes of records to the FBI in response to a subpoena - but "conspicuously" few e-mails, the affidavit says.

While arresting the two technicians, federal authorities have granted immunity to a third technician, Don Wilson, who is cooperating with the probe.

Wilson, identified in the affidavit only as Person No. 1, has told a grand jury that Fumo "knew that we were deleting" and was aware that evidence was being wiped from hard drives, the document says.

He said he would not have engaged in deletions without Fumo's "knowledge and blessing," the document says, though it provides no details.

White-collar defense lawyers called the arrests a textbook effort to pressure Eister and Luchko to cooperate in the probe.

Dan Richman, a former prosecutor who teaches at Fordham University Law School, called the level of detail in the affidavit "extraordinary."

"This seems to be a clear and very public demand for cooperation from the defendants, sooner rather than later," he said.

James C. Schwartzman, who represents Luchko, said his client did nothing wrong and would fight the charges. He questioned why prosecutors had opted to arrest Luchko at a home he shares with his elderly mother at 6 a.m. - when Schwartzman had offered to have him surrender if charges were filed.

Fumo has praised Citizens' Alliance for its work improving a business district in South Philadelphia and supporting a charter school. But Fumo allies have in the past sought to distance him from the nonprofit, pointing out that he holds no official position with it.

In fact, the affidavit states, Fumo was "directly involved in managing and controlling" the affairs of Citizens' Alliance. The document says authorities are investigating whether the charity illegally spent money on politics.

Among other actions, the affidavit said, Fumo directed that $25,000 of the charity's money be used for a Pittsburgh program that would "help garner political support for a politician there whom the senator supported."

The nonprofit also paid $250,000 for political polling, and, sources said, it spent $17,000 to secretly finance a lawsuit against a Fumo foe in the legislature.

Fumo has long been a dominant force in Harrisburg, renowned for his ability to build alliances - and his just-as-legendary feuds. During his years in politics, Fumo has been criminally charged twice. In 1973, he was charged with voter fraud, but the charges were later withdrawn.

In 1980, he was convicted on charges of placing "ghost employees" on the state legislative payroll, but a judge later tossed out the verdict.

As Pressure Mounted, A Scramble To 'Wipe' (PHI)

By Mario F. Cattabiani

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 1, 2006

As FBI agents dug deeper into Vince Fumo's world, the powerful state senator appeared to be feeling the pressure.

In June 2004, according to an FBI affidavit, Fumo e-mailed a top political consultant with a task: Find out what an attorney representing a utility was telling federal authorities.

The lawyer probably wouldn't talk because of attorney-client privilege, the consultant said. Fumo - long known for tight alliances and his tough temper - didn't like the answer.

"FRIENDS are supposed to help FRIENDS!!! Not give them that kind of bulls-!!!" Fumo e-mailed the consultant. "... Ask anyway, so that we will know if we have a future friend or an enemy in your current friend!!! There is no middle ground on this one!! You know how serious and almost life threatening this is... . We will never forget. One way or the other. And right now they owe us big time!!!"

Chock full of anxious e-mails and gritty politics, the FBI affidavit detailing the federal investigation into Fumo gives a previously unseen glimpse into the inner workings of the senator's office, staffed by a loyal and tight-lipped community that lived in fear of the lawmaker, as he lived in fear of prosecutors.

The document portrays Fumo as a politician who tracked the ongoing news coverage of the probe "minute by minute," and implemented changing security measures over two years.

BlackBerrys and servers were wiped clean with the latest software. So, too, were Fumo's computers, even those he kept at his two Shore homes, prosecutors said.

DOJ_NMG_0030966

In March 2004, Leonard Luchko - one of the aides charged yesterday - corresponded with an executive at the company that makes Pretty Good Privacy software. He wanted to know if someone could detect that the software had been used to delete files.

"[If] I wiped a computer and the next day someone confiscated would they be able to tell it was wiped at all?" he asked. Given the lack of data, it probably would be detected, the executive said.

"I can't help you... Lets hope they are not sophisticated enough to notice," the executive wrote back.

FBI forensic analysis showed, the affidavit said, that the program was run on the senator's office computer in Philadelphia two months later.

Don Wilson, one computer aide who was granted immunity, has told the grand jury that Fumo was concerned that the FBI might utilize "Carnivore," a surveillance program that could track all computer keystrokes.

He had his aides install software to neutralize that threat, the affidavit said.

The demands took their toll on his top computer aides, whom the affidavit depicts as feverishly trying to meet Fumo's increasing demands for security.

On Jan. 25, 2004, the day The Inquirer ran a front-page story on the federal probe, Luchko sent an e-mail to other Fumo staffers. It read "The FBI probe in the Senator has really set him off..."

Fumo had just requested all staff BlackBerrys be wiped clean. What's more, aides were to do a deep cleaning of all laptop computers, known as a "DOD" wipe, so-called because it uses the standards of the Department of Defense to ensure destruction of all files.

By June of that year, Luchko wrote his supervisor complaining "Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness."

Earlier, Luchko complained to another Fumo staffer who had not been deleting e-mails: "You really have to clean your mailbox up this is the kind of s- that can get us in trouble."

In an e-mail headed "venting," Luchko wrote to an unnamed staffer that Fumo "has us doing stuff that I know is going to come back and bite us in the a-... . I don't blame the Senator the FBI is really coming at him hard and he is innocent I truly believe that or I wouldn't do this..."

By February 2005, Luchko and Mark Eister - the other aide charged - had gotten cocky about their efforts. Luchko e-mailed Eister, saying he believed the FBI would try to lift e-mails from the computer of Ruth Arnao, a former Fumo aide and the director of the nonprofit Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods.

"Good Luck to them because they are going to need it," he wrote, adding in a subsequent e-mail: "They aren't getting s- off that PC..."

Feds: E-mail Deletions Were Obstruction (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 1, 2006

As the FBI ratcheted up the pressure on state Sen. Vince Fumo, his aides destroyed years worth of e-mails from his office computers, federal prosecutors charged yesterday.

Two state Senate computer-service employees were arrested at their homes early yesterday and charged with obstruction of justice in the ongoing federal probe of Fumo and a Fumo-backed community organization.

Leonard Luchko, 49, of Collingdale, who was assigned to Fumo's Tasker Street district office, and Mark Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, who worked in Harrisburg, allegedly destroyed e-mails and other electronic evidence in an attempt to thwart federal investigators.

Luchko and Eister deleted e-mails from computers in Fumo's Senate offices, from his Jersey shore house and from the Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, the FBI alleged in a 65-page affidavit.

Attorneys for Luchko and Eister said their clients had not committed any crimes and were simply doing their jobs.

The two men, wearing T-shirts and jeans, appeared before U.S. Magistrate Judge Charles P. Smith yesterday and were later released on bail and ordered not to talk with Fumo staffers or witnesses in the probe. Both men are due back in court next week.

James Schwartzman, an attorney for Luchko, said Luchko intends to fight the charges. Asked if he thought the feds were trying to get his client to cooperate with their investigation of Fumo, Schwartzman said: "I would say that's probably a good guess."

Eister's attorney, Brian McMonagle, said his client would be "going to trial and hopes he can meet a fair-minded jury that can tell the difference between a guy doing his job and a criminal conspirator."

Senate rules require staffers charged with crimes related to their jobs to be suspended without pay. It wasn't clear last night if either Luchko or Eister had been suspended. The charging papers for Luchko and Eister detail the lengths to which the two allegedly conspired to thwart the federal probe.

Luchko wrote an e-mail on Dec. 1, 2003, to 24 members of Fumo's staff, including Ruth Arnao, the executive director of Citizens Alliance, and sent a copy to Fumo. The e-mail told staffers they were not to save any e-mails to and from the senator under "ANY circumstance."

Arnao has received a letter from prosecutors identifying her as a target of the investigation.

Luchko also instructed staffers using BlackBerry devices to set up a time with him or a staffer identified as "Person No. 1" in the affidavit "so we can wipe them."

"Person No. 1" is Donald J. Wilson, a computer technician who works in Fumo's Tasker Street office, sources familiar with the probe said.

Wilson has been granted immunity from prosecution. He testified before the grand jury that Fumo "knew that we were deleting the mail out of people's accounts" and that the senator approved it.

Federal authorities declined to comment on Wilson.

Luchko also suggested that Fumo was preoccupied with keeping the FBI away from his e-mails, according to the charges.

In an e-mail to his supervisor in June 2004, Luchko wrote: "Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness. My life just got so complicated it isn't even funny and the killer is I can't tell anyone about it."

Fumo clearly felt the heat from FBI investigators.

In a June 8, 2004, e-mail, the affidavit states, Fumo asked a politcal consultant to try to find out from a utility-company attorney what the FBI was investigating. The consultant told him the lawyer probably would decline on attorney-client privilege grounds.

"Ask anyway so that we will know if we have a future friend or an enemy," Fumo wrote in one note. "There is no middle ground on this one!! You know how serious and almost life threatening this is."

Meanwhile, in Harrisburg, Eister allegedly was taking steps similar to Luchko's in Philadelphia.

In June 2004, he instructed all Fumo staff members in Harrisburg to delete e-mail to and from the senator.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said the campaign to erase the e-mails had created a "roadblock" for federal investigators.

Federal prosecutors, the FBI and the IRS have been investigating Fumo for more than three years to determine if he extorted payments from corporations on behalf of Citizens Alliance, and whether he benefited politically and personally from Citizens Alliance's spending practices.

Fumo has said that he did nothing wrong and that the donations were simply to help his district.

FUMO UNDER FIRE (PHI)

By Dave Davies

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 1, 2006

RICHARD NIXON was forced to resign the presidency in 1974 not because of the Watergate burglary, but because he participated in its coverup.

Martha Stewart went to jail in 2004 not for insider trading, but for misleading the FBI.

Could state Sen. Vince Fumo face a similar fate?

For three years, a sprawling grand jury investigation of Fumo has delved into yacht trips, property transactions and secret payments to a nonprofit community organization.

But the first charges in the case - against two Fumo aides yesterday - presented information that Fumo participated in a yearlong effort to hide and destroy information sought by the FBI.

Fumo was not charged, and his attorney, Richard Sprague, said in a prepared statement that the feds had presented "inaccurate and disputed facts" in their obstruction-of-justice case against the two low-level employees.

But the 65-page affidavit prosecutors made public yesterday could not have been comforting to Fumo, who predicted at a Harrisburg press lunch in March that the probe would "go nowhere."

There are numerous references to Fumo in the charges against Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, accused of waging a campaign to destroy e-mails and other electronic evidence after the FBI began looking at Fumo and Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a non-profit organization associated with Fumo.

"The FBI probe into the Senator has really set him off, he wants us to do a number of security checks..." Luchko wrote in a January 2004 e-mail.

"Boss is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness," he wrote at another point.

DOJ_NMG_0030968

If authorities hope to build an obstruction-of-justice case against Fumo, it would be far stronger if they had the testimony of Eister and Luchko, whose e-mails suggest they received instructions directly from Fumo.

The procedure used to charge the two may be specifically designed to put pressure on them and other Fumo associates to cooperate with investigators.

Eister and Luchko were charged not in an indictment, but in a criminal complaint, with an accompanying affidavit.

Two former prosecutors said that typically provides more information about an investigation than an indictment, since the affidavit must convince a magistrate to issue an arrest warrant.

"To a certain extent, that's a press release," said former federal prosecutor Dan Lyons.

"It may be a way of sending a message to other low-level people out there that it's time to start cooperating. It could put out the word that 'We're not going away, and we may be coming after you next,' " he said.

The affidavit mentions more than a dozen other people, without identifying them by name, who had contact with Fumo or the two aides on issues related to the charges.

In addition to presenting the obstruction-of-justice case, the affidavit makes it clear authorities have substantive information about Fumo and his relationship with Citizens Alliance.

Fumo secured a $17 million payment to Citizens Alliance from Peco Energy in connection with the settlement of a rate case.

The federal affidavit says the investigation focuses in part on "whether the Senator engaged in extortion" in extracting the contribution, and whether Citizens Alliance "spent money for the Senator's personal benefit and for political activities," violating its tax-exempt status.

Fumo has always denied any wrongdoing, and Sprague's statement yesterday said, "The government has made it clear it will go to any length to get Senator Fumo."

Citizens Alliance has long argued that it is not controlled by Fumo, but the affidavit cites 10 e-mails that "demonstrate that the Senator controls and directs" Citizens Alliance's "payments to persons and entities that are important to the Senator."

The affidavit says that in a series of e-mails in 2000 and 2001, Fumo directs Citizens Alliance to purchase properties in South Philadelphia and that "he instructs an aide that he alone would decide which properties are to be purchased..."

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan yesterday said, "We are going to diligently pursue this from this point forward, and I would suggest that we're not finished yet."

Among other areas of the FBI investigation:

· Why Citizens Alliance paid $17,000 to finance a lawsuit against state Sen. Robert Jubelirer, a Fumo foe, challenging Jubelirer's acting as lieutenant governor while holding his Senate seat. The suit was unsuccessful.

· Fumo's negotiations in 2002 with the Swedish furniture retailer Ikea over its effort to open in South Philadelphia.

· Why a subsidiary of Citizens Alliance paid $215,000 for political polling, then got reimbursement from a political-action committee after feds began looking into the organization's activities.

· Fumo's securing of state grants for the Independence Seaport Museum and his use of a luxury yacht owned by the musuem. Fumo eventually repaid the museum for use of the vessel.

FBI Arrests Fumo Aides (PTR)

By Richard Gazarik, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, June 1, 2006

A federal investigation appears to be targeting Democratic state Sen. Vincent Fumo, after a grand jury indicted two legislative aides for allegedly destroying evidence in an investigation of the 63-year-old politician.

A powerful Senate leader, Fumo has been a major political player in Harrisburg and Philadelphia for 28 years. He is the ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations Committee.

FBI agents on Wednesday arrested Mark Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, Dauphin County, and Leonard P. Luchko, 49, of Collingdale, Delaware County, charging them with obstructing justice in the systematic destruction of e-mails sent to and by Fumo.

They also are accused of electronically cleansing the hard drives of 17 computers and hand-held communication devices used by Fumo, his staff and employees of Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a Philadelphia nonprofit linked to Fumo that is at the center of the investigation.

Fumo's attorney, Richard A. Sprague, released a statement saying that an affidavit released by federal authorities took statements out of context and included inaccurate and disputed facts.

"The fat lady has not yet sung, and the arrests are not the end of the ball game," Sprague said. "These two individuals arrested today are unfortunately victims of the process of attempting to get the senator. Their trials will prove that."

The arrests follow the notification of former Fumo aide Ruth Arnao that she is a grand jury target for allegedly destroying e-mails. The FBI seized financial records of Citizens Alliance, where Arnao serves as executive director.

The government is investigating whether Fumo used Citizens Alliance for political and personal gain.

An unidentified grand jury witness, testifying under grant of immunity, said Fumo's aides discussed destroying communications in case the FBI seized computer hard drives. According to the indictment, Fumo feared "the FBI was going to show up" one day. Agents seized computers from Fumo's Philadelphia and Harrisburg offices in 2004.

Testimony indicated Fumo ordered Eister and Luchko to increase computer security, and personally ordered a computer system cleansing to erase incriminating e-mails. One e-mail shed light on Fumo's frame of mind.

"BOSS is driving us ALL nuts with this FBI madness," Luchko wrote.

In another e-mail, Luchko admitted deleting the e-mail to protect Fumo.

"I don't blame the Senator the FBI is really coming at him hard and he is innocent I truly believe that or I wouldn't do this...."

Luchko also accused the FBI of trying "to manufacture stuff so they can justify the many hours and money spent on a fruitless investigation."

Luchko then added: "Delete it after you read it."

The destruction of the e-mails spanned a 23-month period from 2003-05 and was undertaken, according to the indictment, to prevent incriminating material from falling into FBI hands.

Investigators also are looking into whether Fumo used his position as senator to extort payments from Philadelphia-area corporations on behalf of Citizens Alliance, long a recipient of Fumo's financial largesse.

The nonprofit received $17 million from Peco Energy Co. and $10 million from the Delaware River Authority in 2004 after Fumo brokered secret deals with the two organizations. Investigators are trying to determine whether the money was linked to Fumo's decision to drop a challenge to Peco's deregulation plan and merger with a Chicago-based utility. Fumo is a board member of the Delaware River Authority.

Citizens Alliance also received millions of taxpayers' dollars through Fumo's intercession from a legislative slush fund. Using public money, Citizens Alliance purchased a street sweeper to clean the streets in Fumo's neighborhood. The group also started a charter school and formed a corporation that has bought property worth millions in a section of South Philadelphia.

The FBI grew suspicious that someone in Fumo's employ was destroying evidence because agents examined 84,000 e-mails and recovered an "extremely limited amount" pertaining to the investigation of Fumo and Citizens Alliance.

"That confirms that the effort to destroy such communications was successful," said an FBI affidavit.

But by obtaining e-mails from third parties, the FBI recovered the deleted messages, "which demonstrates that the senator was directly involved in managing and controlling the affairs of (Citizens Alliance)."

Investigators believe Fumo also used the organization's money to help other politicians.

Citizens Alliance gave $25,000 to a "program in Pittsburgh that will help garner political support for a politician there, whom the senator has supported," the affidavit states. It does not name the politician.

Ex-Aide Left Out Details Of Ties To Lobbyist (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Three officials of the General Services Administration testified that a Bush administration executive left out important details about his relationship with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including information about a weeklong golf excursion to Scotland and England. Based on representations by the executive, David Safavian, the officials told a jury in Federal District Court in Washington that they approved the proposed trip for him and closed an investigation of the trip the year after it took place. Mr. Safavian, who was the chief of staff to the administrator of the G.S.A. at the time of the trip, is facing five counts of lying to investigators. Each of the three prosecution witnesses said they would have wanted to know from Mr. Safavian that at the time of the trip Mr. Abramoff was interested in two pieces of property controlled by the services administration.

Prosecution Nears End Of Case Against Safavian (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, June 1, 2006

A General Services Administration ethics official and the agency's former general counsel testified Wednesday in the trial of David Safavian, former Office of Management and Budget procurement policy chief, as the government neared the end of presenting its case on his involvement with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0030970

Eugenia Ellison, a lawyer who administers GSA's ethics program, testified that she handled then-chief of staff Safavian's request for an ethics opinion in order to join Abramoff and others on a golfing trip to Scotland in 2002. Safavian is charged with lying in the information submitted for that clearance, and with obstructing two later investigations into the matter.

Ellison described how she had reached the decision to clear Safavian's participation based on his description of the outing hosted by Abramoff, a friend and former colleague, as a four-day golfing expedition in which Safavian would pay all costs associated with meals, hotels and greens fees. Airfare, Safavian indicated, was being provided by Abramoff on a private jet, and none of the eight people on the trip would be contributing to cover that cost.

Safavian also indicated that Abramoff had no business before GSA.

Ellison said she approved the gift of airfare for the trip because Abramoff was an old friend of Safavian's and because of Safavian's attestation that the lobbyist worked only on Capitol Hill, which together meant that Abramoff was not a "prohibited source" according to federal regulations.

In a barrage of questions from Justice Department lawyer Nathaniel Edmonds, Ellison indicated she had been unaware that Abramoff was at the time seeking to lease GSA-controlled land in White Oak, Md., for a school he had founded, that he had expressed interest in the GSA-controlled Old Post Office Pavilion in downtown Washington, D.C., and that he had sought to influence GSA policy regarding the consideration of Indian tribes under a classification of disadvantaged businesses.

Ellison said had she known those things at the time, they could have influenced the outcome of the ethics decision.

An official ethics decision, if based on a full and accurate disclosure of relevant facts by the requesting individual, provides a "safe harbor" protection for that person if a subsequent investigation shows that government regulations were not properly followed. Ellison indicated that agency ethics opinions cannot grant such immunity if a criminal infraction is found, but the Justice Department can take into consideration that professional ethical advice had been sought.

Raymond McKenna, GSA's general counsel and the person who formally issued the opinion researched and drafted by Ellison, testified that after the opinion had been issued, Safavian indicated in private conversation that he had decided to pay the cost of the airfare. Safavian eventually paid $3,100 for the trip, far short of his share of a trip estimated to total $140,000.

Questioned as to whether Abramoff's activities with respect to the Old Post Office would have been relevant to whether he was a "prohibited source" for gifts, McKenna said, "The legal advice would have been incomplete, at the very least," without that information.

Neither McKenna nor Ellison recalled a conversation with Safavian to probe for further details on the trip beyond what Safavian had initially provided in his written request for an opinion, but both said such a conversation would have been required based on questions that arose from his initial communication, and it was clear from the opinion ultimately issued that some such communication had taken place.

In questioning, Safavian's lawyer suggested that Ellison may have inadvertently added a short clause -- that Abramoff was not "seeking to do business" with GSA -- to Safavian's statements in the course of writing the ethics opinion. Some have interpreted this more expansive language as lending support to the prosecution's argument that Safavian misled federal and Senate investigators.

Wednesday's witnesses came on the heels of a Tuesday appearance by Neil Volz, former chief of staff to Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio. Volz is a key Justice Department witness, having pleaded guilty to charges that he deprived the public of his honest services. He is cooperating in government investigations in hopes of reducing a possible five-year jail term.

Prosecutors intended to call two additional witnesses, investigators with the Senate and the GSA inspector general's office, to round out their case before Safavian's lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, begins her defense.

At Safavian Trial, You Can't Tell The Players Without A Scorecard (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Fore!

The way things are going at the David Safavian trial this week, don't be surprised if, in the coming days, a golf cart bursts into Courtroom 29A of the federal courthouse and a pair of Scotsmen ask if they can play through.

"A lot of discussion in this case is about golf," defense lawyer Barbara Van Gelder observed as she cross-examined an FBI agent in the case, the first trial in the sprawling Jack Abramoff bribery scandal.

"That is correct," replied the agent, Jeffrey Reising.

That is also a whopping understatement. Officially, Safavian, a former senior Bush administration official, is on trial for accepting favors from Abramoff while helping the lobbyist penetrate the General Services Administration -- and then lying about it to investigators. But the case is as much about well-tended greens as ill-gotten green: the twosome's obsessive golfing friendship, particularly a lavish golfing trip to Scotland's St. Andrews in 2002 on Abramoff's tab.

Stephen Perry, a former GSA administrator, was called to the stand. "Do you play golf?" queried prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg.

"I don't know if you could really call it golfing," Perry replied, admitting that he played with Safavian at Andrews Air Force Base.

"You played golf with Mr. Abramoff?" the prosecutor wanted to know.

"Yes," the witness admitted, though he said he thought they were only put in the same foursome by "coincidence."

"Nine holes or 18?" Zeidenberg pressed.

"Eighteen," Perry confessed.

The FBI's Reising had to answer a similar line of questioning. "Do you recall what Mr. Safavian's handicap was?" Zeidenberg queried.

"Twenty-three."

Zeidenberg mentioned that Abramoff listed Safavian's handicap and that of fellow golfer Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) as only 18.

"I don't recall what Jack Abramoff reported to the Old Course about what Congressman Ney's handicap was," the earnest agent replied.

When Neil Volz, the felonious former Ney chief of staff, took the stand, the trial turned into a slide show from the Scotland trip. Ney narrated: "That's myself and David. . . . This is on kind of a famous bridge before the 18th hole. . . . We are in front of the clubhouse. People watch you play golf and it ruins your game."

Prosecutor Nathaniel Edmonds flashed a picture of the legendary St. Andrews rough. "This is more a picture of the grass," Volz testified.

"Why did you take that photo?" Edmonds inquired.

"Because I probably lost 17 or 18 balls in the grass."

Edmonds established that each round of golf was about $400 per person. "Did you ever see [Safavian] pay greens fees or tip the caddy?"

"I did not," the witness said.

A thick stack of e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian -- which prosecutors have used to demonstrate Safavian's aid to Abramoff as he tried to acquire GSA properties -- also describes a golfing partnership in which regular rounds during the workday were par for the course.

"Can't pull weekday golf until I'm a bit more ensconced as chief of staff," Safavian writes.

"Loser!" Abramoff replies. "I told you to come with me and not the gov!! You'd be playing golf non-stop."

"I can't seem to find the golf cart I lent you," Abramoff says in one e-mail.

"Jack," writes Safavian. "My handicap is a 23. My home course is Springfield Golf and Country Club in Springfield, Virginia. Do you want to try to play Sunday morning or late afternoon?"

"Want to see the new clubhouse at Woodmore?" Abramoff offers.

"Do you want me to see if Steve Perry wants to join you?" Safavian wants to know.

In July, 2002, Abramoff sends Safavian a blank e-mail with the subject line "Golf Friday? Golf Monday? Golf Sunday? Golf golf golf!!!"

"CAN YOU THINK OF A FOURTH?" Safavian asks Abramoff hours before a round in August.

Finally, the men were ready for a change. "Want to go to the Redskins game on Sunday?" Abramoff offered. Safavian countered with a racquetball- and-lunch proposal.

The winter came and Abramoff made Safavian another offer. "I'll be in Florida for the Nickles tournament. (Join me?)"

"I am a hard working civil servant," Safavian replied, "and I have the people's business to do."

Fortunately, the people did not ask him to play golf. For all his practice, his 23 handicap ranks him as a confirmed duffer. This complicated the case for defense lawyer Van Gelder, who is trying to argue that "David was just a golfing guy," not a crooked official.

The endless talk about faraway fairways seems to have teed off the jurors. Yesterday, the judge dismissed juror No. 13, who was a no-show. Juror No. 3 was losing a battle with sleep. But the lawyers pressed on, quizzing GSA official Eugenia Ellison for hours about the ethics of the Scotland golf trip.

She read from Safavian's e-mails seeking permission to take the trip. "I . . . have been invited by a friend and former colleague on a trip to Scotland to play golf for four days," Ellison read. "I will be paying for all my hotels, meals and greens fees."

But Safavian didn't, and now he's in big trouble. Or, as they might say on the Old Course, he's lying triple bogey in the bunker with a large water hazard before the green.

Prosecutors: Dixon Had Extorted Before Waltz (TENN)

By BONNA De La CRUZ, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, June 1, 2006

His defense attorneys say he was entrapped, but prosecutors said Tennessee Waltz defendant Roscoe Dixon had previously extorted money from a business wanting to take part in TennCare.

A Memphis Democrat, the former state senator is the first of the original defendants from the Operation Tennessee Waltz bribery sting to go to trial. His case is being heard in federal court in Memphis.

In his opening statement, Dixon's attorney Coleman Garrett said the proof will show Dixon was entrapped by the government.

"At the end of this case, the question will be whether the government induced the defendant to commit criminal acts he was not predisposed to commit," Garrett said.

In creating the fake company E-Cycle, which was run by undercover FBI agents, the government in turn created the conspiracy, Garrett said.

Conversely, prosecutors outlined their case that Dixon willingly took bribes.

Dixon and alleged "bagman" Barry Myers, who has already pleaded guilty, figured they could pull off extorting money from E-Cycle in part because of its wealth, "but they were really certain they could pull it off because they had done it before," Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza said.

The two men had previously demanded and received payment from government informant Tim Willis for a legitimate company he worked for, called Children's Dental Clinic, to be credentialed into TennCare, DiScenza said.

Willis had been motivated to help the FBI in part because he had been found to have fabricated invoices while working for the Shelby County Juvenile Court clerk's office, the prosecutor said.

Prosecution: Dixon Feared Getting Caught; Defense: E-Cycle Is True Criminal (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 1, 2006

Federal prosecutors today told a federal court jury that former state senator Roscoe Dixon is "a pretty wily character" who used a middle man to help distance himself from illegal payoffs to avoid getting caught.

Dixon, 56, is charged with conspiracy, extortion and bribery in an undercover FBI operation known as the Tennessee Waltz. His defense attorney told jurors the case was built on entrapment and that Dixon had served his constitutuents honorably for 22 years.

The two-year investigation resulted in the indictments of 10 people, including five present or former state lawmakers.

Federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza told jurors Dixon and his associate, Barry Myers, thought a fictitious company named E-Cycle Management Inc. was a well-heeled business that needed "political juice" to be successful in Tennessee. He said Dixon and Myers made up a criminal partnership intent on using Dixon's position to make money without getting caught.

"What they didn't know was that E-Cycle management was an FBI operation," the prosecutor said. "Mr. Dixon was a pretty wily character. As Barry Myers described him, he was paranoid about getting caught."

Dixon is accused of accepting $9,500 in payoffs in exchange for promoting legislation favorable to the bogus computer recycling company.

Myers has pleaded guilty and is expected to testify in the trial.

Defense attorney Coleman Garrett said it was E-Cycle that was a "criminal element." He said the government set up a business to entrap certain people, including Dixon, and that the proof will be that E-Cycle ought to be the defendant in the case.

Garrett called the FBI informants, including political broker Tim Willis, "a pack of con men."

He said the government didn't investigate corruption, they created it, and at the end of the trial, the jury will be thinking that Dixon should be suing the government for malicious prosecution.

Prosecutors played audio and video recordings made in 2003 involving Dixon, Myers and Willis discussing payments Dixon would need to help get a children's dental clinic into the TennCare program. Willis was hired as a lobbyist for the clinic.

In one secretly made videotape on July 8, 2003, in Dixon's Memphis office on Pillow Street, Willis hands Myers a stack of cash with Dixon behind his desk in the near background. FBI agent Brian Burns said he had given Willis $4,000 before the meeting to be used in gaining Dixon's support as chairman of the TennCare Oversight Committee.

In an effort to deflate the defense claims of entrapment, prosecutors said the tapes show Dixon was predisposed to criminal behavior before he was investigated and charged in the Tennessee Waltz public corruption investigation.

Trial Begins For Tenn. Lawmaker (NYT/AP)

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) -- A former state senator thought he could get away with taking bribes because he had done it before, a prosecutor told jurors Wednesday.

The defense countered during opening statements that former Roscoe Dixon was snagged by overzealous government agents and set up by "a pack of con men ... trying to save their own hides from going to jail."

Dixon is one of five current or former state lawmakers charged in a bribery and extortion sting called Tennessee Waltz. He is the first of the five to go to trial, although a former House member pleaded guilty and is in prison.

Barry Myers, whom prosecutors called a "bag man" for Dixon, testified Wednesday that Dixon took bribes for legislative favors but insisted on someone else handling the money.

"Sen. Dixon has always been cautious," Myers said.

Myers is awaiting sentencing on a guilty plea to passing along bribes from undercover FBI agents to Dixon and state Sen. Kathryn Bowers, who is also charged.

Also Wednesday, a secretly recorded video showing a meeting between Dixon and Myers and government informant Tim Willis was played for the jury. In the video, Willis hands $4,000 in cash to Myers and then talks to Dixon about needing help winning state certification for dental clinics for children on TennCare, the state's medical program for the poor and uninsured.

Dixon promises to help but does not touch the money.

"After the meeting was over, we split it," Myers testified.

The meeting in Dixon's office in Memphis in 2003 was part of an investigation into TennCare contracts. Parts of that investigation were rolled into Tennessee Waltz, a probe that began in 2004 and focused on a bogus company, E-Cycle Management, that was set up by the FBI.

Dixon is charged with pressing E-Cycle representatives for $9,500 in bribes handled for him by Myers. Dixon was not charged in the dental clinic investigation.

Breaking News: Defense Attorneys Say Dixon Entrapped In Bribery Sting (CHATTFP)

By Andy Sher, Nashville Bureau
Chattanooga Times Free Press, June 1, 2006

MEMPHIS — Attorneys for former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon portrayed the Tennessee Waltz defendant today as a victim of politically motivated entrapment, but prosecutors said Mr. Dixon previously took bribes to help a company seeking TennCare business.

Opening statements and initial testimony painted two very different pictures of Mr. Dixon, 56, who is one of nine persons charged in the FBI's bribery sting unveiled a year ago.

Defense attorney Coleman Garrett told jurors in his opening statement that FBI agents and the FBI-created company E-Cycle Management Inc., which agents used in the cash-for-favors sting, really were the "main conspirator" and not his client.

"E-Cycle was a criminal enterprise created, concocted and conceived by the federal government .. for the specific purpose of entrapping certain political figures," Mr. Garrett said.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza told jurors the government entrapped no one. He said then-Sen. Dixon and his "protege," alleged "bagman" Barry Myers, were "pretty sure they would be able to pull this off. They were really certain they could pull it off because they had done it before."

He said then-Sen. Dixon took bribes from FBI informant Timothy Willis to help Forba LLC, which was doing business in Tennessee as Children's Dental Inc. Forba was a real company and Mr. Willis their duly registered lobbyist.

But Forba officials knew nothing about the bribes, Mr. DiScenza said. Uncomfortable with the setup, the FBI then went and created E-Cycle Management, through which undercover agents allegedly offered Mr. Dixon $9,500 in bribes to help with an electronic equipment recycling bill, he said.

Secretly Taped Video Used In Dixon Trial (WMC-TV)

WMC-TV, June 1, 2006

The secretly taped video dates back to July 2003, way before Operation Tennessee Waltz rocked Tennessee politics. Prosecutors say it shows another corruption scheme playing out with Roscoe Dixon front and center.

"This is a fight over money and who gets it," Dixon is heard saying on the tape.

At the time, Dixon was a state senator and chairman of the TennCare Oversight Committee. The tape allegedly shows him accepting cash from FBI informant Tim Willis through confessed bagman Barry Myers. Willis was a lobbyist for a children's dental clinic operated out of this Memphis building. Prosecutors say he paid off Dixon in order to get the clinic into the TennCare program.

"I don't want to take the lead, but I will vote for it," Dixon says on the tape.

"The prosecutor will do his job and I'll do mine to the best of my ability," Dixon's attorney, Coleman Garrett, said during a break on Wednesday.

Garrett was counting on an entrapment defense for Dixon, arguing in opening statements that the government didn't investigate corruption, they created it.

But the government believes the videotape, along with audio recordings, prove Roscoe Dixon's predisposition to criminal behavior.

Operation TN Waltz: Former State Senator's Trial Starts (WPTY-TV)

WPTY-TV, June 1, 2006

Eyewitness News is in the federal courtroom Wednesday as opening statement begin in the trial of former state Senator Roscoe Dixon.

The jury was seated yesterday.

The trial is the first as part of the Operation Tennessee Waltz sting by the FBI last year.

Dixon is accused of taking $9500 in bribes from FBI agents. The agents were working undercover posing as lobbyistis for E-Cycle, a computer recycling company.

Dixon was a senator for a Memphis district for 22 years before he resigned in 2005. Five current or former lawmakers were charged in the case. Ward Crutchfield of Chattanooga and Kathryn Bowers of Memphis are still in the Senate and have pleaded not guilty. Memphis' John Ford resigned from the Senate after he was arrested and has also pleaded not guilty. Chris Newton from East Tennessee pleaded guilty and resigned from the TN House. He is now in prison serving a one-year sentence.

In court today, the prosecution played audio and video tapes. The tapes were recorded by FBI informant Tim Willis. Many of the recordings, had to do with Willis and Barry Myers talking about how much money it would cost, and what lawmakers they needed to support a proposal to a company called Childrens Dental Clinic approved by the state. On one of the tapes, Dixon was in the room when the money changed hands.The Childrens Dental Clinic sitution was the precurser to the Tennessee Waltz Investigation

State Senator Claims FBI Entrapped Him (WTVF-TV)

WTVF-TV, June 1, 2006

A state senator accused of accepting a bribe said Wednesday he was the victim of entrapment.

Wednesday was the first day in the trail against Roscoe Dixon. He claimed the FBI entrapped him into taking $9,500, but prosecutors unveiled a big surprise when they claimed Dixon had taken bribes before.

“I don’t have any comment,” Dixon said after court.

Federal prosecutors said in court that the whole investigation known as Operation Tennessee Waltz started by accident with an investigation into bribes at the criminal court clerk’s office in Memphis.

Prosecutors played a tape Wednesday in which a friend and employee of Roscoe Dixon spoke with lobbyist Tim Willis. Willis was working for the FBI to pay thousands of dollars to Dixon and other lawmakers so a Memphis dental clinic could get credentials through TennCare.

Prosecutors played tapes of Willis giving $4,000 to Barry Myers who gave the money to Dixon and Sen. Kathryn Bowers, who was also charged. Bowers and Dixon were on the TennCare oversight committee at the time.

Dixon’s defense attorney said the FBI entrapped him by getting him to do something he would not normally do. He acknowledged there will be many hours of videotapes for jurors to watch.

“I expect to see all the tapes,” Dixon defense attorney Coleman Garrett said.

Prison For John Daley Kin In Bribe Scandal (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 1, 2006

A brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley who has admitted to taking bribes to steer city business to a politically connected trucking firm was sentenced to 18 months in prison Wednesday.

John Briatta, 46, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle, who said he wanted the punishment to send a message to others in government that such corruption will not be tolerated.

Norgle rejected a bid by Briatta's attorneys to have him sentenced to 5 months in prison and 5 months of home confinement, saying he only breached the public trust after suffering gambling and other financial losses

"To have Mr. Briatta hanging around and watching the Cubs or Sox from his home" is not what the sentence should be about, Norgle said.

Any city official involved in taking bribes "must understand that he is going to prison," the judge said. Norgle could have sentenced Briatta to more than 2 years in prison under federal guidelines, but said he thought 18 months was fair.

Briatta, a former dispatcher in the city's Water Management Department, had pleaded guilty in February to taking at least $5,400 in bribes in 2003. He was the first defendant to plead guilty to a January corruption indictment that also charged Chicago City Clerk James Laski, who has since pleaded guilty.

Briatta accepted the bribes from Michael "Mick" Jones, the owner of the Get Plowed Inc. trucking company and a friend of Laski's. In exchange, Briatta helped the company get city work through Donald Tomczak, then second in command in the Water Management Department. Tomczak and Jones have also pleaded guilty in connection with the federal probe.

The sentence came after Briatta apologized to the court for his actions. He said he never thought his conduct would affect the number of people that it has.

"I'd like to apologize to all the citizens of Chicago and the mayor," Briatta said. Briatta's brother-in-law, John Daley, is the brother of Mayor Richard Daley.

Asked about the sentence Wednesday, Mayor Daley replied, "It's very sad. You take money, you are going to get caught. Simple as that."

A reporter told Daley of Briatta's apology and suggested it came from a member of the mayor's "family circle."

"It's not my family circle," Daley said, but "you accept anybody's apology."

Briatta's lawyer, Theodore Poulos, had painted Briatta as a "kind and decent man" and a devout Catholic whose first priority is his children, a 14-year-old girl and an 11-year-old boy. Briatta often travels with his daughter to volleyball tournaments, Poulos said.

Briatta told the court the hardest part about prison would be his inability to see his children.

"I just pray that my sentence is not that long where I can get back to them and start a future," he said.

Poulos said Briatta slipped into taking the bribes because of mounting gambling losses, and he also began getting loans from family and friends. Prosecutors said one of those loans came from George Prado, another former water department worker who is facing federal charges for allegedly heading a local heroin-trafficking ring.

The judge noted Briatta's gambling woes as he handed down the sentence.

"He had the need for money to spend on gambling," the judge said. "And as all gamblers seem to find out, in the long run, you lose. And certainly Mr. Briatta is the loser here."

Assistant U.S. Atty. Manish Shah acknowledged the defendant's gambling habit and said that Briatta may have agreed to accept bribes in a moment of weakness.

"But that's how corruption succeeds, and that is why it needs to be punished severely," Shah said.

City Worker With Ties To Mayor Gets 18 Months In Trucking Scandal (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, June 1, 2006

CHICAGO - A former city worker with ties to Mayor Richard M. Daley's brother was sentenced Wednesday to 18 months in federal prison for taking $5,000 in payoffs to get a private company hauling jobs in Chicago's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program.

John Briatta, 46, was more than $87,000 in debt due to out-of-control gambling and one of his creditors was a fellow former city employee now charged with masterminding a heroin ring, defense attorneys said at the sentencing before U.S. District Judge Charles R. Norgle Sr.

"I take responsibility for my actions, I knew better than to take bribes," Briatta said in a letter to Norgle that the judge read in court. "I was weak. Not a day goes by that I don't think back to my terrible decisions and wish that I could turn back the hands of time to undo them."

It was the latest development in a three-year scandal that has rocked City Hall and brought allegations of corruption to the mayor's doorstep. His former patronage director and three other men are on trial, charged with mail fraud involving the city's hiring practices.

Norgle could have sentenced Briatta to as much as 30 months but said 18 was fair.

Briatta, a former water department truck dispatcher, acknowledged that he accepted the money from another city employee, Randy Aderman, who has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Aderman was delivering the cash on behalf of Get Plowed Inc., a company that averaged $100,000 a year in payments from the trucking program before the federal government cracked down on it three years ago at the start of the City Hall corruption investigation.

Get Plowed was owned by a former city official who also has pleaded guilty in the case.

Briatta said he accepted payoffs from Aderman knowing that his boss, the first deputy water commissioner at the time, Donald Tomczak, would put trucks in the program on his say-so.

Tomczak has pleaded guilty to racketeering and other charges for taking Hired Truck Program payoffs. But there is no allegation that Tomczak got any of the money Aderman paid to Briatta.

Tomczak is a former precinct captain in the 11th Ward where the mayor's brother, Cook County Commissioner John Daley, heads the Democratic Party. Briatta's sister is married to John Daley.

"Mr. Briatta is incredibly embarrassed and ashamed that he engaged in conduct that gave the press a chance to mention his brother-in-law's name every time it came up," Briatta defense attorney Theodore T. Poulos told reporters after the sentencing.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Manish Shah told Norgle that among those who had loaned money to Briatta was George Prado, 47, one of Briatta's fellow former water department employees. Prado is now charged with heading a Colombian heroin ring operating in Chicago.

Prado has pleaded not guilty to the charges, which include money laundering.

Poulos said Prado apparently believed that if he loaned money to Briatta he might receive a promotion or a better assignment with the city but that Briatta never saw the loan that way.

City Worker With Ties To Mayor Gets 18 Months In Trucking Scandal (WLS-TV)

By Andy Shaw

WLS-TV, June 1, 2006

A member of the Daley family was sentenced Wednesday for his role in the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program. John Briatta, the brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley, is going to prison for 18 months for taking $5,000 in bribes.

John Briatta, 46, is the only member of the Daley family implicated in the hired truck scandal. He apparently resisted the temptation of the hired truck scandal for years, but under the pressure of skyrocketing gambling debts, he finally gave in and took payoffs to help a company get hauling business. As a result, he is going to prison for 18 months.

Briatta's sentence could have been a lot longer if he hadn't apologized profusely to everyone -- including the city, the taxpayers and the Daleys.

"I take responsibility for my actions, I knew better than to take bribes," Briatta said in a letter to Norgle that the judge read in court. "I was weak. Not a day goes by that I don't think back to my terrible decisions and wish that I could turn back the hands of time to undo them."

"His brother had nothing to do with this. Mr. Briatta is really ashamed and embarrassed and quite devastated about the fact that he did anything that tarnished it," said Ted Poulos, John Briatta's Attorney.

"Very sad. You take money you are going to get caught," said Mayor Richard Daley. "It's not my family circle."

Briatta took the payoffs three years ago to help a friend of former City Clerk Jim Laski get business for his trucking company. Briatta needed the money to pay off mounting gambling debts. But, according to his attorney, he resisted offers by his boss in the water department -- Donald Tomczak -- to play a much bigger role in the hired truck payoffs. That, along with a guilty plea, heartfelt apologies and letters of support from friends and associates, persuaded Judge Charles Norgle to impose a sentence of 18 months when it could have been a year longer.

Norgle says a shorter sentence would deprecate the seriousness of the offense and not serve as a deterrent to others. The judge says that despite the relative leniency, "Mr. Briatta is certainly a big loser here."

Briatta still has nearly a $100,000 in gambling debts, so the judge didn't impose a heavy fine or restitution order beyond having to return the $5,000 in payoff money and to stop smoking marijuana, which turned up in a post-indictment drug test.

John Daley had no comment on Wednesday, except to say that Briatta's apology speaks for itself.

John Daley's Brother-in-law Heading To Prison (CHIST)

By Steve Warmbir, Staff Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, June 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030977

The brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley was sentenced to 18 months in prison Wednesday for taking about $5,400 in bribes to steer city business to a Hired Truck company.

The brother-in-law, John Briatta, 46, also took loans totaling $20,000 from a man accused of running a heroin ring. George Prado worked in the city's Water Management Department with Briatta and has been accused of threatening to kill a drug courier, according to a federal prosecutor and court records.

Prado told investigators he would have forgiven the loans if Briatta had helped him get a promotion. But there was no indication Prado ever told that to Briatta. Prado is expected to plead guilty in his case, which is separate from Briatta's. Briatta did not know Prado allegedly ran a heroin ring, said Briatta's attorney, Ted Poulos.

Briatta, who pleaded guilty to bribery, had to borrow the money from Prado and others because a gambling addiction plunged him into financial chaos, Poulos said.

"As all gamblers seem to find out, eventually, you lose," U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle said before sentencing Briatta. "And certainly Mr. Briatta is a big loser here."

Norgle, though, gave Briatta a break. Federal guidelines suggest Briatta be sentenced to at least two years in prison.

Briatta was "incredibly embarrassed and ashamed" for his actions, Poulos said.

Mayor: Apology accepted

"I'd like to apologize to all the citizens of Chicago and the mayor," said Briatta, a devout Catholic, who also thanked his family and friends for their support. Among the family members sitting in the courtroom was John Daley's wife, Mary Lou, who is Briatta's sister.

In a letter to the judge, Briatta was particularly sorry for the shame his actions caused John Daley, whom he has been close to since they were teens.

Daley "did nothing to deserve this negative attention, and I have apologized many times to him and my sister," Briatta wrote.

Briatta asked the judge for a shorter prison sentence so he could return to his children.

Briatta took the bribes while he worked for the Water Department from June to December 2003, at the urging of Donald Tomczak, who ran the department day to day. Tomczak decided which trucking companies got Hired Truck work. Tomczak pleaded guilty and admitted taking bribes himself.

Briatta took money from a trucking company tied to friends of former city Clerk James Laski. Briatta then used his influence to get that trucking company city work.

John Daley had no comment Wednesday other than to say Briatta's "statement speaks for itself."

Mayor Daley, John Daley's brother, said: "It's very sad. If you take money, you're gonna get caught. Simple as that."

But the mayor said, "You accept anybody's apology."

Witness Describes City Jobs Scheme (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki And Steve Warmbir, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 1, 2006

A key witness in the City Hall hiring trial testified Wednesday he used a political army largely made up of city workers to volunteer in various Democratic campaigns, then asked Mayor Daley's patronage chief to reward them with city jobs and promotions.

Daniel Katalinic, the highest-profile witness to testify yet in the trial that's in its third week, said Robert Sorich, a former top official in the Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, told him to which political races he should deploy his volunteers. He also said Daley's former campaign manager, Greg Goldner, doled out similar orders.

In return, Katalinic would hand Sorich a list of people he'd want hired or promoted in city positions, he testified.

"I just made it clear . . . with the people helping and volunteering, I would need help with hiring and promotions," Katalinic said he told Sorich.

Sorich told him: "He'd do what he could," Katalinic said.

Organization grew to nearly 300

If Katalinic had a tough time getting hold of Sorich, he'd hand lists to Sorich's assistant, Timothy McCarthy.

While in Sorich's office in 2000, Sorich allegedly told Katalinic to rank his troops "in the order of importance as far as political importance in the organization."

Sorich and McCarthy, who used to work in IGA, are on trial with two others -- Patrick Slattery and John Sullivan -- accused of rigging the city's hiring system to reward politically backed candidates with jobs and promotions. Katalinic worked with the city for 33 years, most recently as deputy commissioner of street operations, before retiring in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0030978

Katalinic said his campaign organization started small but eventually grew to nearly 300 people who worked on many campaigns, from that of U.S. Rep. Rahm Emanuel to state Sen. Susan Garrett. Nearly all of the group were Streets and Sanitation workers or people trying to land city jobs, Katalinic said.

$15,000 from 'Quarters' Boyle

Katalinic was charged along with the four men now on trial but pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud and agreed to cooperate. As part of his deal, he could get a year and a day in prison rather than about 30 months. Katalinic admitted taking $15,000 in bribes from another former city worker, John "Quarters" Boyle, in the Hired Truck Program.

Katalinic's group merged in 2001 with the Coalition for Better Government. Katalinic said Sorich was well-aware of the groups and sought to keep discussions under the radar screen.

Sorich specifically told Katalinic to keep other political coordinators, including operative Dominic Longo of the coalition, out of the discussions, saying Longo brought "too much heat" with him.

Longo, speaking for the coalition, said Wednesday: "We were in existence before all these people were around, and God willing, we'll be here after this is all over."

Earlier Wednesday, Steve Bylina, the former deputy commissioner for the city's Bureau of Forestry, testified that he regularly rigged tests so pre-selected candidates won city jobs. Bylina said he got the lists of names from Streets and Sanitation's director of personnel, Jack Drumgould, and Sullivan. He said Sullivan once handed him a list and told him: "These are my guys."

Bylina told Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins that the interviews didn't matter for those on the lists; they always got the jobs.

Daley: Skyway Allegations 'Silly, Silly, Silly, Silly' (CHIT)

By Gary Washburn, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 1, 2006

Mayor Richard Daley seemed intent on personally opening up the summer "silly season" of frivolous news stories Wednesday.

Court testimony this week that Chicago Skyway tollbooths were fully staffed to help ensure an unimpeded ride to his Michigan summer home was, well, "silly," the mayor said.

Then he said it again. About 20 times.

"Silliest thing I ever heard in my life," the mayor declared. "It really is silly.... It's silly, silly, silly, silly."

When asked whether he was referring to the allegation or to a fact that underlings would seek to smooth the way for him, Daley provided more of the same.

"It is silly," he said. "It is just silly. Silliness. That is all it is ... completely silly, completely silly."

Asked the same question by another reporter, this one bereft of cranial hair, Daley declared, "It's silly, Baldheaded. He's baldheaded. Is that silly? No. Come on. I mean it's the silliest thing I ever heard. Next question."

Jacquelyn Heard, Daley's press secretary, later said that Daley was referring to the suggestion that a way through congestion could be cleared for him.

"He is caught in traffic more times than I can count," she said. "I have been on the phone with him, going through memos and press interview requests and what have you, while he bides his time in traffic."

Wednesday's comments were just the latest illustration of the mayor's ability, on any given day, to take his listeners on a verbal fun house ride.

After Neil Hartigan was defeated in the race for governor in 1990, Daley was asked if the mayor had done enough to support the candidate.

"What else do you want me to do ... unless I take my pants off?" was the retort.

Daley's remarks on Aug. 28, 2001, may never be carved in granite, but they long will be remembered by those who were present. William Daley had announced that he would not run for governor, and the mayor told reporters that his younger brother "definitely" would have been victorious in a Democratic primary that ultimately was won by Rod Blagojevich.

So far, so good.

But when a reporter suggested that his brother's decision would spare the Daley family an extended period of intense scrutiny, the mayor exploded.

"Scrutiny? What else do you want? Do you want to take my shorts? Give me a break."

Duly warmed up, the mayor continued, "How much scrutiny do you want to have? Go scrutinize yourself. I get scrootened every day, don't worry, from each and every one of you. It doesn't bother me."

DOJ_NMG_0030979

Commenting on a national day of prayer a few years back, Daley said, "I pray every day. People pray every day. That is personal. You can pray every day. A moment of silence is prayer. Just thinking about your family. Thinking about making a better world, making a better environment.

"There is nothing wrong with that," Daley continued. "There is nothing wrong with prayer in different ways. It doesn't have [to be] religious."

Then there is the occasional—all right, maybe a little more than occasional—mispronunciation.

Not long after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Daley appeared amused when he was asked about the report of a suspicious substance on a Northwest Side street that turned out to be guacamole.

"Glacamole!" he declared. "No, I like glacamole. Glacamole is not dangerous. It's very good for you."

Documents Contradict Ill. Gov. Statements (WP)

By John O'connor

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. -- Gov. Rod Blagojevich's office reviewed and approved the hiring of state employees for hundreds of routine jobs such as highway workers and plumbers, according to documents.

The hiring lists, obtained by The Associated Press, contradict the governor's statements that his office did not decide who would be hired for civil service jobs. Such hirings are to be based solely on merit.

For years, the Democratic governor has been dogged by allegations _ which he adamantly denies _ that he hands out state jobs to campaign donors and political allies.

His hiring practices are under investigation by federal, state and local prosecutors. Though Blagojevich has not been charged with any crime, he has acknowledged that federal scrutiny includes the work of his personnel director, Joe Cini.

A governor is allowed to fill some high-level state jobs with anyone he wants, but most jobs are covered by civil service or other rules that require hiring decisions to be based on merit.

The hiring lists obtained by the AP suggest nearly 1,800 hires, promotions, transfers and salary increases were OK'd by aides to the governor in the months following Blagojevich's 2003 inauguration. They include positions such as highway maintainer and prison guard, which are classified as civil service jobs.

The jobseeker's name was included in nearly 1,200 cases. Blagojevich and his aides repeatedly have said the administration's hiring practices were "blind" _ meaning his office made the final decision on whether to fill jobs but never knew the names of individuals being hired.

Blagojevich spokeswoman Abby Ottenhoff said the lists were in the format used by the previous governor and were used until the new administration could set up a system that didn't include names. Hiring decisions made from the lists were not made based on names, she said.

Ottenhoff acknowledged that early in the administration, aides to the governor, his budget office, and other agencies met regularly to determine which jobs would be filled. She said the meetings focused on whether a position was absolutely necessary during a budget crisis, not on which individuals were in line for jobs.

But people familiar with the process, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the documents, said personnel director Cini and a representative from the budget office discussed jobseekers' names during the meetings.

Cini referred questions to Ottenhoff.

About 700 of the 1,800 employment actions on the list were begun under Blagojevich's predecessor, Republican Gov. George Ryan, but the Blagojevich administration still provided a final stamp of approval.

Recently, another hiring list surfaced that showed nearly 300 jobseekers and the politically influential people who recommended them for the positions.

Industry, Others Object To Data Retention (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 1, 2006

Internet providers and telecommunications companies expressed concern on Wednesday about the feasibility of recording Americans' online activities, a proposal that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has recently endorsed.

In a meeting Friday first reported by CNET News.com, Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller said the war on terror would be aided by two years' worth of data retention, a requirement industry representatives say would be accompanied by technical, security and privacy challenges.

"We have real reservations about data retention requirements because of the security and privacy risks attached to it," said Mark Uncapher, senior vice president of the Information Technology Association of America. ITAA's board members include representatives of AT&T, Sybase, Fujitsu and Unisys.

ISP snooping timeline

In events that were first reported by CNET News.com, Bush administration officials have said Internet providers must keep track of what Americans are doing online. Here's the timeline:

A Justice Department representative said this week that the government is not seeking to require the retention of the content of communications, but did not elaborate. If the European Union's approach were adopted, Internet companies would be required to save logs showing the identities of e-mail and perhaps instant messaging correspondents in addition to data about which customer was assigned which Internet address.

That suggestion alarms many Internet providers, which worry about the cost and complexity of recording what their customers are doing online. In some cases, especially among libraries, coffee shops and universities, no records may be stored at all.

"In general, libraries only keep records on users to the extent required to provide their services," said Rick Weingarten, director of the American Library Association's Office for Information Technology Policy.

Based on the limited information that has been made public so far--including in a speech by Gonzales last month--Weingarten said the library association would not favor such a requirement. "Absolutely we have concerns about users' privacy," he said.

A second meeting at the Justice Department has been scheduled for Friday.

Snooping on Web-based e-mail

The Justice Department also proposed that Web sites such as e-mail providers be required to store data about their users' activities for future law enforcement and national security investigations, according to one industry representative familiar with last week's meeting.

That could create privacy and security complications for Microsoft's Hotmail, Google's Gmail, Yahoo Mail and numerous other e-mail services, industry representatives said privately.

In response to a query from CNET News.com, Microsoft provided a statement that said it supported working with law enforcement to ensure Internet safety and protect children from online predators.

"But data retention is a complicated issue with implications not only for efforts to combat child pornography but also for security, privacy, safety and availability of low-cost or free Internet services," the statement said. (Click here to read the complete statement.)

Google said it would continue in discussions with Justice Department officials about how to prevent child pornography and related crimes--and, like Microsoft, sounded a note of caution about sweeping data retention rules.

"We are aware of a number of proposals in the U.S. and Europe regarding data retention and data preservation requirements for Internet companies," Google said in a statement. "We believe these proposals deserve careful review and must consider the legitimate interests of individual users, law enforcement agencies and Internet companies."

A Yahoo representative said on Wednesday that the company was going to decline to comment until it had details about what the Justice Department wanted. AT&T spokesman Dave Pacholczyk said, "We will follow the law," and declined further comment.

"Cox remains committed to the privacy of our customers, maintains secured records for an appropriate amount of time--according to the applicable laws--and only provides access to customer information to law enforcement, to the courts or to other authorities when legally required to do so," said David Grabert, Cox Communications' director of media relations.

For his part, Gonzales said in a speech last month at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children that Internet providers must retain records to aid investigations of criminals "abusing kids and sending images of the abuse around the world through the Internet." More recently, the Justice Department has invoked terrorism as the justification for data retention.

Two proposals to mandate data retention have surfaced in the U.S. Congress. One, backed by Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, says that any Internet service that "enables users to access content" must permanently retain records that would permit police to identify each user. The records could only be discarded at least one year after the user's account was closed.

The other was drafted by aides to Wisconsin Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, a close ally of President Bush. Sensenbrenner said through a representative earlier this month, though, that his proposal is on hold because "our committee's agenda is tremendously overcrowded already."

"Preservation" versus "retention"

At the moment, Internet service providers typically discard any log file that's no longer required for business reasons such as network monitoring, fraud prevention or billing disputes. Companies do, however, alter that general rule when contacted by police performing an investigation--a practice called data preservation.

A 1996 federal law called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act regulates data preservation. It requires Internet providers to retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days "upon the request of a governmental entity."

Because Internet addresses remain a relatively scarce commodity, ISPs tend to allocate them to customers from a pool, based on if a computer is in use at the time. (Two standard techniques used are the Dynamic Host Configuration Protocol and Point-to-Point Protocol over Ethernet.)

In addition, Internet providers are required by another federal law to report child pornography sightings to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is in turn charged with forwarding such reports to the appropriate police agency.

When adopting its data retention rules, the European Parliament approved U.K.-backed requirements saying that communications providers in its 25 member countries--several of which had enacted their own data retention laws already--must retain customer data for a minimum of six months and a maximum of two years.

The Europe-wide requirement applies to a wide variety of "traffic" and "location" data, including the identities of the customers' correspondents; the date, time and duration of phone calls, voice over Internet Protocol calls or e-mail messages; and the location of the device used for the communications. But the "content" of the communications is not supposed to be retained. The rules are expected to take effect in 2008.

U.S. Asks Internet Firms To Save Data (USAT)

By Jon Swartz And Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Top law enforcement officials have asked leading Internet companies to keep histories of the activities of Web users for up to two years to assist in criminal investigations of child pornography and terrorism, the Justice Department said Wednesday.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller outlined their request to executives from Google, Microsoft, AOL, Comcast, Verizon and others Friday in a private meeting at the Justice Department. The department has scheduled more discussions as early as Friday. Last week's meeting was first reported by CNET, an online news service.

The meetings reflect a new approach by law enforcement in anti-terrorism efforts. Previously, the Justice Department had invoked the need for data retention only to battle child pornography. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, Internet traffic has become increasingly critical to terrorism investigations, too.

Justice is not asking the companies to keep the content of e-mails, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. It wants records such as lists of e-mail traffic and Web searches, he said.

Roehrkasse said the government is required to seek proper legal authority, such as a subpoena, before obtaining the records. He said any change in the retention period would not alter that requirement. Law enforcement officials have seen investigations derailed "time and time again" because of a lack of data, Roehrkasse said.

The government's request forces the companies to strike a balance between satisfying law enforcement demands and honoring the privacy of millions of customers.

"The issue for us is not whether we retain data, but we want to see it done right," says Dave McClure, president of the U.S. Internet Industry Association, which represents 150 companies, primarily Internet service providers. "Our concerns are who pays for it, what data is retained, and if it is retained legally without violating federal laws and subscriber agreements."

Lee Tien, a lawyer for the privacy advocacy group Electronic Frontier Foundation, said he was concerned.

"I think that the request raises some really, really major privacy problems," he said. The Justice Department is "asking ISPs (Internet service providers) to really become an arm of the government."

The request creates a logistical challenge: Most Internet providers store data such as Web searches for 30 to 90 days. Storing such information significantly longer is more expensive, McClure and others say.

"We strongly support Gonzales' interest in assuring that the Internet is safe for everyone," Phil Reitinger, Microsoft's senior security strategist, said in a statement Wednesday that acknowledged the company's participation in the meeting at Justice. "But data retention is a complicated issue."

"We believe (data retention and preservation) proposals deserve careful review and must consider the legitimate interests of individual users, law enforcement agencies, and Internet companies," Google spokesman Steve Langdon said Wednesday.

Gonzales broached the issue of record retention in April during a speech at the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children in Alexandria, Va.

Gonzales, who has made fighting child exploitation a prominent part of the national law enforcement agenda, said the pursuit of child predators depends on the availability of evidence often in the hands of ISPs.

This isn't the first time Gonzales has gone to Internet companies with a request related to their records. In March, a federal judge ordered Google to hand over Web search records requested by Justice as part of its efforts to shield children from sexually explicit material online. Google balked at an earlier request, saying it would expose trade secrets. AOL, Yahoo and Microsoft cooperated with the government, but they said their assistance was limited and users' privacy was not violated.

Hazlet Ex-mayor Admits To Taking Informant's Bribe (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), June 1, 2006

Coughlin snared in an FBI web

Former Hazlet Mayor Paul Coughlin admitted yesterday accepting a $3,000 payoff from an FBI informant posing as a crooked contractor, joining a growing list of Monmouth County officials convicted of corruption.

On the day his trial was to begin in federal court in Newark, Coughlin, 42, pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Joel Pisano to a single count of accepting corrupt payments.

Under federal guidelines, the former mayor and councilman faces between 21 months and 27 months in prison. His attorney said he will argue for a lighter term, calling the crime "aberrant behavior" and citing what he said was Coughlin's serious alcohol problem.

Coughlin, a Republican, had previously served two years as a township councilman when he was elected again in January 2004. As a member of the majority, he was named mayor.

Just four months later, he met with Robert Steffer, who was posing as a demolition contractor willing to pay bribes for emergency, no-bid municipal work.

"We're going to get you in the game," Coughlin told Steffer, according to recordings the informant made for the FBI.

Six days later, at another restaurant, Coughlin took an envelope containing $3,000 in cash from Steffer and promised to consider him for a contract to demolish the township hall.

"It's definitely in a situation that we're very, very close to having an emergency," Coughlin said.

Steffer never got the contract. Another firm was hired to raze the hall.

Coughlin was among 11 former and current public officials in Monmouth County arrested in February 2005, several of whom allegedly took bribes from Steffer. He is the fourth to plead guilty.

Coughlin resigned his seat and was indicted late last year. Prosecutors agreed to drop other charges, including conspiracy, in return for his plea.

"We thought it was important that he acknowledged that he actually took the bribe," Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Hammer said yesterday.

Coughlin could not be reached for comment. His attorney, Jerome Ballaroto, called the crime "clearly aberrant behavior" and said he will make a case for leniency when Pisano sentences Coughlin on Sept. 7.

Ballaroto said Coughlin had refused a second bribe from Steffer. He also said Coughlin has "a real alcohol problem" and that agents or the informant plied him with beer.

"Did the government try to take advantage of a problem he had? Sure they did," Ballaroto said. "The alcohol very well may have contributed to this."

Prosecutors scoffed at such an argument.

"The defendant knew full well what he was doing," Assistant U.S. Attorney Judith Germano said.

Hammer said Coughlin only refused the second bribe -- at the 2004 League of Municipalities convention in Atlantic City -- because he was worried others might see him take the money.

"He understood that there are other people from Hazlet right outside the room," the prosecutor said. "He said: 'Another time, another place.'"

Coughlin never returned the bribe money. Prosecutors will seek $3,000 in restitution, Hammer said.

Coughlin lost his job in the computer industry after his arrest and has struggled to support his wife and children, according to his attorney.

"Every politician in America takes money," Ballaroto said, explaining but not excusing the crime. "If they're not taking an illegal bribe, they're taking it legally. It's a fine line between taking it legally and getting a quid pro quo."

Ex-mayor Admits Taking Bribe (APP)

By Karen Sudol, STAFF WRITER

Asbury Park Press, June 1, 2006

NEWARK — Former Hazlet Mayor Paul A. Coughlin told a judge Tuesday he had accepted a $3,000 bribe from a confidential informant who he believed was a corrupt contractor in exchange for securing work for him, specifically the demolition of the old town hall.

Coughlin, 43, said he also promised to use his influence to steer future work to the company supposedly run by Robert "Duke" Steffer, who was really working for the FBI.

In pleading guilty to a count of accepting a corrupt payment, Coughlin kept repeating "Yes, your honor" in response to questions posed by U.S. District Judge Joel A. Pisano. On the day a jury was to be selected for his trial, he told the judge that after reviewing the evidence and papers, he instead wanted to plead guilty. His wife and family attended the hearing.

Pisano told Coughlin he faces up to 10 years in prison and up to $250,000 in fines. But both sides have agreed to recommend Coughlin serve between 21 and 27 months in prison. He also will likely reimburse the government the $3,000.

The other two counts of the indictment will be dismissed at his Sept. 7 sentencing. Coughlin does not have to testify against anyone else as part of the agreement, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Hammer.

Coughlin is the latest public official to plead guilty in a FBI bribery and money-laundering sting dubbed "Operation Bid Rig," in which 13 former and current county and local public officials and three businessmen in Monmouth County were charged last year.

Jerome A. Ballarotto, Coughlin's lawyer, said his client's act was "something that's inconsistent with his life's behavior. This was truly an anomaly. Why he did it, we can't really explain," he said. Coughlin could not be reached for comment after the proceeding.

Regardless of whether Coughlin took the money as a campaign contribution or for personal reasons, Ballarotto said his client was accepting responsibility.

"Now he knows what he did was wrong and he should never have done it," said Ballarotto.

Hammer said, "Had we gone to trial, we would have proven he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and we would have shown that it was never a campaign contribution," adding that Coughlin intended to use the money for himself.

Pisano asked:

"When you received and accepted the money from the CW (cooperating witness) in exchange for using your influence . . . to assist the CW in obtaining emergency work, specifically the demolition of Hazlet Township Hall, and future work, did you know it was wrong and illegal to do so?"

"Yes, your honor," replied Coughlin, who resigned as mayor in March 2005.

Steffer has been at the center of many of the Operation Bid Rig complaints, working with the FBI and posing as a contractor willing to pay off public officials who would award him municipal and county contracts. Undercover agents posed as Steffer's employees.

Details of plot

Authorities had maintained in complaints and the indictment that Coughlin, who is now unemployed, was introduced to the cooperating witness by "Councilman-1," an unnamed official. Other government documents indicate this was Robert L. Hyer, a former Keyport councilman. Hyer, who died in October, also was charged in the corruption sting.

The three met on May 19, 2004, at a Union Beach restaurant where Coughlin received $3,000 from Steffer in exchange for the demolition job. One of the ways to do that would be to declare an emergency, which would relieve Hazlet of the requirement to advertise for bids, according to the court papers.

Coughlin was ultimately unsuccessful in gaining support from other officials to declare the demolition an emergency.

Other tactics discussed included damaging the building, rigging the bid specifications and giving inside information about the competing bids to the contractor, according to the indictment.

The township broke ground on a new town hall in September at the site of the former Office of Emergency Management building in Veterans Park. The exterior is nearing completion, and municipal employees are expected to move into the building by September.

The former town hall, on Middle Road, was torn down in September 2004 after Hazlet solicited competitive bids.

Judge Dismisses Wecht Motion To Toss Evidence (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 1, 2006

Ex-coroner's lawyers fault search

A federal judge yesterday denied a motion by Dr. Cyril H. Wecht's attorneys to suppress all of the evidence gathered against him.

In the same order, though, U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab said he would hold a hearing on one issue raised by the defense -- whether 29 boxes of autopsy reports seized by the FBI from the former Allegheny County coroner's private office should have been taken.

The hearing will be at 8:15 a.m. next Thursday.

Dr. Wecht is named in an 84-count indictment charging him with misusing his public office for private gain.

In April, Dr. Wecht's defense attorneys filed a 26-page motion asking the judge to throw out all of the evidence against their client. Specifically, they claimed that the boxes of private autopsy records seized in his offices were not enumerated in the search warrant.

Dr. Wecht claimed that the files seized were not found in the area the warrant claimed they would be and were not labeled as the FBI said they'd be.

"Nowhere in [lead FBI Agent Bradley] Orsini's affidavit does he establish, or attempt to establish, probable cause to rummage through the office generally to look for boxes," the defense wrote in the suppression motion. "Nowhere does he identify any specific file he is searching for. Nowhere does he identify any specific files he intended to search or the probable cause for doing so."

The boxes included reports on the deaths of several famous people, including Marilyn Monroe, Mary Jo Kopechne and rock artist Kurt Cobain.

According to the defense, when agents served the search warrant on Dr. Wecht's private office, they discovered 60 boxes of records -- not the "approximately 20" outlined in the warrant -- scattered throughout the office.

Dr. Wecht's wife, Sigrid, who is an attorney and shares the office with her husband, was there at the time. She said in an affidavit accompanying the motion to suppress that the agents were not able to find the 20 boxes, and that they asked her to direct them to the boxes. She told them she didn't know which boxes the warrant specified.

After that conversation, the agents called Mr. Orsini. "Agents thereafter split into teams and went throughout the premises, opened up boxes at will to see what was in them, and decided which ones they would take from different locations on the premises," the defense contends.

In his 17-page opinion, Judge Schwab said he believed an evidentiary hearing is necessary "to evaluate the validity of the execution of this part of the search warrant."

In its motion to suppress, the defense also claimed the FBI did not establish probable cause for the search warrants to be issued.

Judge Schwab dismissed that claim, despite what he said were "interesting but ultimately irrelevant" arguments raised by Dr. Wecht's attorneys.

Judge Denies Motion To Suppress Evidence Against Former Coroner (AP)

By Michael Cowden, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

FBI agents had grounds to seize computers from the office of former Allegheny County coroner Cyril Wecht, who is facing trial on theft and fraud charges, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

U.S District Judge Arthur Schwab ruled that there had been probable cause for search warrants to be issued and that investigators had not violated protocol in taking the computers.

The judge said a separate hearing would be held on June 8 to determine whether seized document boxes were handled appropriately.

Attorneys for Wecht, 75, in April asked that evidence seized by the FBI be kept out of his trial. Wecht resigned from county office in January after a federal grand jury returned the 84-count indictment charging him with theft of honest services, mail fraud and wire fraud.

In a suppression motion, the attorneys attacked the credibility of the FBI agent who got search warrants for Wecht's records and also blamed Wecht's indictment on a political feud with Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen Zappala Jr.

Defense attorneys said they hoped the motion eventually leads to the charges being dismissed.

The defense argues that the federal probe of Wecht grew out of feud between the former coroner and Zappala about a man who died after being subdued by police, among other incidents.

The attorneys also allege the FBI agent had previously "urged witnesses to perjure themselves in a case involving his own misconduct."

The district attorney's office declined to comment Wednesday afternoon. The defense said it was reviewing the opinion and preparing for the June hearing.

Wecht is charged with using his county staff to do work for his multimillion-dollar pathology practice. He is also accused of trading unclaimed morgue cadavers for private lab space at a local university. In addition, he faces charges for allegedly overbilling private clients by using faked limousine bills for trips made using county drivers and cars.

Wecht has consulted on numerous high-profile cases, from the death of Elvis Presley to the murder of JonBenet Ramsey.

Briefs: Police Dispatcher Arrested On Multiple Child Porn Charges (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, June 1, 2006

An Edgeworth police dispatcher and former borough councilman in Ambridge, Beaver County, was arrested Wednesday on multiple child pornography and stalking charges, police said.

Robert Panek, 40, was arrested by state troopers at his parents' Ambridge home and faces 50 counts of possessing child porn and two counts of stalking and harassment, Trooper Frank Murphy said. Panek was in the Beaver County Jail yesterday in lieu of $50,000 cash bond.

Police said that a former Edgeworth officer who now is a trooper had accused Panek of sending her unwanted letters and gifts. Police investigating that case said they found child pornography on his computer.

Edgeworth police Chief John English said Panek has been a dispatcher there for seven years. "My first reaction was disappointment. My second reaction is that we're mad," English said.

Allegheny County

Judge to decide whether Wecht search was proper

Evidence contained in dozens of boxes confiscated last year when federal agents raided Dr. Cyril H. Wecht's offices could be dismissed June 8 if a federal judge determines the search warrant was not properly executed.

At issue is whether FBI agents acted improperly when they took 29 unlabeled boxes from Wecht's private pathology office. Attorneys for Wecht argue the warrant was for "approximately 20 boxes and contents containing private autopsy files" in one file room.

U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab denied a request by defense attorneys to suppress evidence collected via two other search warrants that yielded computers used by two Wecht employees. Wecht, the former Allegheny County coroner, was indicted in January on charges stemming from accusations that he used his public office for private gain.

Judge will sentence Skosnik today

Allegheny County Sheriff Pete DeFazio's former No. 2 man will be sentenced today by a federal judge.

Dennis Skosnik, 54, of North Fayette, pleaded guilty in March to five charges of bribery, theft of honest services, money laundering and obstruction of justice while he was the county's chief deputy sheriff.

When he was indicted in November, prosecutors accused Skosnik of fixing criminal cases and parking tickets; accepting bribes; coaching a witness how to lie to a grand jury; sharing improperly obtained motor vehicle registration information; and using county vehicles and employees to ferry his son to law school in Philadelphia.

Skosnik could receive a maximum of 90 years in prison but likely will receive substantially less.

Asset district grant forms available Monday

The Allegheny County Regional Asset District Board will make 2007 funding applications available starting Monday.

This year, the board again will be accepting applications for the discretionary capital grant program. The program was suspended last year because of a lack of funding.

Applications may be obtained by contacting the RAD office at 412-227-1900 or info@radworkshere.org. A technical assistance session for prospective applicants will take place at 3 p.m June 20 at 1 Smithfield Street, Downtown. The application deadline is July 18.

2 students report injuries in bus crash

Two teenagers were taken to Allegheny General Hospital, North Side, as a precautionary measure after their school bus was involved in a crash in Dormont on Wednesday morning.

Dormont police said the crash occurred at 7:55 a.m. along West Liberty Avenue when the mini school bus, which was transporting the 17- and 18-year-old students to an alternative school in Emsworth, collided with a car while making a left turn. Police said no traffic citations were issued as a result of the crash, and the students said they had back injuries, which appeared to be minor. Neither the driver of the car nor the passenger in it were injured, police said.

Ex-coach sentenced to probation

A former Moon Area High School girls' basketball coach and physical education teacher was convicted of corrupting a minor for a physical relationship he had with a player when she was 17.

Thomas Szczepankowski, 36, of Moon, was sentenced to three years' probation after entering a plea last week, said his attorney, Jason Nard. Szczepankowski resigned from the school district last June.

The girl, now 18, testified at a preliminary hearing last year that she had a relationship with Szczepankowski from September 2004 through May 2005 and that they kissed and fondled one another but never had sex. Allegheny County prosecutors dropped a charge of endangering the welfare of a child. Szczepankowski repeatedly has declined comment.

Bush views 'United 93'

Tears flowed in the White House theater Tuesday night at the conclusion of "United 93," a movie about the plane that crashed near Shanksville on Sept. 11, 2001, after passengers fought back against their hijackers.

"It was a very emotional night," said White House press secretary Tony Snow, who watched the movie with President Bush and relatives of some of the 40 passengers and crew members portrayed in the film. The relatives were invited to watch the movie with the president in Washington, D.C.

"It has a very powerful ending," Snow said Wednesday. "It's dead silence as the credits roll, and you had sounds of quiet sobbing in the room."

Former Boy Scout leader sentenced

A former Boy Scout leader was sentenced this week to five to 15 years in prison for showing a 12-year-old boy pornography and then molesting him.

Alan J. Korzi, 52, of Windber, pleaded guilty in March to involuntary deviate sexual intercourse and showing pornography to a minor for an April 2005 incident at a Boy Scout building in Windber.

At a hearing last year, the boy said Korzi showed him a magazine with pictures of nude women and then would not let him leave until Korzi performed a sex act on him. Prosecutors dropped charges of rape, corruption and indecent assault in return for the guilty plea.

The Penns Woods Council of the Boy Scouts of America revoked Korzi's membership last year, after criminal charges were filed.

Landfill expansion gets preliminary approval

A plan to add more than 42 acres to an Indiana County landfill received initial approval from the state Department of Environmental Protection.

Evergreen Landfill Inc. officials want to expand their 64-acre landfill in Center and Brush Valley townships so the facility can receive trash for an additional 14 years, regulators said.

This week, the DEP approved the company's environmental assessment, during which the environmental impact of the landfill is considered alongside the potential social and economic benefits -- such as employment.

The plan still requires a technical and engineering review to ensure the application meets regulations for landfill design and construction.

Man sentenced for murder

An Erie man was sentenced to 16 and a half to 33 years and four months in prison for fatally shooting another man during an argument. Matthew Perez-Jefferson, 20, of Erie, pleaded guilty in April to third-degree murder for shooting Paul Martinson, 21, outside the Antigua Blue Bar in Erie on Nov. 3.

"There is not a day goes by that you and your family don't cross my mind," Perez-Jefferson said Tuesday to Martinson's mother, Rose Royer. "I offer my deepest remorse and apologies. I am so sorry. I don't know what happened."

His lawyer, James Pitonyak, said Perez-Jefferson was using cocaine, Ecstasy and alcohol before the shooting.

Widow wins $2.1M for matchmaking flop

An Erie widow won $2.1 million from a high-priced matchmaker whom she said failed to deliver on promises of introductions to cultured, wealthy men.

Anne Majerik, 60, said in a lawsuit that she paid Beverly Hills, Calif., matchmaker Orly Hadida $125,000 to be introduced to men who wanted monogamous relationships, earned more than $1 million and had estates of up to $20 million.

Instead, she said, she only got a few introductions to inappropriate men, such as an "international banker" who turned out to be "an interpreter that worked in a bank."

The matchmaker countersued and said Majerik is a "serial matchmaker suer" who enjoyed herself with the men she met.

A Los Angeles Superior Court jury ruled in Majerik's favor this week. The matchmaker's attorney said she plans to appeal.

Romero Called To Testify (LAT)

By Dan Morain And Evan Halper, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

State senator is to appear before a grand jury looking into the business dealings of her colleague Don Perata.

SACRAMENTO—State Sen. Gloria Romero of Los Angeles was summoned Wednesday to appear before a grand jury in the FBI probe of Senate chief Don Perata's business dealings.

Romero, a member of Perata's Democratic leadership team and one of his closest allies, said an FBI agent delivered a subpoena to her Capitol office requiring her to appear in July in Oakland, Perata's hometown.

Romero said in an interview that she is being called to testify as a witness. She said she declined to be interviewed by FBI agents and asked that they issue the subpoena.

"All along, I've thought this has been a fishing expedition," Romero said of the investigation, which became public in 2004. "I asked them to be specific about their questions and to give me a subpoena…. I look forward to answering whatever questions they may have."

Agents have shown interest in legislation that Romero carried three years ago to raise taxes on alcohol by a nickel per drink — a direction that has puzzled Capitol denizens. Romero's bill stalled early in the process.

The subpoena is believed to be the first issued to a sitting legislator in the Capitol since the 1980s, when the FBI launched an undercover anti-corruption operation that put a dozen lawmakers, lobbyists and others in jail. The bribery and extortion case became known as "Shrimpgate" because undercover agents posing as businessmen paid campaign donations in exchange for legislation to permit a new shrimp-processing plant.

The FBI's inquiry into Perata's business affairs became known when agents issued subpoenas to individuals and entities in Perata's East Bay district. That was three months after senators had narrowly elected Perata as president pro tem, the most powerful post in the upper house.

The Romero subpoena is "neither unexpected nor interesting," said Jason Kinney, a consultant serving as Perata's spokesman on the investigation. "This is the legal equivalent of hitting the snooze button."

Kinney said Perata "has acted ethically and appropriately" in public office. The investigation is "having no impact on … the conduct of the business of the state Senate," he said.

Whether Perata took a role in the alcohol tax bill is not apparent from the public record.

The current investigation involves no known undercover operation, and no one has been charged in the Perata case. FBI and Internal Revenue Service agents are looking into the senator's official, private and campaign-related dealings in Oakland and Sacramento.

Agents have interviewed members of the Oakland City Council, and have subpoenaed documents from local agencies, including the Port of Oakland.

Law enforcement authorities have examined payments and communications involving Perata and his political advisors, friends, and son and daughter, and have questioned current and former Perata aides. They also have interviewed some lobbyists involved in legislation that Perata carried.

Last year, they subpoenaed state Senate e-mails. Agents have looked at his involvement in legislation related to billboards, finance, gambling and insurance.

Romero, one of Perata's top lieutenants, is Senate majority leader, a post that requires her to help raise money for Democratic candidates statewide. First elected to the Assembly in 1998 and to the Senate in 2001, Romero has made her name as a lawmaker by focusing on problems at the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation.

In late 2002, with the state facing a budget deficit in the tens of billions of dollars, Romero introduced legislation to raise a projected $500 million for emergency rooms and trauma centers with a new 5-cents-per-drink tax on alcoholic beverages. The fee would have been paid by liquor vendors when their products were sold wholesale.

"California taxpayers cannot continue to bear the financial burden for an industry's product that is responsible for substantial healthcare costs to the public and the state," Romero said when she unveiled the proposal at White Memorial Medical Center in Los Angeles.

"The alcohol industry must assume greater responsibility for a product that, by its design, debilitates an individual's physical and mental capacities," she said.

The effort had considerable backing from unions, healthcare organizations and police and firefighter groups. But the opposition was also formidable. Among the many groups working to kill the bill was the Wine Institute, a trade and lobby association that includes major California vintners and long has opposed new alcohol-related taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0030989

On Wednesday, Mike Falasco, lobbyist for the institute, said the FBI interviewed him and others at the Wine Institute roughly a year ago.

Falasco said FBI officials asked general questions about issues of concern to his group. He said he told them that fighting the alcohol tax proposal was a priority for his organization.

Falasco said he does not believe Perata was instrumental in killing the bill, which died in the Senate in 2003. Another Romero proposal, to allow counties to place on the ballot a local tax on drinks consumed at bars and restaurants, also failed that year.

"I don't believe there is any connection between the legislation and Sen. Perata," Falasco said.

AP NewsBreak: FBI Investigating Firm That Tried To Recruit Reggie Bush, Lawyer Says (AP)

By Bernie Wilson

AP, June 1, 2006

SAN DIEGO - The FBI has opened an investigation into a fledgling San Diego sports marketing firm that tried to recruit Heisman Trophy winner Reggie Bush, the attorney for the football star's family told The Associated Press Wednesday.

Attorney David Cornwell of Atlanta said FBI agents interviewed him about "potential federal crimes" last week by phone. Cornwell said he intends to make Bush and his parents available to the FBI.

"They've asked now to interview Reggie and his parents," Cornwell said. "I intend to cooperate, yes."

April Langwell, an FBI spokeswoman in San Diego, said she could neither confirm nor deny any investigations.

The NCAA and Pac-10 are investigating whether any rules were broken when Bush's family lived in a suburban San Diego home owned by Michael Michaels, a principal in New Era Sports & Entertainment, while Bush was still playing for Southern California last season. The NCAA prohibits student-athletes and their families from receiving extra benefits from agents or their representatives.

Michaels and his partner, Lloyd Lake, a documented gang member serving time in prison, formed New Era late last year in the hopes of signing Bush to handle his marketing, and bring aboard a San Diego agent to handle contract negotiations. Their hopes were dashed when Bush signed with another agent and marketing representative.

San Diego attorney Brian Watkins, who represents New Era, said in April he plans to sue Bush's parents for $3.2 million. Watkins said Bush's parents owed $54,000 in rent for the year they lived in Michaels' house.

"We have been contacted by the FBI to discuss the conduct of the individuals represented by Watkins," Cornwell said.

Reached by phone Wednesday, Watkins said he was unaware of the FBI investigation.

Bush and his family so far have declined to be interviewed by NCAA and Pac-10 investigators. Cornwell said they were unwilling to provide information that could be used by Watkins, but indicated he was willing to cooperate.

"The issue with the FBI is similar to the NCAA. I want to balance the cooperation with the FBI against my needs to protect my client's interest with regard to threatened litigation," Cornwell said.

Bush was expected to be the No. 1 overall pick in the NFL draft, but the Houston Texans bypassed him and took North Carolina State defensive end Mario Williams. Bush went to New Orleans with the second pick.

Before the NFL draft in late April, the league alerted some teams about a potential attempted extortion of Bush's family.

FBI Looks At Firm That Courted Bush (LAT)

By Sam Farmer And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

The FBI has opened an investigation into a fledgling sports marketing firm that tried to recruit New Orleans Saints rookie Reggie Bush as a client.

A federal law enforcement source said Wednesday that the inquiry was "in its infancy" and that it was "way too early to say where this [case] is headed."

The attorney for Bush's family said that he had a "lengthy" phone call with an FBI agent last week, but he would not identify who he spoke with or which FBI field office was involved.

"They're definitely investigating federal crimes, but they didn't identify which crimes or which federal statutes are involved," attorney David Cornwell said, adding that he planned to help the FBI arrange interviews with Bush and his parents, LaMar and Denise Griffin.

Jan Caldwell, an FBI spokeswoman in San Diego, said she could not comment "on a pending investigation."

Cornwell has claimed representatives of San Diego-based New Era Sports & Entertainment tried to extort money from Bush's family.

DOJ_NMG_0030990

Brian Watkins, an attorney representing the sports agency's founders, Michael Michaels and Lloyd Lake, has said his clients plan to sue the Heisman Trophy winner's family for $3.2 million — $300,000 in business-related expenses, plus punitive damages.

While Bush was starring at running back for USC last season, the Griffins lived in a suburban San Diego home owned by Michaels. Watkins said the couple owed $54,000 in back rent that has not been paid. New Era never got off the ground as a sports agency once Bush chose other representation.

On Wednesday, Watkins called the suggestion of an FBI investigation "ludicrous" and "a media ploy."

Watkins said neither he nor his clients had been contacted by the FBI and he suggested that Cornwell was using his own personal contacts to stir up an inquiry.

Watkins previously said that when the sides met for settlement talks earlier this year — at the Santa Monica office of Bush's marketing agent Mike Ornstein — two men asked permission to search him for a recording device. On Wednesday, Watkins said the men had identified themselves as working for a security consulting firm called Long & Danilevicius Associates.

The firm's website lists president Linas Danilevicius as a former FBI agent. A phone message left at the security firm's Laguna Hills-based office was returned by Cornwell, who said Watkins' characterization of the FBI's involvement was "all part of the fallacy and fantasy that Watkins is living."

Cornwell added: "When he does the perp walk, he'll know he was wrong."

The Pacific 10 Conference and NCAA are investigating the case. If it is found that Bush or his family received what the NCAA calls "extra benefits" USC could be sanctioned and, if Bush is found retroactively to have been ineligible, his Heisman Trophy could be taken away.

Times staff writer David Wharton also contributed to this report.

Fargo Man Pleads Guilty To Damaging Government Property (GFH)

The Grand Forks Herald, June 1, 2006

FARGO, N.D. - A man accused of throwing rocks in the federal building here has pleaded guilty to charges of damaging government property and threatening a federal officer, the U.S. attorney's office says.

U.S. District Judge Ralph Erickson ordered a psychological evaluation for Daniel Cvijanovich, 25, of Fargo. The judge did not immediately set a sentencing date after Cvijanovich pleaded guilty Wednesday, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said.

Authorities said Cvijanovich threw rocks three times in the federal building in Fargo during the summer of 2001. The rocks struck a pane of glass that separates the lobby from the secure area of the building, and each rock had a note addressed to the FBI attached, authorities said. The contents of the notes were not disclosed.

One note, attached to a rock thrown on July 11, 2001 was "intended to be perceived as threats against FBI agents in the building," U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said in a statement.

Agents thought the threat was in retaliation for the investigation of American Indian activist Leonard Peltier, Wrigley's statement said. Peltier is serving life in prison for the deaths of two FBI agents in South Dakota in 1975.

Cvijanovich faces up to 13 years in prison on the charges.

Former Strip Club Employees Plead Guilty In Vegas Federal Case (AP)

By Ken Ritter, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, June 1, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A federal judge accepted plea deals Wednesday from 16 people to end a decade-long investigation of criminal activity at a Las Vegas strip club, whose owner has agreed to sell the business and plead guilty to tax evasion.

The probe at the Crazy Horse Too club dates at least to 1995 and includes allegations that a tourist from Kansas was left paralyzed when he was beaten by employees in 2001. It ended with admissions of failure to report income from tips given to dancers that are shared among club employees.

Club owner Rick Rizzolo, who has faced allegations of mob ties for more than a decade, was expected Thursday to become the 17th and final person to accept plea deals in the case.

Rizzolo, 47, was scheduled to plead guilty to a single tax charge - conspiracy to defraud the government - and agree not to contest some $17 million in fines, forfeitures and restitution. He would serve no more than 16 months in federal prison, prosecutors said.

Wednesday's pleas stemmed from a January 2005 indictment that charged club manager Robert D'Apice with racketeering and tax evasion. Prosecutors accused D'Apice and current and former club employees with using force to compel customers to pay disputed charges.

DOJ_NMG_0030991

D'Apice, 51, pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Kent Dawson to a felony racketeering charge that carries a possible sentence of probation to 20 years in federal prison and a $250,000 fine. The plea deal is expected to get him no more than 16 months in prison at his sentencing Oct. 17.

"Overall, we're happy with the resolution," D'Apice's lawyer, Michael Cristalli, said outside court. "The important thing is this case gets resolved."

Fourteen men ranging in age from 37 to 68 each pleaded guilty to a single felony tax charge of conspiracy to defraud the government. One woman, Paula McBride, 28, pleaded guilty to perjury. All live in the Las Vegas area except Ralph Pope, 63, of Chicago.

Six of the defendants, identified as current and former club managers, were expected to face 10 to 16 months in prison at sentencings scheduled in August and September. Nine other defendants face no more than six months in prison.

Rizzolo's lawyer, Tony Sgro, has characterized the club owner's decision to plead guilty as a calculated move to emerge from the shadow of investigations and the suggestion of mob ties. Efforts to reach Sgro on Wednesday were unsuccessful.

The lawyer has noted that Rizzolo's plea agreement does not mention organized crime, although prosecutors expect the corporate owner of Crazy Horse Too, the Power Company Inc., to enter a guilty plea Thursday to a racketeering charge.

The plea deal with Rizzolo depended on guilty pleas from each of the 16 other defendants.

The FBI had been investigating the club and Rizzolo since at least 1995, and used telephone wiretaps to collect information. The FBI and local police raided Crazy Horse Too in February 2003 in what Sgro called a "fishing expedition" for ties to organized crime. The lawyer said authorities also searched the club in late 2001.

The indictment cites injuries to Olathe, Kan., tourist Kirk Henry, who alleges in a civil lawsuit that he was left paralyzed from the neck down in September 2001 when he was beaten and left with a broken neck outside the club.

None of the defendants in the case admits direct responsibility for those injuries.

However, D'Apice agreed not to contest that the government could prove at least one of two acts of extortion to which he pleaded guilty also left at least one patron injured.

Sgro has said Rizzolo would sell the club within a year and not contest the payment of $10 million to Henry, some $4.25 million in forfeitures to the government and $1.7 million to settle a tax liability. The corporation and Rizzolo are expected to face some $750,000 in fines.

Daughter Of Victim In Homeless Hit-and-run Case Asks For Clues (MERCN)

By Andrew Glazer

The San Jose Mercury News, June 1, 2006

LOS ANGELES - The daughter of a man killed in a hit-and-run crash asked the public on Wednesday to help police in their probe that has resulted in the arrests of two elderly women accused of illegally collecting money from his life insurance policies.

Standing at the alley where the body of 73-year-old Paul Vados was found in 1999, Stella Vados and her lawyer Gloria Allred asked anyone who knew her father or the women held on charges of mail fraud - Olga Rutterschmidt, 73, and Helen Golay, 75 - to call the FBI or police.

"Please help me in my quest for justice," said Stella Vados, an artist who lives in Northern California.

Police are investigating whether Rutterschmidt and Golay were directly involved in the death of Vados and Kenneth McDavid, killed in a similar hit-and-run last year.

Authorities said Golay and Rutterschmidt befriended the two transients, duped the men into signing them as beneficiaries on their life insurance policies and collected more than $2.3 million after they were killed. They are investigating whether as many as six other men, including a blind man, fell prey to the alleged scheme.

Allred said Vados never met Golay and Rutterschmidt until they reached a court settlement on her father's life insurance policy. Vados' longtime boyfriend Randy Hansen said police told him in 2000 that the women claimed Paul Vados' body by telling the coroner they were his only living relatives.

Hansen said he and Stella Vados battled with the women to move Vados from the unmarked grave where they buried him to a family plot. He remains in the unmarked grave.

Investigators recently seized the station wagon they believe struck McDavid. Federal authorities said the 1999 Mercury Sable had been involved in a collision with a pedestrian or bicyclist, and that Golay had called for it to be towed near the alley where McDavid was killed.

The call was made from a gas station about an hour before McDavid's body was found, according to court filings. Over the next month, the car received three tickets and was towed while parked six blocks away from Golay's Hollywood home.

The car was nearly identical to a vehicle described in notes found in Helen Golay's home after her arrest, federal investigators said. It was not registered to either Golay or Rutterschmidt.

Deputy Federal Public Defender Kim Savo, who is representing Rutterschmidt, said her office is conducting an independent investigation and would not comment. Golay's lawyer, Philip Samovar, has not returned messages left at his office.

Lawyer Offers Plea In Drug Case (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, June 1, 2006

A lawyer formerly associated with a Jackson law firm pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a 36-count federal indictment accusing him of helping clients submit false settlement claims involving the diet drug Fen-Phen.

Vicksburg lawyer Robert Arledge, 49, made his initial court appearance in U.S. District Court on Tuesday after being indicted on Friday. He is the first lawyer charged in the ongoing FBI/IRS federal investigation of fraudulent Fen-Phen claims.

Arledge made no comments after his court appearance, but his attorney proclaimed Arledge's innocence.

CHARGES AGAINST ARLEDGE

Lawyer Robert Arledge faces 36 counts in U.S. District Court. The charges are:

One count of conspiracy to defraud, four counts of fraud and three counts of wire fraud. Each of the fraud charges carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison.

Twenty-six counts of money laundering. Each of the money laundering charges carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison.

Two counts to forfeit property derived through the alleged scheme.

"All the charges are unfounded," defense attorney Bill Kirksey said. "Mr. Arledge has done nothing wrong."

Kirksey said Arledge was one of numerous lawyers who worked on Fen-Phen settlement claims.

"I'm wondering why he is standing here and not others," Kirksey said.

The U.S. attorney's office says Arledge was employed with Richard Schwartz & Associates at the time of the alleged fraud.

The indictment alleges Arledge and several plaintiffs received more than $8 million in settlements and attorney fees to which they were not entitled.

"You had individuals who never took the drug and received substantial amounts of money," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter outside the federal courthouse in Jackson.

Kirksey said Arledge depended on what clients told him in submitting the claims.

Arledge was out of the country Friday on a hunting trip when the indictment was announced.

The government confiscated items from Arledge's office last week, including safes that have yet to be opened. Prosecutors agreed Tuesday to open the safes at a mutually agreed upon time with Arledge and his attorneys.

Fen-Phen, which was sold under brand names including Redux and Pondimin, was pulled from the market in 1997 after being linked to a series of heart problems. Its maker, American Products, established a $400 million pool in 1999 to settle legal claims.

The indictment covers from January 1999 to July 2002. Arledge is the third person associated with Schwartz & Associates indicted in the Fen-Phen investigation.

Federal prosecutor Cindy Aldridge said Arledge is the 27th person indicted in the federal investigation. All of the others have pleaded guilty but have not been sentenced.

U.S. Magistrate Judge James Sumner released Arledge on a $50,000 bond. His trial is set for Aug. 8.

Sumner said Arledge will have to surrender his passport, but is allowed to travel within the continental United States.

Arledge Says Innocent; Trial Starts Aug. 8 (VICKPOST)

By Danny Barrett Jr.

Vicksburg Post, June 1, 2006

JACKSON - Attorney Robert Arledge was released from federal custody on $50,000 bond Tuesday following an initial appearance in federal court.

He pleaded innocent to an indictment charging conspiracy, mail and wire fraud and money laundering, which carry maximum sentences of five and 10 years respectively, plus fines of up to $250,000 on each of the three charges.

A trial was set for Aug. 8 before U.S. District Judge David Bramlette.

The arraignment came after a weekend-long search for Arledge, who surrendered to federal authorities Monday. Officials with the U.S. Attorney's Office said the Vicksburg native and resident was on an overseas hunting trip when the indictment was announced Friday. Arledge may travel while on bond, but his passport was revoked.

Exiting the courthouse, Arledge, 49, had no comment on the details of the case, referring questions to his attorneys, William Kirksey and Karl Koch.

"These (charges) are all unfounded. He has done nothing wrong," Kirksey said, walking beside Arledge.

"A lawyer has to depend on the facts the client tells them," Kirksey said. "No lawyer has got the time to go behind every client."

Arledge, a onetime judicial candidate in Warren County, is accused of knowingly filing false claims for payment from a settlement pool set up by American Home Products, now Wyeth Pharmaceutical. The company made and distributed the Fen-Phen diet drugs Pondimin and Redux, which were removed from the market in 1997 by the Food and Drug Administration on suspicion of being harmful to people who took them.

The 35-count indictment charges that among legitimate plaintiffs, there were false claimants who shared in more than $8 million resulting from claims based on false information about having taking the prescription drug or its effect on their health. Attorneys in such cases are normally paid their expenses and a contingency fee of at least a third of a client's share.

Creation of the pool, about $2 billion, followed jury verdicts of $23 million in Texas and a $150 million jury verdict in Jefferson County.

Federal agents seized numerous items Friday from Arledge's home in Turning Leaf subdivision, off Lee Road, including a motorcycle and more than one oil painting. The indictment lists several items obtained with the hundreds of thousands Arledge secured in fees, including home expenses, charter plane expenses, cars, drapes and football tickets.

Arledge, licensed in 1995, was working for Schwartz and Associates in Jackson, the indictment says, when the false claims were filed and paid. He ran for Warren County judge in 2002, losing to Vicksburg attorney John S. "Johnny" Price Jr., who has since been re-elected to the post.

In addition to running against Price for county judge, Arledge asked then-Gov. Ronnie Musgrove to be appointed Warren County prosecuting attorney to replace Price. He had also qualified to run for county prosecutor but withdrew.

Federal authorities now say 27 people have faced indictment for lying to claim shares of the settlement pool. Almost all have pleaded guilty and been ordered to pay restitution of about $250,000 each.

Lawyer Pleads Not Guilty In Diet Drug Case (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, June 1, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A Vicksburg attorney pleaded not guilty Tuesday to helping clients submit false settlement claims in a multimillion dollar lawsuit against a pharmaceutical company.

U.S. Magistrate Judge James Sumner released Robert Arledge on a $50,000 bond. Arledge turned himself in to federal authorities Monday after returning from an overseas hunting trip, ending a weekend-long search for the one-time judicial candidate.

More than a dozen federal agents last week swarmed his Vicksburg mansion. Witnesses said the officers seized property including a motorcycle and an oil painting.

The 36-count federal indictment lists several items obtained with the hundreds of thousands of dollars Arledge secured in fees, including drapes, cars, homes and football tickets.

The charges stem from the 48-year-old's involvement in claims from a settlement pool created by American Home Products, a pharmaceutical company that produced and distributed Pondimin and Redux.

The indictment charges that numerous plaintiffs shared in more than $8 million in payments as a result of submitting the false information and that Arledge, as an attorney, knew the claims were false.

Creation of the pool - nearly $2 billion - followed a $23 million jury verdict in 1999 in Texas and a $150 million jury verdict in Jefferson County, claiming the diet drugs endangered the health of those who took it.

In addition to the conspiracy charge, which in this case carries a maximum sentence of five years, Arledge faces additional charges of mail and wire fraud and money laundering in the indictment that carry five- and 10-year sentences, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Eldridge. Those terms result from the activity taking place before the maximums sentences were raised in 2002, and thus are lower than current maximums, Eldridge said.

Arledge, a Vicksburg native, ran for Warren County Court judge in 2002. He received his license to practice law in 1995 and formerly worked with the Swartz & Associates law firm in Jackson.

Besides running for county judge, Arledge asked then Gov. Ronnie Musgrove to be appointed Warren County prosecuting attorney. He had also qualified to run for county prosecutor but withdrew from the race.

Medical Supply Company Owner Pleads Guilty In Wheelchair Scam (HC)

Houston Chronicle, June 1, 2006

A medical equipment company owner pleaded guilty Tuesday to paying $200 kickbacks to Houston doctors for writing prescriptions for unneeded motorized wheelchairs in a scam that cost federal health agencies millions.

DOJ_NMG_0030994

Harold "Prince Yellowe" Iyalla, 48, also told U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore that Medicare paid his company, 1st Choice Medical Supplies and Equipment, $5.6 million under the scam.

During his plea, Iyalla said he paid recruiters $200 to $300 for each patient they could send to one of the doctors willing to write a phony prescription. Under the scheme, equipment companies would bill the government for wheelchairs that typically cost about $4,200, then give the patients motorized scooters worth about $1,700, according to the indictment.

Iyalla pleaded guilty to conspiracy, health care fraud and money laundering with maximum sentences ranging from five to 10 years and fines of $250,000.

Ex-Money Manager Gets 30 Years (LAT)

By E. Scott Reckard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

James Lewis expresses regret at his sentencing for swindling investors of $156 million.

Orange County money manager James P. Lewis Jr. was sentenced Friday to 30 years in prison for swindling 1,600 investors of $156 million in a Ponzi scheme so calculated and long-running that the judge called it a "crime against humanity."

Lewis slumped back in his seat as U.S. District Judge Cormac Carney pronounced the maximum sentence, rejecting pleas by Lewis' lawyer that it would be "a death sentence for a 60-year-old." Lewis turns 60 next month.

Carney calculated that 19 1/2 years in prison would be the most under nonbinding federal sentencing guidelines. But he said those rules "never contemplated this kind of case."

For nearly 20 years, the judge noted, Lewis solicited retirement funds from investors who now face the prospect of humiliation and poverty in their senior years.

"Obviously, Mr. Lewis has robbed you of security, peace of mind and the pursuit of happiness," Carney said. He added that when Congress set 30 years as the maximum sentence for mail fraud, "I just can't believe they could have conceived of a worse case than this."

The judge's decision was handed down after a four-hour, 20-minute hearing in a packed Santa Ana courtroom filled with weeping testimony from victims and Lewis' family, as well as angry outbursts from some investors.

Asked by the judge to address the court, Lewis delivered a rambling speech that began with apologies to his victims, saying he was "full of sorrow, shame and deep remorse." In a high-pitched voice, he then described at length the hard-core criminals he had come to know in jail — men with names such as Trigger, Hit Man and Cutthroat — and said he hoped to someday reform them through Bible study.

As the sentence was read, one of Lewis' daughters screamed and burst into tears while many of the 60 other spectators applauded. Several victims said they had thought the sentence would be light because Carney had seemed sympathetic to the argument about Lewis' age during the hearing.

"He was sounding like he'd be lenient on him," said Janet Goldblatt, an investor who told the judge she had lost a nest egg from working 25 years as a designer for Mattel Inc.

"To say I'm happy doesn't begin to describe it — it's satisfaction that the justice system works," Goldblatt said. "At least we know where he's going to spend his retirement."

Defense attorney Scott M. Schlegel said he would appeal the sentence, saying it was cruel and unusual punishment for a man of Lewis' age.

The judge praised Lewis for giving up his right to a trial, which he said could have overwhelmed the already devastated investors. Lewis pleaded guilty in October to one count of mail fraud and one count of money laundering.

Among his clients were many fellow Mormons who had learned of Lewis' Financial Advisory Consultants in Lake Forest through church connections, and talked friends and family members into investing as well.

Lewis has been held without bail since January 2004, when he was arrested at a budget motel in Texas after a nationwide manhunt. He had a disguise and a guidebook to Mexico at the time.

Over two decades, he raised $311 million from investors who had heard glowing accounts of people earning returns of as much as 40% a year. Billing his operation as perfect for individual retirement accounts, Lewis lulled investors by paying them dividends and other returns, leaving investors with a net loss of about $156 million.

But as he admitted in October, the payments were made using funds from other investors in a classic Ponzi scheme.

Lewis' fraud succeeded for so long in part because he was taking in money that investors had earmarked for retirement and weren't seeking returns on for years, said Barry Minkow, who spent seven years in prison for defrauding investors when he operated ZZZZ Best carpet-cleaning company in Reseda.

Minkow, now an anti-fraud consultant, tipped authorities to Lewis' scam after worried investors asked his firm to look into what they suspected was a scam.

Lewis told his victims he was turning big profits by buying and selling distressed businesses, leasing equipment to medical offices and financing medical insurance premiums.

In fact, Assistant U.S. Atty. Gregory W. Staples reminded the judge, Lewis made only a few small investments and squandered millions on cars and expensive homes for his ex-wife in Laguna Niguel, a girlfriend in Villa Park and another girlfriend in Greenwich, Conn.

Receiver Robb Evans & Associates of Sun Valley has been liquidating Lewis' assets and suing hundreds of clients who were paid more than the money they invested, hoping to reclaim some for the losing investors.

Evans has recovered nearly $11 million, of which investors will get $9.5 million after expenses, said Evans' chief operating officer, Brick Kane.

Ex-Mansfield Cop Pleads Guilty In Child Porn Case (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, June 1, 2006

David Neal Looney, 41, a former Mansfield police officer, pled guilty in federal court in Fort Worth today to one count of possession of child pornography, according to a press release from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Looney, of Mansfield, admitted in court documents that he paid for access to a Web site that allowed its paying members to view and download images of child pornography.

Looney confessed to FBI agents that he had images of child pornography on his home computer and gave written consent for agents to seize and search his computer. A forensic examination of the computer's hard drive revealed approximately 110 images of child pornography.

He faces a maximum statutory sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. He is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 11, 2006, officials said.

Banks Honor Bogus Checks And Scam Victims Pay (WP)

By Caroline E. Mayer

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Trying to sell his 1968 Mustang online, John Schaefer received what appeared to be a firm offer from an overseas classic-car dealer. The buyer sent Schaefer a check for $14,000 even though Schaefer was asking only $8,000. The buyer said the extra money was to cover shipping and directed Schaefer to wire him the difference.

"It seemed kind of funny, and I had some hesitation," said Schaefer, who deposited the check in his bank's ATM over the weekend. On Monday, he asked a teller to see if the check was good. She left her perch, went to the backroom and returned assuring him "there was no problem," Schaefer recalled.

On Wednesday, "still not feeling quite right," Schaefer asked the same teller to make sure the check was good. That time, the teller told him the check had been cleared and he was "all set." Schaefer withdrew $5,000 and wired the money to the buyer.

Four days later, as he reviewed his account online, he discovered the check was not good. Even worse, the bank was demanding that he repay the $5,000.

"Had I made the deposit and not tried to make sure it was legitimate, I should have full obligation to make good on it," said Schaefer, 34, a facilities manager in Brattleboro, Vt. "But I checked with the bank twice, and now I find out they have no accountability."

Schaefer is one of thousands of consumers who have been victimized by an increasingly common check scam that relies on the vagaries of the banking system to take advantage of unsuspecting consumers.

Federal rules require banks to release funds from a consumer's deposit quickly, usually within one to five business days, depending on the kind of check. However, it can take weeks before a bank discovers a check is fraudulent.

So when a teller says "the check has cleared," the teller is "usually thinking in terms of bank rules, that the hold time is over, and the consumer now has access to the funds," said Susan Grant, director of the National Fraud Information Center.

But the average consumer thinks that phrase means "the check is not fraudulent," Grant added.

When that happens, it is depositors who are responsible for the money, she said. As the American Bankers Association explains in a "Fraud Alert!" statement insert it distributes to banks to send to customers: The consumer is the one dealing directly with the person who sent the money and therefore is "in the best position to determine how risky the transaction is."

To facilitate the flow of funds behind the 40 billion checks processed each year, banks are required to release funds within a few days, said Nessa Feddis, senior federal counsel for American Bankers Association.

If tellers start asking a lot of questions or start holding checks until they are determined to be good, banks "might be perceived as trying to circumvent the rules entitling people to withdraw funds," Feddis added. And if the banks are wrong, it will only be a matter of time before they are hauled before Congress and "accused of trying to hold on to people's funds," she said.

That provides no comfort to those who have gotten caught in scams. "I want security more than fast check-cashing and money flying all over the place," said Toni Gaston, a New Jersey administrative assistant who was the victim of an Internet work-at-home scam earlier this year.

In February, about a year after Gaston had posted her résumé on a job-search Web site, she received an e-mail about a part-time opportunity: to work as a courier for money for an international charity that builds homes for people in disaster areas. Her assignment was to deposit local donations into her own bank account, wait for the checks to clear and then wire the money to another address. She was told she would be paid 7 percent of every donation check, with a guarantee of $500 the first week on the job.

Gaston received a $4,500 cashier's check on Saturday, Feb. 26, and immediately deposited it in her Bank of America account. The teller told her it would take three days for the check to clear. On Wednesday, Gaston reviewed her account online and saw the funds were in her account. "I assumed, since it was a cashier's check, that Bank of America had actually gotten money from the other bank and put it into my account," she said.

On Thursday, Gaston withdrew $2,000 and wired it to a Ukrainian address. That's not unusual since most of these scams direct money outside the United States, often to Canada or Nigeria. The next day, Gaston followed instructions from another e-mail directing her to wire $1,900 to a different Ukrainian address.

"I couldn't believe I could make this much from this little bit of work," Gaston said. It was only a few days later that Gatson's euphoria wore off, when she caught a snippet of a TV news story about a person who had been scammed by an identical work-at-home scheme.

"My face turned completely green," said Gaston, who called the bank immediately. Bank officials told her there was nothing the bank could do and warned her that she would have to repay the $3,900 when the counterfeit cashier's check was finally returned to the bank.

It took another month before that happened. By that time, Gaston had surfed the Internet and learned there were hundreds of other victims around the country. She was furious. "The banks know this is going on. They know people are compromising the bank system, so why don't they upgrade their security, train their tellers to spot the counterfeit checks?"

According to Gaston: "A bank vice president told me that the bank cashes so many checks a day it doesn't have time to do that. I thought my money was safe. . . . I should have stashed it in a mattress."

Bank of America spokeswoman Diane Wagner said privacy rules prohibit talking about Gaston's case. However, in general terms, she said, "We advise customers to know with whom they're doing business. We also tell them they should never agree to wire back funds to a person they're not familiar with."

Wagner and other bank officials around the country all note that both the deposit receipt and the initial agreement customers sign when setting up an account make it clear that if any deposit item is returned, for any reason, the customer is responsible.

Bank of America's deposit receipt, for example, says: "All items are credited subject to verification, collection, and conditions of the Rules and Regulations of this Bank and as otherwise provided by law."

For most consumers, that language is clearly not enough, said Shawn Mosch, who launched a "Scam Victims United" Web site after she and her husband fell victim to a counterfeit check scam when they tried to sell a 1961 Buick online. Begun in 2003, Scam Victims United now has 2,616 members registered to its message board of 4,000 postings.

"There ought to be a law that says banks can't release the money until the check is guaranteed to have cleared -- or the customer is willing to sign a release realizing it is his/her responsibility if the check turns out bad," Mosch said. "Had there been something like that for me when I was a victim, I would have said, 'Oh wait, you mean we're not guaranteed here?' . . . We didn't trust the guy we were selling the car to, but we trusted our bank to tell us the truth. . . . I specifically asked the teller, 'I want to make sure if I do anything with this check it won't come back and bite me,' and the same teller assured me three times there was no problem."

Bank officials say it is not possible to warn each and every consumer about potential scams. "Everybody is in a hurry, so if we made such a disclosure with each transaction about every responsibility the depositor has, we'd be there all day," the ABA's Feddis said.

Besides, Feddis added, the proportion of fraudulent checks is very small, fewer than 100,000 out of the 40 billion checks processed annually. But the numbers are growing. According to the suspicious-activity reports banks file with the federal government, the number of fraudulent and counterfeit checks totaled 88,986 in 2005. That's more than triple the 28,670 reported in 2000. Between 2004 and 2005 alone, the number of reports of fraudulent and counterfeit checks grew by 45 percent.

Driving this increase is the Internet, which has made it easy for scammers to reach an ever-widening circle of susceptible consumers. "Because you're on the Internet in the comfort of your home, you may not realize the dark alleys you're dealing with," said John Hambrick, the FBI's unit chief at the Internet Crime Complaint Center.

Banks say they are trying to be more proactive, alerting their customers to those dark fraud-filled alleys through statement inserts and posters.

"Banks could do a better job," added Grant of the National Fraud Information Center. Among other things, she said, they could improve technology to catch fraudulent checks faster and be more upfront with customers about the risks.

"For example, when a customer says, 'Has this check cleared?' it's an opportunity to say the hold period is over and now you can have access to the money, but that doesn't mean the check or money order is good. If it bounces, you will still be responsible."

Even so, Grant added, consumers need to be vigilant, too. "And there's one sure way consumers can avoid a scam: Anytime anyone asks you to wire them money, that's all you need to know."

Schaefer learned that lesson the expensive way with his Mustang. He eventually sold it "to a gentlemen in Massachusetts," he said, adding, "He paid cash."

Plot To Arm Militia Group Nets Prison For Houstonian (HC)

By Harvey Rice

Houston Chronicle, June 1, 2006

A Houston businessman and former member of the Danish Parliament was sentenced to 14 years in federal prison today for his role in a plot to trade cocaine for weapons to arm a right-wing militia listed as a terrorist group.

Uwe Jensen, 70, pleaded guilty more than three years ago to conspiring with his boss, Carlos Ali Romero Varela, 47, to sell shoulder-launched anti-aircraft missiles and small arms to the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia, or AUC.

"Nothing was intended to hurt the United States," Jensen said today as he apologized in court for his crime.

His attorney, Erik Sunde, said Jensen got involved because he had gone through a divorce was earning a little more than $1,000 per month from Romero.

He entered into "what seemed to be an adventure, what seemed to be exciting and offered financial security for his future," Sunde said.

U.S. District Judge David Hittner said Jensen's age kept him from issuing a sentence of 15 years to life in prison, as permitted under federal sentencing guidelines.

Hittner sentenced Edgar Fernando Blanco Puerta, an AUC commandante known as "Emilio," to life in prison. He sentenced Elkin Alberto Arroyave Ruiz, a Colombian known as "Napo," to 15 years in prison.

Arroyave Ruiz's attorney, Richard Diaz, said his client was a contractor hired by the AUC to inspect the weapons they planned to purchase for $25 million in cash and cocaine. Prosecutors initially claimed he was an AUC commandante, but acknowledged later that he was not an AUC member.

The AUC, an umbrella group for right-wing militias formed to fight Marxist guerrillas, is on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist groups and has been accused of widespread human rights abuses.

Romero, Jensen's employer and co-conspirator, also haspleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

They were arrested in an FBI sting operation code-named "White Terror," which began after an East German informant who claimed to have ties with the KGB told the FBI that Jensen and Romero wanted to buy Russian weapons.

The FBI arranged an elaborate sting operation in which Warsaw Pact arms for sale were depicted on a CD-ROM.

Jensen and Romero planned to ship the AUC 53 million rounds of ammunition, 9,000 AK-47 assault rifles, grenade launchers with 300,000 grenades, two SA-7 shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles, 300 pistols and two SVD sniper rifles, investigators said.

Romero, who prosecutors said had been involved in drug trafficking, was president of Poseidon Inc., which he formed to make international chemical shipments in special tanks designed for easy transport.

Romero and Blanco agreed to trade weapons for cocaine after a series of meetings in Latin America and Houston, authorities said.

Jensen had a short political career in Denmark before moving to Texas. He was a city councilman in his hometown of Esbjerg in 1975, a member of the Danish Parliament in 1977-79 and a member of the European Parliament in 1977-78 and spent three months in 1978 as a Danish delegate to the United Nations.

3 Men Sentenced In Drugs-For-Weapons Case (AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

HOUSTON -- Three men, including a former Danish parliament member, were sentenced Wednesday to prison terms ranging from 14 years to life in prison for their roles in a $25 million weapons-for-cocaine plot involving Colombian terrorists, prosecutors said.

Elkin Alberto Arroyave Ruiz, 37, and Edgar Fernando Blanco Puerta, 59, both Colombian nationals, and Uwe Jensen, 70, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Denmark, had pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to provide material support and resources to the Autodefensas Unidos de Colombia.

The group was designated a foreign terrorist organization by the U.S. government on Sept. 10, 2001.

Jensen and Blanco also pleaded guilty to conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, said U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle.

U.S. District Judge David Hittner sentenced Jensen to 14 years in prison for each of the two counts he faced. His sentences will be served concurrently. Jensen sat on Denmark's parliament from 1975 to 1979.

Blanco was given sentences of life in prison and 15 years for the two counts he faced. Both sentences will be served concurrently.

Arroyave was sentenced to 15 years and faces deportation to Colombia after serving his term.

All federal prison terms are without parole.

All three were arrested in 2002 -- Jensen in Houston, Arroyave and Blanco in San Jose, Costa Rica.

Carlos Ali Romero Varela, 46, another participant in the scheme, is awaiting sentencing.

Prosecutors said Jensen and Romero, who both lived in the Houston area, tried to broker a deal with an undercover FBI operative to provide $25 million worth of Russian-made weapons in exchange for cocaine and cash.

A CD-ROM with samples of the weapons was presented to members of the Colombian terrorist group, including Arroyave and Blanco. No weapons reached the group, authorities said.

Judge Questions Role Of Wife In Alleged Cuba Spy Tandem (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

A federal judge raised questions Wednesday about the role of a Florida International University employee accused along with her professor husband of working as agents of the Cuban government, suggesting that the charges amounted to "character assassination" against her.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said it was unfair to Elsa Alvarez to assume that she was involved in all of the activities of her husband, Carlos Alvarez, particularly since there is substantial evidence indicating she was reluctant from the beginning and later opposed continuing their alleged surveillance on behalf of Cuba.

"There's a lot of character assassination as to the wife because of what you have on the husband," Moore said at a hearing. "It strengthens your case if you can just lump her in there."

Moore's comments came during a three-hour hearing on a request by Elsa Alvarez's lawyers that she be released on bail before trial scheduled in early 2007. Moore did not issue an immediate ruling, but did direct attorneys to draw up a tentative order providing for bail of at least $250,000.

The couple is charged with failing to register as agents of a foreign government. Prosecutors contend they spied for Cuban President Fidel Castro's government for decades, mainly reporting on activities of Miami's large Cuban-American exile community and U.S. political developments.

Both have pleaded not guilty and have been held without bail since their arrests in early January. Prosecutors have alleged they used their positions at FIU - she as social program coordinator, he as a psychology professor - as cover.

Testimony revealed Wednesday that during three days of interviews with the FBI last summer, Carlos Alvarez repeatedly told agents that his wife was not directly involved in communications - using coded messages on a short-wave radio - with their Cuban intelligence service handlers.

In fact, according to transcripts of those interviews, Elsa Alvarez grew increasingly worried about the contacts and hoped to end them.

"Elsa has been the person who wanted me to break with all of this for many years," Carlos Alvarez told FBI agents. "I'm not saying it as a husband defending a wife. But there's nothing there."

Brian Frazier, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case, acknowledged that the evidence is "mixed" about Elsa Alvarez's activities on behalf of Cuba. But he said she did attend a training session with Cuban handlers with her husband in Mexico in the mid-1980s and received a medal for her work while on a trip to Cuba in 1991.

DOJ_NMG_0030999

The evidence, Frazier said, "is greater as to Mr. Alvarez than to his wife. But it's important to understand how these husband-and-wife teams work and how they aided and abetted each other."

A key question for Moore is whether Elsa Alvarez is a risk to flee the country if released on bail. FBI agent Albert Alonso, the chief investigator on the case, testified that a Cuban passport in Carlos Alvarez's name was found at their Miami home, but nothing in Elsa Alvarez's name.

There was also no evidence of false travel documents or identities, which are common in espionage and similar cases, Alonso said. But he added that Cuba has frequently recruited married couples as spies because of their loyalty to each other.

"It's a family unit. They trust each other. Nobody else knows about them but themselves," Alonso said.

Testimony also disclosed Wednesday that the FBI planted a listening device in the couple's bedroom in at least 2001 and possibly earlier. But in all of those taped conversations, Alonso said there was no discussion of fleeing to Cuba if the couple was caught, or of such things as foreign bank accounts or fake travel documents.

Stolen VA Data Goes Beyond Initial Reports (AP)

By HOPE YEN, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Personal information on 26.5 million veterans that was stolen from a Veterans Affairs employee this month not only included Social Security numbers and birthdates but in many cases phone numbers and addresses, internal documents show.

Meanwhile, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson said Wednesday that he had named a former Arizona prosecutor as a special adviser for information security, a new three-month post that will pinpoint security problems at the VA and develop recommendations for improvements.

The three pages of memos by the VA, written by privacy officer Mark Whitney and distributed to high-level officials shortly after the May 3 burglary, offer new details on the scope of one of the nation's largest security breaches. The memos were obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press.

They show that a file containing 6,744 records pertaining to "mustard gas veterans" - or those who participated in chemical testing programs during World War II - was breached, and that a "short file" with as many as 10 diagnostic codes indicating a veteran's disability also was stolen.

At the same time, however, the memos suggest that the data might be difficult to retrieve by thieves.

"Given the file format used to store the data, the data may not be easily accessible," stated one memo dated May 5 and distributed internally May 8.

On Wednesday, the VA did not say why it didn't immediately reveal that personal information such as addresses and phone numbers had been disclosed. But the agency said it aggressively sought to protect veterans once Nicholson was informed.

"VA's initial and primary efforts have focused on notifying the millions of veterans and some spouses whose most sensitive and identifiable information - their names, Social Security numbers, dates of birth, and some disability ratings - may have been compromised," spokesman Matt Burns said.

Some lawmakers said Wednesday they were troubled by the new revelations, which go further than what the VA initially reported after publicizing the theft on May 22. At the time, Nicholson said the data was limited to names, Social Security numbers and birthdates; he later indicated that diagnostic codes in some cases also may have been breached.

"It is not appropriate for this information to ever enter the public domain," said Rep. Bob Filner, D-Calif., the top Democrat on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, which is planning to hold several additional hearings on data security and veterans' benefits later this summer.

Veterans groups have criticized the VA for a three-week delay in publicizing the burglary after the theft at a VA data analyst's Maryland home. During hearings last week, Nicholson said he was "mad as hell" that employees did not notify him of the May 3 burglary until May 16.

Joe Davis, a spokesman for Veterans of Foreign Wars, said the VA needs to come clean about who exactly is at risk.

"What's so upsetting and frustrating is the lack of specific details coming from the VA," he said. "We have millions of veterans looking to the VA for answers, including older veterans who may not have Internet access or fully comprehend what this means to them, and younger veterans who will now have to carry this dark cloud with them for the rest of their lives."

Separately, Nicholson said in a statement that he had appointed former Maricopa County Attorney Richard Romley as his new adviser for information security. Nicholson cited a need for dramatic security changes in the wake of the burglary.

"Rick Romley is a well-respected attorney and veteran who will provide a critical outsider's perspective to VA," Nicholson said. "Rick shares my commitment to cutting through bureaucracy to provide results for our nation's veterans."

Romley, a Vietnam War veteran, prosecuted one of the largest public corruption cases in Arizona in the early 1990s and was seen as a potential GOP contender in that state's 2006 governor's race.

On Tuesday, VA deputy assistant secretary Michael McLendon said he was stepping down because of the theft, and the VA announced it would dismiss the data analyst, who had reported to McLendon. The department also placed Dennis Duffy, the acting head of the division in which the data analyst worked, on administrative leave.

Deal Lets City Subpoena 3 Lab Workers (HC)

By Steve Mcvicker

Houston Chronicle, June 1, 2006

Legislator and investigator agree on a plan to force them to testify

Three recalcitrant witnesses believed to hold key information concerning the root of problems at the Houston Police Department crime lab could soon be forced to tell what they know.

Michael Bromwich, the city's independent investigator, and Rep. Kevin Bailey, D-Houston, chairman of the House Committee on General Investigating and Ethics, confirmed Tuesday that an unorthodox agreement has been reached that would let Bromwich use the committee's subpoena power to compel the uncooperative former lab employees to testify under oath.

"We're pleased we've been able to reach an agreement with Chairman Bailey and the members of his committee that will advance our investigation," Bromwich said.

In his latest report on the crime lab released earlier this month, Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department inspector general, said DNA and serology analysts may have tailored their findings to support predetermined crime theories.

Bromwich also complained that the probe by his team of forensic investigators has been hindered by an absence of cooperation from three ex-crime lab employees: former lab supervisor Don Krueger, former DNA lab chief James Bolding and former analyst Christy Kim.

Krueger retired in February 2003 after the DNA section's widespread problems were exposed. Former Police Chief C.O. Bradford later recommended that Krueger be fired for his role in the lab's problems. Bolding resigned in 2003 to avoid being fired. Kim was fired, but the Civil Service Commission re-instated her and she later retired.

Work by Bolding and Kim has been repeatedly mentioned in cases found to be suspect by Bromwich's team.

"Was it just incompetence and sloppiness by the analysts, or was there some outside pressure getting them to come up with certain results?" Bailey asked. "They've not been willing to answer questions, and so this appears to be the only way to get them (to)."

Attempts to contact the three former lab employees for comment were unsuccessful Tuesday.

According to Bailey's reading of the Texas Government Code, no one who testifies before his committee can be prosecuted based on that testimony. Therefore, in his opinion, none of the witnesses should fear cooperating.

"But if they still fail to testify, we'll find them in contempt and attempt to have them prosecuted," the committee chairman said.

Subpoena powersThe subpoenas for Krueger, Bolding and Kim will order them to appear before the committee in closed hearings scheduled June 12-14 at Houston City Hall. Bailey said one day has been set aside for the questioning of each witness. The witnesses are expected to appear before the committee, but Bailey said Bromwich would lead the questioning.

The idea of the committee basically lending its subpoena power to Bromwich was first floated by Bailey earlier this year. But the chairman's suggestion ran into opposition from Rep. Harold Dutton D-Houston, who is also on the committee. However, when contacted Tuesday, Dutton said he no longer has reservations about the rarely used committee tactic.

"There is some precedent for, in a closed hearing, allowing questions to come from parties that have been dictated by the committee and committee chair," Dutton said.

Team's qualificationsDutton also said that Bromwich's forensic team is obviously better qualified to question the former lab workers than members of the committee.

Bromwich was hired by the city to investigate the crime lab in 2005. The lab's DNA division was closed in December 2002 because of problems with practices and personnel. Since then, errors also have been exposed in the lab divisions that test firearms, body fluids and controlled substances.

Two men have been released from prison because of faulty lab work.

Thus far, Bromwich's investigators have identified 93 cases involving DNA or serology analysis with "major issues" that raise doubts about the reliability of work and the accuracy of analysts' conclusions.

"(The Legislature) has got to figure out if these labs should be independent and separate from police departments, or can they operate fairly when they are under police department control," Bailey said.

Ohio Justices Reverse Death Penalty Over Killer's Abusive Childhood (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - COLUMBUS, Ohio-The Ohio Supreme Court on Wednesday threw out the death sentence of a man who strangled and stomped a 76-year-old man during a robbery, saying the killer's chaotic childhood with abusive parents, along with other factors, outweighed the crime's brutality.

The 4-3 opinion also noted that Troy Tenace, 44, expressed remorse when he confessed to police in 1994, and that if he receives the maximum sentence, he won't be eligible for parole until age 96.

Any one factor alone would not have resulted in reversing the death sentence, but the combination of the three is enough to argue for prison over execution, the majority said.

The three dissenting justices said the brutality of the crime was inexcusable.

The justices were unanimous, however, in upholding Tenace's conviction for robbing and killing Chester Kozlowski on Jan. 28, 1994, in his Toledo home. Tenace robbed Kozlowski because the older man paid him in cash earlier for chimney repairs. The man had been gagged and strangled, and had extensive facial injuries from being stomped with heavy boots.

The ruling sends the case back to Lucas County for resentencing.

Tenace's mother and siblings had testified he was forced to watch the sexual abuse of his sister by his stepfather and was sexually abused himself by baby sitters, and that all three children were taught to steal and use drugs by age 10.

"Tenace was doomed from the start," Justice Judith Lanzinger said in the majority opinion. "Both appellant's mother and father were abusive, neglectful, and pernicious influences on their three children, who were schooled in crime from an early age."

South Carolina Bills Would Allow Death Penalty For Sex Offenders (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The House passed a pair of bills that would allow prosecutors to seek the death penalty for some repeat child molesters. One bill was approved earlier by the Senate and now goes to the governor's office, but the second must go back to the Senate for reconsideration.

CIVIL LAW:

FEC Adopts Hands-Off Stance On '527' Spending (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The same rules that allowed independent "527" groups such as America Coming Together and Swift Boat Veterans for Truth to pump more than $400 million into the 2004 election campaigns will remain in place for now, the Federal Election Commission announced yesterday, a decision that invites even larger sums to be spent influencing races this year and in 2008.

The FEC ruling, made on a vote of 4 to 2 in closed session was a response to an order by U.S. District Judge Emmett G. Sullivan. Noting the apparent "complete failure" of the FEC's regulatory efforts in 2004, Sullivan required the agency either to start crafting new rules or to issue a better explanation of how it will be able to regulate the groups effectively under existing rules.

Commission Chairman Michael E. Toner was one of the two dissenting votes. "The stage is set for 527s to once again spend hundreds of millions of dollars in soft money to influence the 2006 midterms and the 2008 presidential election," he said.

Money donated to 527 groups -- the name comes from the section of the federal tax code under which the organizations operate -- must be disclosed under election law. Unlike contributions to candidates or major parties, there are no limits on what an individual can give.

In the 2004 presidential campaign, this allowed donors such as financier George Soros and insurance magnate Peter Lewis to be the major supporters of the liberal groups America Coming Together (ACT) and the Media Fund, which organized field operations and bought television ads against President Bush in swing states such as Ohio. On the other side, Texas developer Bob J. Perry helped fund the Swift Boat Veterans, which attacked Democratic nominee John F. Kerry's Vietnam War record.

Committees aligned with the Democratic Party outspent their GOP competitors $320 million to $109 million, according to the Campaign Finance Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0031002

House Republicans have passed legislation to limit the money individuals donate to 527 groups to $25,000 for voter registration and turnout activities and to $5,000 for TV commercials. Senate Democrats, however, appear determined to block the measure.

Toner said he sought to write a rule severely restricting contributions to 527 groups, but lost the vote yesterday. He was joined by fellow Republican Hans A. von Spakovsky. All three Democrats on the commission -- Robert D. Lenhard, Ellen L. Weintraub and Steven T. Walther -- joined Republican David M. Mason in the majority vote.

The pro-Democratic tilt of 527 spending in 2003-2004 prompted opposition at the Republican National Committee, the Bush-Cheney campaign and among Republican members of the House and Senate. Republicans did not become actively involved in 527 fundraising until May 13, 2004, when the FEC rejected proposals to issue strong regulations governing contributions to the groups.

The 527 activity in 2004 may not recur. Since the 2004 contest, ACT and the Media Fund effectively folded when Soros and some other Democratic heavy hitters withdrew support.

Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), co-sponsors of the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, had sued the FEC demanding tougher regulations and enforcement.

Election Panel Won't Issue Donation Rules (NYT)

By Kate Phillips

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 31 — The Federal Election Commission has decided not to issue rules to regulate so-called 527 organizations that used millions of dollars in private donations to become powerful voices in the 2004 presidential election.

A federal judge had told the commission that it had two choices: issue uniform rules or issue a fuller explanation of why it was dealing with 527-related cases one by one even as the 2006 elections near. The commission voted 4 to 2 not to appeal the judge's ruling, and chose the second option.

Its chairman, Michael E. Toner, a Republican, dissented, saying, "The failure to issue rules has fostered uncertainty about what is legally permissible and has undermined the McCain-Feingold law" that governs campaign financing.

The vote by the panel set the stage for another round of court battles that could affect the 2006 Congressional elections, as well as the 2008 presidential race.

Advocates of changing campaign financing — and some Republicans — have been prodding the commission and Congress to regulate the 527 groups, named after a section of the tax code. Critics term the groups' operations an end run around the McCain-Feingold ban on the largely unregulated contributions to federal candidates that is known as soft money.

In the 2004 election, the groups spent money in a way that parties were no longer permitted to do, prompting watchdog groups to call them "shadow parties."

The 527 groups largely aided Democratic candidates through benefactors like the billionaire George Soros. But at the end of the campaign, the best-known group was probably the Swift Boat Vets for Truth organization that attacked Senator John Kerry.

Some advocates of changing campaign finance had pinned their hopes on the commission, recognizing that stiff Democratic opposition in the Senate had made the passage of measures to regulate 527 organizations difficult.

The decision this week grew out of a case brought by Representatives Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, and Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, and the Bush-Cheney '04 campaign.

In March, Judge Emmet G. Sullivan of Federal District Court gave the commission his two options to address the question.

"Case-by-case adjudication appears to be a total failure," Judge Sullivan wrote in March.

He later elaborated, saying, "Cases arising from the 2004 campaign have languished on the commission's enforcement docket for as long as 23 months, with no end in sight, even as the 2006 election campaign has begun."

Although it has acted on some questions related to 527 groups, the commission has not resolved several complaints by Democracy 21 and other campaign finance groups against some of the biggest organizations.

Fred Wertheimer, president and chief executive officer of Democracy 21 and a lawyer involved in the 527 suit, said the decision was not satisfactory.

"We expect the F.E.C. to act quickly," Mr. Wertheimer said, "and we also expect to be back in federal court to get this matter resolved and to stop the 527's from spending unlimited amounts of money."

Laurence E. Gold, associate general counsel for the A.F.L.-C.I.O., said it would be disastrous for unions and nonprofit organizations if the commission decided to redefine the 527 groups as federal political action committees, because those fall under the umbrella of McCain-Feingold limits.

DOJ_NMG_0031003

Mr. Toner said his agency's action raised the stakes on bills in Congress. A lobbying bill approved by the House includes restrictions on 527 groups, but it is unclear whether it will emerge from the conference committee. The Senate's lobbying package has no such component, and many Senate Democrats oppose such a measure.

"Absent Congressional action," Mr. Toner said, "no one should be surprised if 527 soft-money spending in '06 and '08 becomes one of the driving forces in determining which candidates are elected."

NARA Report Calls For Streamlining Of Classified Records Management (GCN)

By Alice Lipowicz, Contributing Writer

Government Computer News, June 1, 2006

The federal government needs to apply a more integrated approach to declassifying records, a new report from the National Archives and Records Administration recommends.

"We need to streamline the multiple, inefficient and, at times, ineffective independent agency reviews of the same material," according to the report, which was published by NARA's Information Security Oversight Office.

The office found that the level of reported classifications in fiscal 2005 decreased by 1.4 million in comparison to fiscal 2004 and is the first decrease observed since fiscal 2001. Even so, there are still increasing numbers of documents being classified, primarily for counterterrorism activities and critical infrastructure protection, at the Homeland Security and Justice departments.

The total number of classifications dropped to 14.2 million in fiscal 2005, a decrease from 15.6 million the year before. That reversed an upward trend that had been occurring since 2001, with 8.7 million classifications that year. In 2002 there were 11.3 million, in 2003 14.2 million, and in 2004 15.6 million.

Declassifications rose slightly to 29.5 million in fiscal 2005, up from 28 million in fiscal 2004. The general recent trend has been downward, however, with 100 million declassifications reported in 2001; 44 million in 2002; and 43 million in 2003.

Bankruptcy Judge, Pilots Approve Concessions Deal (FINDLAW/AP)

By Harry R. Weber And Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writers

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - ATLANTA-A bankruptcy judge Wednesday approved the $280-million-a-year concessions agreement between Delta Air Lines Inc. and its pilots, rejecting claims by the government's pension insurer that it should receive the compensation the pilots were promised if their pension is terminated.

The decision came hours after rank-and-file pilots gave their nod to the deal. The agreement, which runs through 2009, will take effect Thursday.

The deal, which replaces an interim pact agreed to in December, includes an initial 14 percent pay cut for pilots and assurances the pilots union won't fight any company effort to terminate the pilots' pension.

Judge Adlai Hardin signed the agreement during a hearing in White Plains, New York. Earlier in the day, pilots of the Atlanta-based airline, the No. 3 U.S. carrier, approved the deal with a vote of 61 percent in favor.

The judge's approval, the last hurdle in the process, came despite an objection filed by the government's pension insurer, which insisted that a $650 million (â,¬505 million) note and $2.1 billion (â,¬1.6 billion) unsecured claim that Delta has promised the pilots should belong to the agency if the pilots' pension is terminated as expected.

Hardin heard arguments from lawyers for both sides, but determined in the end that the agreement was in the best interest of the airline.

The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. said afterward that it was reviewing its options, including the possibility of an appeal.

"It was probably the most significant negotiation transaction we'll face as part of this bankruptcy process," Chief Financial Officer Edward Bastian said of the concessions deal. "It gives us the ability to put the past behind us and make Delta a success again."

The chairman of the pilots union's executive committee, Lee Moak, said in a telephone interview that he was encouraged by the agreement getting final approval.

"The sacrifices we have made were difficult," Moak said. "It has been difficult and I am confident in the process going forward."

Also Wednesday, Delta said in a filing with the bankruptcy court that it lost $27 million in April. Excluding reorganization items, it would have posted a profit of $22 million in the 30-day period. As of April 30, Delta had $2.5 billion (â,¬1.9 billion) of unrestricted cash. It has posted losses of more than $14.4 billion (â,¬11.2 billion) since January 2001.

In a letter to pilots after the pilot vote was made public, Delta's top three executives said the ratification by the rank-and-file marks a new beginning for the airline.

"If we seize this opportunity rather than squander it, Delta Air Lines once again can proudly become the gold standard of the industry," the executives said.

The chairman of the pilot union's executive committee, Lee Moak, said in a statement that the agreement the pilots ratified "provides a framework for Delta to successfully reorganize and emerge from bankruptcy ready to win in today's competitive marketplace."

The cuts are in addition to $1 billion in annual concessions the pilots agreed to in a five-year deal in 2004.

Hardin rejected the PBGC's main argument, that a deal between Delta and the pilots union was illegal.

He said that although, in some people's minds, there was a link between the $650 million promise and the potential loss of the defined pension plan, that "did not render a private agreement between an employer and union illegal."

"That is not a legal proposition I can endorse," he said. "So I must reject that."

Separately, a retired pilots group had objected to the new deal out of concern the Delta deal would ultimately reduce their benefits based on the pension being terminated. But their objection was resolved at Wednesday's hearing.

As part of the settlement, Delta has agreed to provide retired pilots an administrative claim of $9 million (â,¬7 million) to cover a portion of certain pension benefits that the retired pilots would have gotten since the bankruptcy filing in September had the benefits not been frozen. An administrative claim is a debt incurred by a company that has filed for bankruptcy, with court approval.

First Amendment Sometimes Left At Workplace Door (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The Supreme Court's ruling on freedom-of-speech rights of public employees has created a stir across the government, in part because of the way Justice Anthony M. Kennedy , writing for the 5-to-4 majority, framed the issue:

"When public employees make statements pursuant to their official duties, the employees are not speaking as citizens for First Amendment purposes, and the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline."

Although the wording seemed stark, the court did not redefine federal whistle-blower protections. The majority, in some respects, seemed interested in ensuring that governments can oversee workplaces and that disputes between employees and supervisors do not automatically fall into the realm of a constitutional right.

The case involved a local-government employee, Los Angeles County prosecutor Richard Ceballos , and for the most part addressed only one aspect of his actions -- claims made in a memo written as part of his job duties.

In Tuesday's ruling, the court found that a district attorney's office did not violate Ceballos's freedom of speech by allegedly demoting him after he wrote supervisors about his concerns that a sheriff's deputy had lied to get a search warrant.

Ceballos contended that supervisors later retaliated against him with a demotion, denial of a promotion and a transfer to an office requiring longer commutes. The district attorney's office has denied taking retribution.

The Supreme Court majority said Ceballos could not seek First Amendment protection because the memo laying out his allegations was written as part of his job duties and because supervisors have authority "to take proper corrective action" if they think such a memo is "inflammatory or misguided."

Kennedy, however, noted that public employees who make statements outside the course of performing their official duties "retain some possibility of First Amendment protection" because they are acting in the same manner as citizens who do not work for the government.

Government agencies troubled by the notion that employees might make whistle-blowing claims as citizens outside the workplace can take steps to address the issue, Kennedy suggested.

"A public employer that wishes to encourage its employees to voice concerns privately retains the option of instituting internal policies and procedures that are receptive to employee criticism," he wrote. "Giving employees an internal forum for their speech will discourage them from concluding that the safest avenue of expression is to state their views in public."

While that may be sound advice, numerous federal whistle-blowers have complained over the years that agencies fail to handle their complaints in a confidential manner and to protect them from reprisals by their superiors.

The four justices in dissent suggested that public employees should be eligible to claim First Amendment protection in the course of their duties. Justice David H. Souter pointed out that public workers have been given a "patchwork" of protections and noted that federal employees have no protection for disclosures made to immediate supervisors, for statements of publicly known facts or for statements made in connection with normal employment duties.

In a newsletter last year, the Merit Systems Protection Board said employees need to be careful in how they blow the whistle on violations of law and rules, gross mismanagement, gross waste of funds, abuse of authority and specific dangers to public health and safety.

An employee can blow the whistle by calling an inspector general hotline, going outside the chain of command or by talking to the news media, the newsletter suggested. Employees faced with reprisals can appeal to the board or ask for investigations by an independent agency, the Office of Special Counsel.

The Supreme Court ruling may slow momentum in Congress for redefining whistle-blower protections. Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), with bipartisan support, is pushing for legislation that would permit a federal whistle-blower to be protected for disclosing information learned on the job or in the course of job duties.

The Justice Department has opposed taking that step, and at least one senator has placed a hold on Akaka's bill, according to congressional aides.

NYCLU: City Blocks FBI From Obtaining Evidence In Police Arrests (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 1, 2006

NEW YORK -- A civil rights group told a judge on Wednesday that the city has refused to let it give evidence to the FBI as the bureau explores whether police officers violated the rights of protesters at the 2004 Republican National Convention.

The New York Civil Liberties Union notified U.S. Magistrate Judge James C. Francis in a letter that the city has refused to let it give the FBI videotapes and documents the bureau requested as part of its investigation.

"We find the city's effort to keep the materials from the FBI to be as troubling as it is without justification," NYCLU associate legal director Chris Dunn wrote in the letter.

He said he planned to ask the judge at a conference next week to clear the way for the NYCLU to cooperate with the FBI.

In a Tuesday letter to Dunn, city senior legal counsel Peter G. Ferrell wrote that the NYCLU may make its own materials available to the FBI but not materials the city gave it and marked confidential.

City law office spokeswoman Kimberly Miu said Wednesday the city's only comment was, "Since the case involves pending legal issues, it is difficult to comment."

More than 1,800 people were arrested at the four-day convention at Madison Square Garden, where President Bush accepted his party's nomination for a second term in office.

As many as 10,000 police officers from the 36,500-member department, the nation's largest, were deployed to protect the city from terrorism threats and to cope with tens of thousands of demonstrators at the convention.

In a May 11 letter, the FBI asked the NYCLU for assistance, saying it was trying to identify and locate people who faced charges that were dismissed based on contradictory videotape evidence.

Dunn said in an interview Wednesday that he was shocked that the city blocked the NYCLU from turning over the materials.

"They've said from the outset they did nothing wrong with the convention, and two weeks ago they said they're cooperating," Dunn said. "It's now clear they have no intention of cooperating, and indeed they're trying to block us from cooperating.

"I can only assume they're worried what some of these videotapes and documents will show."

Florida Eliminates Boot Camps For Kids (AP)

By Andrea Fanta, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — The military-style boot camp system that Florida has used to discipline juveniles was formally dismantled under a bill that Gov. Jeb Bush signed Wednesday, nearly five months after the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a state-run camp.

Instead of sending juvenile detainees to boot camps where guards can push and threaten them, children will go to residential programs that bar physical discipline. They'll go through a full medical exam when they enter and leave their programs and have a hot line they can call in case of trouble.

The $11 million program, which counties can voluntarily join, will also offer detainees job skills training, community service and counseling.

"No child will have to go through what my child went through," said Robert Anderson, who's 14-year-old son, Martin Lee Anderson, died after spending time at the Bay County boot camp.

DOJ_NMG_0031006

Anderson — after whom the bill is named — was sent there on Jan. 5 for trespassing, a violation of his parole set for helping steal his grandmother's Jeep Cherokee from a church parking lot.

Security videotape taken at the camp shows a half-hour encounter between Anderson at up to nine guards, who kicked and kneed him. Anderson died the next day at a Pensacola hospital.

"This won't bring your son back, but I hope you know your involvement in this process has helped make a difference," Bush told Robert Anderson and Gina Jones, Martin's mother.

Anderson's parents expressed their gratitude for Wednesday's change, but said they're still far from seeing justice done for their son.

"I would still like the guards to be arrested for killing my baby," Jones said. "He was only fourteen years old."

While a first autopsy report stated that Anderson died of sickle cell trait, a second autopsy report released in May showed Anderson died of suffocation by guards who covered his mouth while forcing ammonia capsules up his nose.

Guards have stated in reports they tried to revive Anderson with the ammonia. No arrests have been made so far and the investigation into the death is continuing, said Pam Bondi, spokeswoman for special attorney Mark Ober. Ober is handling the investigation into Anderson's death.

"There's just no time line because it's an ongoing investigation," she said.

Anderson's parents have also called for the firing of Dr. Charles Siebert, the Bay County medical examiner who first ruled Anderson died from sickle cell trait, a benign blood condition, and not from physical trauma.

Siebert has consistently stood by his findings, saying they're based on science and not emotion. The state's medical examiners' commission is investigating complaints filed against Siebert, but no action has been taken against him, said commission chair Dr. Stephen Nelson.

Furor over how the state has handled the investigation into Anderson's death grew to a national climax in April when students from three colleges in Tallahassee staged a two-day protest in Bush's office. The Revs. Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton joined the students and Anderson's parents for a march on the state's Capitol.

As he did during the protests, Bush urged patience. Ober must have all the time he needs to complete a thorough investigation, Bush said Wednesday.

Jones said she'll wait, but she won't give up.

"It's a long road ahead," Jones said. "I'm aware of that, so I'm just going to sit back and wait."

Meanwhile, the new program starts in July, when the 82 youths already at boot camps will also participate in the system, said Tara Collins, a spokeswoman with the state's juvenile justice department.

Bush Signs Boot Camp Changes (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, June 1, 2006

TALLAHASSEE - The military-style boot camp system that Florida has used to discipline juveniles was formally dismantled under a bill that Gov. Jeb Bush signed Wednesday, nearly five months after the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a state-run camp.

Instead of sending juvenile detainees to boot camps where guards can push and threaten them, children will go to residential programs that bar physical discipline. They'll go through a full medical exam when they enter and leave their programs and have a hot line they can call in case of trouble. In addition to the residency program, the new $11 million plan will offer detainees job skills training, community service and counseling.

"It was expected and anticipated," Manatee County Sheriff Charlie Wells said of the bill signing. Last month Wells recognized 12 recruits graduating from the Manatee County boot camp, likely the last graduates of a military-style camp in Manatee.

Wells said he and his staff must review the new law, and new rules, before deciding how to proceed.

"There's a lot of steps for us to take before we decide what our future is," the sheriff said. "We have to renegotiate our contract with the Department of Juvenile Justice before we move any further."

State Rep. Bill Galvano, R-Bradenton, said the situation is "unfortunate...given the history of our community and the leadership of Charlie Wells. A program that is really, in many respects, a positive program, had to be ultimately ended. But the catalyst was such a tragedy and we can't have that happening."

The legislation is named for Martin Lee Anderson, who was sent to the Bay County boot camp Jan. 5 for trespassing, a violation of his parole set for helping steal his grandmother's Jeep Cherokee from a church parking lot.

Hidden In Brothels, Slavery By Another Name (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The word spread that there was a new girl at the brothel in Queens, and the johns began lining up.

"I was crying all night," said Kika Cerpa in an interview last week. "One by one they came in."

That first night, she said, "I had sex with 19 men."

Afterward, she took a shower, and then the man who had forced her into the sex trade demanded his turn with her. When she refused (saying, "I can't have sex with nobody — I feel like I'm dead"), he beat her up.

Ms. Cerpa came to the U.S. from Venezuela in 1992. A man she thought of as a boyfriend convinced her to follow him to New York. Ms. Cerpa reluctantly agreed, believing that she could get work as a nanny.

When she got here, her "boyfriend" and another woman took her passport and demanded that Ms. Cerpa become a prostitute to work off debts that they said the boyfriend had incurred. Threatened with bodily harm, and completely intimidated, she complied.

"They took me to a house, and I sat in a room with other girls," she said. "Men would come in, and I kept my head down the entire time."

There was nothing unusual about the predicament that confronted Ms. Cerpa — not then, when she was 20, and not now. The demand for prostitutes (here in New York and elsewhere) is much greater than the supply of women who want to be prostitutes. So trafficking, the coercion of women and young girls into the sex trade, is a flourishing industry.

The toll that trafficking takes is often horrific. In addition to the forced prostitution, the women and children who are the victims of trafficking become part of a landscape in which drug addiction, disease, mental health problems, beatings and violent death are commonplace.

The worst moment in Ms. Cerpa's three-year entrapment in the hell of prostitution occurred when a prostitute she had befriended declined to go with a customer. The john became enraged and shot the woman. Ms. Cerpa ran to her friend. "She was dead, lying there with her eyes open," she said.

It may seem peculiar, but there is no law against sex trafficking in the state of New York — or most other states, for that matter. Many thousands of women and children are coerced into the sex trade each year, and the pimps, madams and other lowlifes who trap them are seldom subject to legal sanctions commensurate with the severity of their crimes.

A bill has been introduced in the State Assembly that would create two new crimes in New York: trafficking a person for sexual servitude and trafficking a person for labor servitude. But that bill, which has overwhelming support in the Assembly (including more than 100 co-sponsors), has been stuck for some time in the Codes Committee.

This seems inexplicable, because you will find very few legislators lining up (publicly, at least) with the soft-on-sex-traffickers crowd. I talked yesterday to the Democratic speaker of the Assembly, Sheldon Silver, and asked what was up.

He said that some of the language in the bill needed to be refined, and that his staffers would be working on it later in the day. He said he thought the Assembly would be able to pass the bill "within the next two weeks." It would then go on to the Senate.

I hope so. The bill is a good one. It emphasizes the coercive aspect of trafficking, which is really about human beings being bought and sold as commodities — not just in the commercial sex trade, but also in exploitive labor situations on farms and in factories and sweatshops.

Trafficking is much more widespread than most people realize. As the advocacy group Sanctuary for Families has pointed out, "In our backyards and communities, a slave trade is flourishing that makes a mockery of our belief in civil and human rights."

The Assembly bill, whose primary sponsor is Jeffrey Dinowitz, a Bronx Democrat, would make trafficking a felony, with penalties ranging from probation for a first-time offender to a maximum of 15 years in prison. It would modestly raise the penalties for patronizing a prostitute, making it easier to jail chronic offenders. And it would provide a defense against arrest for women who were coerced into prostitution.

Jane Manning, an attorney with the international women's rights organization Equality Now, said of the trafficked women, "More often than not they are the ones who are arrested and end up with criminal convictions that follow them for the rest of their lives."

After seeing her friend murdered, Kika Cerpa cooperated with the police and helped put the killer behind bars. After a long struggle, and with help from Sanctuary for Families, she has managed to free herself from the pimps and madams who had controlled her life, and still control so many others.

Gay Marriage Looms As 'Battle Of Our Times' (CSM)

By Jane Lampman

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

The battle over same-sex marriage is shaping into something more than deep societal tradition vs. civil rights. It is becoming a conflict of equality vs. religious liberty.

As gays make gains, some religious institutions are coming under pressure. For instance:

· A Christian high school in Wildomar, Calif., is being sued for expelling two students on suspicion of being lesbian. The parents' suit claims that the school is a business under state civil rights law, which prohibits discrimination based on sexual orientation.

· Catholic Charities in Boston, where same-sex marriage is legal, recently shuttered its adoption agency rather than serve gay and lesbian couples in conflict with church teaching. The church's request for a religious waiver from state antidiscrimination rules has made no headway.

· Christian clubs at several universities are fighting to maintain school recognition while restricting their leadership to those who conform to their beliefs on homosexuality.

Meanwhile, the Christian Legal Society and similar groups are mounting a national effort to challenge antidiscrimination policies in court, claiming they end up discriminating against conservative Christians.

"The fight over same-sex marriage - and two very different conceptions of the ordering of society - will be a knock-down, drag-out battle," predicts Marc Stern, a religious liberty attorney at the American Jewish Congress.

Both sides are pursuing their agendas in state legislatures, courts, and public schools. Both sides tend to view the struggle as a zero-sum, society-defining conflict. For supporters of gay marriage, it represents the last stage in America's long road to equality, from racial to gender to sexual equality. For opponents, traditional marriage stands as the God-ordained bedrock of society, essential to the well-being of children and the healthy functioning of the community.

While no one expects the courts to force unwilling clergy to perform weddings for same-sex couples, some see a possibility that religious groups (other than houses of worship) could lose their tax-exempt status for not conforming to public policy, as did fundamentalist Bob Jones University, over racial issues in 1983.

Legal experts of various views met last December, hosted by the Becket Fund, a nonpartisan institute promoting religious free expression, to consider the implications of same-sex marriage for religious liberty. Writing about the conference in The Weekly Standard, Maggie Gallagher quoted participants as seeing the coming litigation as "a train wreck," "a collision course," and "the battle of our times."

To ameliorate such conflict, some insist that, given the nation's commitment to both equal rights and religious liberty, accommodations must be found.

"This set of issues tests us in new ways, and I don't think either side is going to win the day," says Charles Haynes, of the First Amendment Center in Washington, in an interview. "For the foreseeable future, we are going to be living with two important claims, and we have to find ways to protect the rights of people on all sides."

Douglas Laycock, of the University of Texas Law School, suggests a modification to the current joint administration of marriage by the state and religious groups.

"We can never resolve the debate over same-sex marriage until we separate legal marriage from religious marriage," he says in a conference paper. "The state should administer legal marriage, and its rules ... should be made through the political process. Religious organizations should administer religious marriages," making their own rules. The legal relationship "could be called 'civil union' for gays and straights alike."

Ms. Gallagher, head of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, worries about any delegalizing of marriage. "That would be a good solution if there weren't a great public purpose to marriage that needs legal support to sustain.... If you chop it into pieces, that's a powerful statement by the law that there's no important purpose to marriage as a public institution."

The most immediate skirmish in the battle takes place next week, when the US Senate will debate and possibly vote on a federal constitutional amendment defining marriage as only between a man and a woman. While the amendment may not gain the needed two-thirds majority, the debate positions the issue as a hot-button topic for the coming political campaign.

Religious leaders on both sides of the Marriage Protection Amendment have formed coalitions, demonstrating that religious perceptions vary considerably.

Some 50 leaders from Roman Catholic, Mormon, Southern Baptist, Orthodox, Evangelical, and Orthodox Jewish traditions formed the Religious Coalition for Marriage, focused on strengthening its traditional role in society. They see the amendment as essential to protect "marriage from ... activist courts determined to reinterpret this fundamental institution ... against the will of the American people," says Richard Land, a leader of the Southern Baptist Convention.

On the other side, Clergy for Fairness - including leaders from mainline Protestant and Reform Jewish denominations - says that people of faith disagree on same-sex marriage and that religious denominations, not the federal government, should decide whether they'll sanctify marriages. The group also says it opposes the amendment because it would mark the first time the Constitution would be used "to restrict the rights of an entire group of Americans."

Chai Feldblum, a Georgetown University law professor active on gay rights issues, argues that the government should view both heterosexuality and homosexuality as morally neutral - "though how you 'deploy' your sexual activity can be very morally laden," she says.

"It's an incredible stain on the government that it is denying governmental structures for loving relationships and families," she adds. Yet she acknowledges the genuine difficulty that same-sex marriage presents for some religious people.

"I'd like gay people to understand that when religious people have to do something against their belief," Professor Feldblum says, "that impinges on their deep sense of self, just as I would like religious people to understand that when gay people are told they ... can't marry their loved one, that impinges on that person's deep sense of self." She's wary of granting religious waivers on these issues, however.

In Gallagher's view, "We are in a situation where courts are declaring our great historic, cross-cultural understanding of marriage to be a form of bigotry. That's a very destructive message," when research shows that children do much better in households with a mother and a father.

Others worry about the harm litigation battles could do. "People on both sides see this as good vs. evil," says the First Amendment Center's Dr. Haynes, "and those positions are going to tear us apart, deeply hurt the nation and our commitment to civil rights and religious freedom."

Haynes has just worked with groups on both sides to develop sexual-orientation guidelines for public schools.

"I've been involved in brokering nine different guidelines on issues like the Bible and religious holidays, and this has been the hardest," Haynes says. After eight months, Christian educators and a gay group involved in school issues did agree on a process for local districts to use that each side thought was fair. Whether local districts pick up on the guidelines remains to be seen.

Clamor over textbooks, for example, has erupted in Massachusetts and in Canada, where kindergartners are being introduced to stories about families with same-sex parents. Although schools must reflect the legal status of such relationships in the curriculum, some parents are demanding notice and protections.

"Some will ask why those parents should be given consideration," Haynes says. "The answer is that this is America, and we try to do the best we can to protect the religious liberty of even the smallest minority.... This takes more work than simply saying 'winner takes all.' "

Yet who is going to broker common ground is the question as advocates on both sides seek complete victory. Legal experts expect a patchwork of legislation and court decisions to emerge.

"Then we will have to worry about how to deal with the fact we have different rules in different states," Mr. Stern says. "If two or three big states move to same-sex marriage, however, it's not going to work to have different definitions across the US."

Highest Court In New York Confronts Gay Marriage (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

ALBANY, May 31 — As the issue of gay marriage finally reached New York State's highest court on Wednesday, the six judges who heard the passionate arguments from both sides put forth a fundamental question: Has marriage been defined by history, culture and tradition since the dawn of Western civilization, or is it an evolving social institution that should change with the times?

During the two and a half hours of oral argument, the judges on the Court of Appeals grappled with essential questions of social values, asking tough questions without tipping their hands as to their ultimate decision.

They wanted to know whether there were studies showing that children raised by mothers and fathers turned out better than those raised by same-sex couples, and they wanted to know whether opening the door to gay marriage would also open the door to bigamy or polygamy.

They wanted to know whether asking the courts to rewrite New York State's marriage laws was a way of letting the State Legislature escape responsibility for taking a position on a social controversy.

The case before the court was a challenge to New York State's marriage laws, filed by 44 same-sex couples. Their lawyers argued that marriage was a fundamental right, and compared laws assuming marriage to be a union of a man and a woman to the laws prohibiting interracial marriage, which the Supreme Court struck down in 1967.

Lawyers defending the marriage laws argued that even if the institution had evolved, it was the job of the Legislature — not the courts — to change them.

The plaintiffs' lawyers argued that the court merely had to change the gender-based language of the current law, which refers to "husband" and "wife," to something neutral, like "spouse." If the court agreed to legalize same-sex marriages, New York would become only the second state, after Massachusetts, to do so.

The judges' questions pointed to the precedent-setting nature of the debate. "Isn't this the only one where you have literally the whole history of Western civilization against you?" asked Judge Robert S. Smith of the state's domestic relations law. "That does go back right to the dawn of civilization."

After first citing traditional views of marriage, Judge Smith then asked whether the time was ripe for the courts to approve same-sex marriage. Judge Smith also wondered whether the issue of same-sex marriage deserved special attention because of the history of discrimination against gay people.

"Aren't homosexuals about the classic example of people who have been abused and discriminated against," and who therefore need the protection of the courts? he asked.

Peter H. Schiff, senior counsel to the state attorney general, said there was no urgent need to change the law, and pointed out that same-sex couples accounted for only 1.3 percent of all households in New York State, a "very small" number.

"I don't think anybody 100 years ago was thinking about this issue," Mr. Schiff said. "It wasn't on the radar screen."

The main lawsuit in this case was filed by a gay and lesbian rights group, Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, on behalf of five same-sex New York City couples against the city clerk, Victor L. Robles, who issues marriage licenses.

In New York, the legal dispute over same-sex marriage goes back two years. In February 2005, a State Supreme Court judge in Manhattan found that state marriage law violated the State Constitution. That decision was overturned last December by the Appellate Division of State Supreme Court, which said it was up to the Legislature to change the law.

In yesterday's hearing, the New York City plaintiffs were joined by three other groups of plaintiffs from across the state. New York City's lawyer, Leonard Koerner, said yesterday that even in its own case law, the Court of Appeals had affirmed the reason for marriage as "the begetting of offspring," not, as the plaintiffs argued, as the sanctioning of a loving and committed union between two people.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg has said that New York City is appealing the case to clarify the issue, and that he supports legislative change.

Roberta A. Kaplan, arguing for same-sex marriage on behalf of 12 of the couples across the state, said there were 46,000 families with children headed by same-sex couples in New York State, and that they could not wait until their children were grown for the law to change.

DOJ_NMG_0031011

The seventh judge on the Court of Appeals, Albert M. Rosenblatt, removed himself from the case. His daughter, a lawyer, has argued on behalf of advocates for same-sex marriage in California. Judge Rosenblatt has been perceived as a swing vote in many cases. A spokesman for the court said that in the event of a 3-3 tie, another judge could be brought in. He said a tie had occurred only once in the last 20 years or so.

Judge Victoria A. Graffeo asked whether, under the plaintiffs' argument, the Legislature should afford more rights and benefits to other types of family arrangements, such as two sisters raising children. "Was the Legislature denying them due process or equal protection?" she asked.

Judge George Bundy Smith asked what the consequences of legalizing gay marriage had been in Massachusetts.

"Basically nothing," Ms. Kaplan replied. "There is not a breakdown of civil society in Massachusetts and there certainly isn't a breakdown of marriage."

Judge Bundy Smith also asked why gay couples were not satisfied with civil unions — a remedy that the plaintiffs argued would make them second-class citizens.

Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye said the court would have to decide the constitutional questions, "whether we do it frontally or whether we do it in some more subversive way," like changing language about gender.

To which Terence Kindlon, a lawyer for same-sex couples in Albany, replied, "Subversive is one of the words I've liked all my life, your honor."

Protect Traditional Marriage (USAT)

By Sen. Wayne Allard

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Respect for the democratic process compels this Congress to protect traditional marriage in the face of a coordinated effort to redefine marriage through the courts.

Marriage, the union between a man and a woman, has been the foundation of every civilization in human history. It is incorporated into the fabric of our culture and civic life. It is the platform on which children, families and communities are nurtured.

OUR VIEW: Just say 'I don't'

Unfortunately, the U.S. Constitution is being amended to reflect a new definition of marriage — not by democratically elected members of Congress, but by unaccountable and unelected judges.

As a result, I introduced an amendment to the Constitution that simply defines marriage as the "union of a man and a woman," while leaving to state legislatures the freedom to address the question of civil unions and domestic partnerships. The amendment would not overturn current state and local laws dealing with these arrangements.

Democracy and representative government are at the core of this debate. In 2004 and 2005, voters in 14 states overwhelmingly passed constitutional amendments protecting marriage. Today, 19 states have constitutional amendments protecting marriage, and 26 have statutes designed to protect traditional marriage. The will of the people is clear on this issue.

Unfortunately, dissatisfied with the outcome of these votes, activists have intensified their campaign to circumvent the democratic process and redefine marriage through the courts. Currently, nine states face lawsuits challenging traditional marriage laws. Among these lawsuits are challenges to state constitutional amendments passed by an overwhelming majority of voters.

Recent decisions by activist judges not only fail to respect the traditional definition of marriage, they also highlight a lack of respect for the democratic process. The courts are driving a redefinition of marriage contrary to democratic principles.

The process to amend the U.S. Constitution is one the American people can trust.

My amendment reflects a belief that the institution of marriage is too precious to surrender to the whims of a handful of unelected, activist judges. The American people should have a say in the matter. If we in Congress fail to define marriage, the courts ultimately will not hesitate to define it for us.

Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., is the author of the Marriage Protection Amendment.

Just Say 'I Don't' (USAT)

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Apparently, issues such as immigration, corruption, gas prices, the budget deficit, the war in Iraq and the prospect of Iran acquiring nuclear weapons aren't substantial enough to occupy members of Congress.

When senators return from their Memorial Day recess next week, their thoughts will turn to June weddings. They plan to spend their time on a bitter, divisive and unnecessary debate over a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0031012

Even supporters of the Marriage Protection Amendment readily concede that the measure to ban same-sex marriage nationwide has virtually no chance of becoming part of the Constitution. (It would need approval from two-thirds of both chambers of Congress, plus ratification by three-fourths of the states.)

So why bother?

Well, Election Day is a few months off. Supporters hope the controversy will energize their base of social and religious conservatives opposed to same-sex marriage.

Their plan could well backfire. Polls show that Americans are evenly divided about the amendment. Religious activist groups are annoyed that President Bush, who supports the amendment, isn't lobbying hard enough for it.

At the same time, the 31 Republican sponsors risk alienating moderate and independent voters who are turned off by the pandering for a futile effort that will further divide the nation.

The gay-marriage issue exploded when Massachusetts' highest court ruled in November 2003 that same-sex couples have a right to marry. Since then, more than 7,300 gay couples there have done so. The commonwealth has survived.

But the public backlash elsewhere has been strong. Nineteen states have amended their constitutions to ban gay marriage. Most other states prohibit it as well.

The state activity makes the proposed constitutional amendment all the more unnecessary. It would take away the traditional authority of states to regulate marriage and impose a one-size-fits-all edict on a nation still grappling with the issue.

Most partisan drives to write social policy into our enduring Constitution have, fortunately, failed. The prohibition of alcohol was such a disaster that it was repealed 14 years later. The Framers purposely made it difficult to amend the Constitution so that intense passions of the day wouldn't lead to laws that might last forever.

Supporters of the amendment trumpet the need to protect the "sanctity" of marriage. But preserving the authority of states to decide how to handle same-sex unions — whether through marriage or some domestic partnership or civil union law that protects the basic financial, health and legal rights that heterosexual couples take for granted — doesn't affect anyone else's marriage. And the 1996 federal Defense of Marriage Act already says states may refuse to recognize same-sex marriages performed in other states.

The proposed amendment would squelch the important debate going on at the state level and poison political dialogue. It should be jilted and left at the altar.

On The Low Road To November (NYT)

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Republicans are trying to rally their far-right base for the fall elections with a mean-spirited sideshow threatening to the Constitution: a ban on same-sex marriage.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has endorsed the amendment, which would write bigotry into the nation's charter, by a 10-to-8 vote along party lines, and the full Senate is expected to take it up soon. Since the measure's language covers not only marriage but the "legal incidents" of marriage, its approval could jeopardize civil unions, domestic partnerships and other legal protections that many state and local governments now provide for same-sex couples and their children.

No one, including the G.O.P. strategists urging its fast-tracking, expects the amendment to get the two-thirds Congressional approval needed to send it to the states for consideration. Two years ago, when Republicans staged a Senate vote on the same dismal amendment just before the Democratic convention, it ran into unexpectedly broad opposition. Some conservatives correctly opposed grabbing power from the states by suddenly federalizing marriage law. Supporters of the amendment could muster only 48 votes, well shy of the 60 required to cut off debate and avoid a filibuster.

Plainly, the real purpose of this rerun is to provide red meat to social conservatives, and fodder for commericals aimed at senators who vote to block the atrocious amendment.

It is sad that Senator Arlen Specter, the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who personally opposes the measure, chose to lend his gavel and vote to speed it to the floor. He got angry when Senator Russell Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat, objected in forceful terms to both the amendment and the politically motivated scheduling. Mr. Specter and the other members of his committee who approved the amendment have no reason to be angry — just ashamed.

Black And Hispanic Home Buyers Pay Higher Interest On Mortgages, Study Finds (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Black and Hispanic home buyers entering the fast-growing market for subprime mortgages tend to pay higher interest rates than whites with similar credit ratings, a statistical study by an advocacy group says.

The subprime industry makes loans at higher interest rates to people who cannot qualify for regular mortgages.

DOJ_NMG_0031013

"When we compared borrowers with the same risk characteristics, African-Americans and Latinos were still more likely to get the higher-rate loans," said Debbie Gruenstein Bocian, a researcher at the group, the Center for Responsible Lending.

A spokesman for the mortgage banking industry challenged the conclusion, saying the report did not take into account all the legitimate questions about family wealth and debt, house appraisal and other factors that underwriters must consider when making a loan.

Racial disparities in mortgage lending have been studied and debated for decades, with the focus shifting in recent years from the practice of denying mortgages in certain minority neighborhoods, or redlining, and a lack of loans for minorities to the pitfalls of the subprime industry.

As many as one in five home loans are now subprime, totaling more than $500 billion a year, said Keith S. Ernst, an author of the report who is an analyst at the lending center, in Washington.

Borrowers typically pay two percentage points higher than they would for conventional loans. Some, judged the riskiest cases, are charged higher rates, forcing them to pay hundreds of dollars extra a month.

The study, using federal and industry figures from 2004 to analyze a sample of 50,000 loans, found that among subprime borrowers with similar credit ratings, blacks and Hispanics were 30 percent more likely than whites to be charged the highest interest.

In response to earlier studies of racial disparities, the mortgage industry has argued that the varied financial backgrounds of borrowers and a tendency for minority buyers to offer lower down payments were mainly responsible.

The authors of the new report said they had, for the first time, taken credit scores and down payments into account, leaving an unexplained racial difference.

Doug Douglas, chief economist of the Mortgage Bankers Association of America, said in a telephone interview that although "the issue of disparities is very important," the new study still failed to capture the complexity of mortgage underwriting, especially in the subprime market, where borrowers do not have top credit ratings under traditional criteria.

The findings were endorsed by representatives of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Council for La Raza. The authors said high-cost lenders appeared to focus on minority neighborhoods. They expressed concern about incentives that lending agencies give to mortgage brokers, saying the incentives reward brokers for steering customers to the most expensive loans.

Joe Falk, a board member of the National Association of Mortgage Brokers, said brokers fully disclosed all fees and were unfairly castigated for offering consumers alternatives that fit their needs and preferences.

"We've expanded home ownership by going into neighborhoods not served by others," Mr. Falk said by telephone from Miami.

An Ex-liberal Navigates Right (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, June 1, 2006

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. — David Horowitz pays no heed to the hecklers. He responds politely to challenges during the question-and-answer period. Only when his talk devolves into a sort of free-for-all does he lose his temper.

“This is a demonstration of what brainwashing will do,” he bellows into the crowd of about 300, most of them students, gathered on a recent spring evening in a cavernous hall at Pennsylvania State University. “You have sat through (the entire) talk and can't even engage the argument.”

Horowitz later says he felt bad about yelling at students. He usually reserves his vitriol for faculty and administrators. But to some, it was quintessential Horowitz.

“Sometimes he gets a little over the top,” says just-graduated Vicky Cangelosi, 20, who sat up front in a section reserved for Penn State's College Republicans, the group that sponsored Horowitz's appearance. “I think that indicates that he's very passionate.”

Other critics of higher education may argue that today's college campuses are being overrun by leftist professors bent on indoctrinating their students. But nobody is quite as in-your-face about it as Horowitz, 67, a '60s-radical-turned-conservative-activist who has spent the past few years crisscrossing the country to warn students: “You can't get a good education if they're only telling you half the story.”

To Horowitz, an overwhelming majority of hard-line liberal professors on campuses have left conservative students complaining that their views aren't welcome. His job, he says, is to see that those students aren't treated as second-class citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0031014

He is not a professor; he is a writer, co-founder of the Los Angeles-based Center for the Study of Popular Culture and founder of the 2½-year-old Washington-based Students for Academic Freedom, a national organization that allows conservative students to vent.

All Horowitz wants, he says, is a return to the kind of liberal arts education he got at Columbia University in the 1950s, when he still embraced communism, where professors "taught me what the intellectual life should be like, where you focus on the ideas. It's not a political food fight like so much of our culture has become."

Trouble is, his critics, including a recently created coalition of student, faculty and civil liberties groups, say he doesn't know what he's talking about. In May, the coalition called Free Exchange on Campus released a report aimed at discrediting claims made in Horowitz's new book, The Professors: The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America (Regnery).

The book profiles faculty who Horowitz says represent the kind of disorder going on in college classrooms today. But professor by professor, the report cites errors, fab- rications and misleading statements, and concludes that Horowitz's research is "manipulated to fit his arguments."

Two examples at Penn State:

·Sociology senior lecturer Sam Richards reinforces class lessons "with 'out-of-class' assignments that include the viewing of left-wing propaganda films, such as The Oil Factor, from which students learn that the 'war in Afghanistan has turned into a bloody quagmire,' … and Occupation 101, about the horrors of Israel's 'occupation' of Palestinian territories,' " Horowitz writes. In the report, Richards responds: Horowitz "disingenuously fails to note that students also receive credit for attending 'conserva- tive' events, including a talk by none other than David Horowitz!"

·Literature professor Michael Berube acknowledges "his classes often have little to do with literature," and he believes "religious people were to be regarded as simply irrational," Horowitz says. In addition to noting that Horowitz "knows nothing about my classroom demeanor or my record as a faculty member," Berube says: "If he were a college student and tried to get away with this garbage, he would indeed be flunked — not for his conservatism, but for his mendacity."

His critics have said the book is akin to a McCarthy-like smear campaign. But Horowitz calls it "a difference of interpretation of what my book is about.

"Long ago, when I came out of the left, I said, 'I need to talk to the left the way the left talks to other people,' " he says during an interview on campus tucked between a book-signing and radio show. "So I have been a very aggressive conservative, and I pull no punches."

Horowitz is having an effect. He has had success in Congress pushing his Academic Bill of Rights, a statement of principles that he says reflects his goal to both remove political agendas from campus life and ensure that no students are discriminated against because of political or ideological leanings.

It basically says professors should stick to their area of scholarly expertise in the classroom and welcome a diversity of approaches "to unsettled questions," and students should be graded on academic merit, not on the basis of their political or religious beliefs. The bill borrows heavily from standards followed by the American Association of University Professors, an organization that Horowitz sees as part of the problem. Horowitz says his goal is to force universities, through legislation or voluntarily, to extend the same rights to students that faculty have.

Some of Horowitz's language is included in a House-passed bill to renew the federal Higher Education Act. And a similar proposal is pending in the Senate, which makes it likely some form of the provision will be included in any bill sent to President Bush.

Meanwhile, the concept also has captured the attention of lawmakers in about 20 states (depends who's counting), including Pennsylvania, where a House committee today wraps up a series of hearings on the topic.

Horowitz insists that what he's asking for is fairly tame. But in Pennsylvania, faculty, who traditionally have been free from government interference, fear a slippery slope. Once a bill becomes a law, "you have no idea where it's going to go," Berube says during a walk across campus. And adopting such a code raises new problems, he and others suggest. If a biology professor discusses global warming, for example, is that science or political science? Who would decide?

State lawmakers have been slow to jump aboard. But even in those states where legislation has failed or stalled, the question hasn't gone away.

Public university systems in Colorado, Ohio and Tennessee, for example, have said they'll adopt some form of protection for students in lieu of legislation, and Horowitz says that's good enough for him.

At Penn State, situated in the geographic and conservative center of the state, university officials insist Horowitz is attacking a problem that doesn't exist.

"The kinds of broad strokes he's using don't characterize Penn State, and I don't think most of higher education," says spokesman Bill Mahon. In the past five years, he says, Penn State has received just 13 complaints regarding classroom bias. (Many are not from conservatives.)

DOJ_NMG_0031015

Among students who see no problem is engineering major Kyle Metzgar, 19. He says he is no liberal and has "not had a real stalwart conservative professor." But "I have also never felt discriminated against or that I was in an atmosphere that was not conducive to getting the most out of my education. … My biology teacher made fun of the fact that President Bush says 'nu-cu-lar' instead of 'nu-cle-ar.' Who cares?"

College Republicans, though, say many conservative students won't complain for fear of repercussions. That's where Horowitz comes in.

"He's the voice of a movement that needs to be heard," says political science and business major Seth Bender, 20, who escorted Horowitz during his visit here. "I have to sit through lectures every single week listening to someone bash different ideologies and that sort of thing, and (being) called an idiot for what I believed."

Other incidents last semester suggest he has plenty of company. In February, then-sophomore Alfred "A.J." Fleuhr sued the university, saying he feared he would be punished if he expressed his conservative beliefs because the university might view them as intolerant under campus policies. On May 19, the university updated those policies to the satisfaction of Fleuhr's attorneys at the Alliance Defense Fund, a conservative Christian legal advocacy non-profit in Arizona. And the day before Horowitz arrived on campus, administrators in a statement urged the College Republicans to rethink their approach to an event they planned about illegal immigration, saying many would find it offensive. (At one point, they were going to call it "Catch an Illegal Immigrant Day.")

"So my case is made before I even get here," Horowitz told his audience.

Horowitz says he became involved in the issue after hearing similar stories from students on campuses nationwide. But even before Free Exchange on Campus came along, his foes have delighted in debunking his claims.

In one example, Horowitz claimed a Penn State biology professor had shown the Michael Moore movie Fahrenheit 9/11 before the 2004 presidential elections. When Pennsylvania House committee co-chair Lawrence Curry pressed him during hearings at Temple University in Philadelphia in January, Horowitz acknowledged that his staff could not confirm it had happened, and that he no longer uses that example.

Months later, he's still furious about it. "These underhanded, devious, malicious, dishonest tactics," he says. "I gave 45 minutes of testimony, a half-hour of questions, and I never once mentioned the incident they're referring to. … Curry saved it to the very end of the hearings and rammed it to me."

Horowitz similarly has been accused of making up a story about a University of Northern Colorado student who was asked to write an essay on her criminology exam explaining "why President Bush is a war criminal." When the student wrote instead about why Saddam Hussein is a war criminal, Horowitz says, she got a failing grade. Horowitz insists the incident happened: "I located the student and the exam," he says, but "it's a complicated story. … The student was terrified."

Even so, Horowitz acknowledges his small staff can't confirm every incident it receives, and his fact-checkers can be "very loose with the truth." But he mostly dismisses the criticisms as inconsequential.

"I will stake my life that there are professors all over this country in classrooms who are … venting their prejudices in classes where it has no place."

Group Aims To Unveil Ten Commandments (WP)

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

A D.C.-based evangelical Christian group has a new idea for promoting the Ten Commandments: putting a monument to the stone tablets across the street from the U.S. Supreme Court.

Faith and Action says on its Web site that it plans to unveil the waist-high, 850-pound granite sculpture Saturday on the front lawn of the rowhouse on Second Street NE where the national group's offices are. But the group apparently doesn't have the approval it needs from at least two agencies, city officials and neighborhood activists said.

Faith and Action's president, the Rev. Robert Schenck, declined to return phone calls yesterday, as did his spokesman. On its Web site, the group said it tried unsuccessfully for five years to get the proper permits and decided to go ahead with the unveiling based on "common law that governs garden displays."

The sculpture "will be visible to the nine justices as they arrive and leave each day," the site said in explaining why the group undertook the project.

The house sits directly across a narrow street from the Supreme Court, and the Web site encourages people coming to Saturday's event to use the free parking in the court's employee parking lot. Yesterday, the sculpture was wrapped in dark plastic and red tape, its two-tablet shape clearly visible.

DOJ_NMG_0031016

Schenck, a well-known evangelical activist, also heads the National Clergy Council and last year said he blessed every piece of furniture in the Senate hearing rooms where the Judiciary Committee considered the nomination of now-Chief Justice John Roberts.

Promoting the public display of the Ten Commandments is a central part of Faith and Action's mission. It presents stone tablets of the commandments to elected and appointed officials and asks them to "display and obey" the gift.

"At the heart of the Ten Commandments Project is an effort to restore the moral foundations of American culture," the group says in a brochure at its offices, where two reproductions of the commandments are on display on the first floor.

It wasn't clear yesterday how long Faith and Action has been at the Second Street location, although District property records show that a group called P&R Schenck Associates in Evangelism purchased the rowhouse in March.

Erik Linden, a spokesman for the city's Department of Transportation, said he believes the group needs a public space permit from the department before displaying the monument. And Linden and Bill Sisolak, a local advisory neighborhood commissioner and chairman of the commission's zoning committee, said Faith and Action also would need the approval of the Historic Preservation Review Board because its house sits in a historic district.

"We are notifying [Schenck] that he needs a permit to occupy what is deemed a public space, and we will work with him to ensure that he understands what he needs to complete the process," Linden said. He did not offer details about what a property owner in that area would need for a permit to be approved.

Linden said Faith and Action applied to the city in 2001 for a permit. However, he could not confirm last night which agency received the application or why it wasn't granted. He said no applications had been filed since that initial one.

The group said on its Web site that it tried to get permits from various agencies, including the city's Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs. However, the DCRA does not govern public space displays and would not have been the right agency to apply to, said Karyn-Siobhan Robinson, a DCRA spokeswoman. She could not immediately confirm whether the group had applied to the agency.

Sisolak said yesterday that he had not heard about the monument proposal until contacted by the news media. Local Advisory Neighborhood Commission secretary Karen Wirt said she had not either but also said she hadn't had a chance to review all her records back to 2001.

The religious nature of the display should not be the main factor in the decision about the permits, Sisolak said.

"It's a large object not in keeping with the historic nature of the neighborhood," Sisolak said. "This guy may be within his rights. I don't know. But in my opinion it doesn't appear to be in compliance."

ANTITRUST:

Antitrust Officials Said To Be Watching Napster Suit (LAT)

By Joseph Menn, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

The U.S. is examining claims of collusion by labels to limit legitimate downloads, sources say.

Maybe Napster had it right.

Federal antitrust investigators are reexamining the online music pioneer's long-standing claims that the major record labels improperly conspired to keep authorized downloads off the Internet, said people familiar with the matter.

Justice Department officials are closely tracking a court fight in federal court in San Francisco between the labels and the financial backers of the original Napster, the file-sharing network that debuted in 2001 and became emblematic of online piracy.

Napster filed for bankruptcy protection, and the name was bought and assumed by Roxio Inc. in 2002.

The labels are suing venture capital firm Hummer Winblad Venture Partners and German conglomerate Bertelsmann, which owns label BMG, accusing them of contributing to the piracy by the first Napster users.

As part of its defense, Hummer Winblad has alleged that the labels violated antitrust laws by colluding to refuse to license their music to Napster for legitimate distribution.

Antitrust investigators have asked both sides to keep them apprised by passing along filings in the case, said music industry sources who asked not to be identified because of the sensitive nature of the government's inquiries.

It is unclear whether the review has led to a full reopening of an inquiry that ended in 2003, when the department announced it hadn't found evidence that the major labels manipulated the digital music market.

Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona declined to comment, but investigators there were previously reported to be examining how present-day prices are set on Apple Computer Inc.'s iTunes Music Store and other authorized services.

DOJ_NMG_0031017

The San Francisco suit by Universal Music Group and EMI Group accuses Hummer Winblad and Bertelsmann of having controlled Napster and therefore sharing liability for the massive copyright infringement previously committed by Napster's tens of millions of users.

Hummer Winblad's lawyers countered that the labels broke antitrust and copyright laws by refusing to license music to Napster on reasonable terms while sending heavily restricted tracks to two industry-sponsored joint ventures, MusicNet and Pressplay. Those two services had been investigated by the Justice Department from 2001 to 2003.

The Hummer Winblad lawyers turned up discrepancies between what the labels had told the Justice Department about their practices then and what they told others. And the documents that the labels submitted to the Justice Department had some serious omissions, including a full discussion of clauses that guaranteed some labels the same licensing terms that their rivals received.

Those clauses, known as "most-favored-nation" provisions, suggested collusion, said the judge in the Napster case, Marilyn Hall Patel.

The documents were so suspicious that Patel said last month that they were "deliberately misleading." She ordered additional material turned over under what is known as the "crime-fraud exception" to the privilege that protects communications between lawyers and their clients from disclosure.

Universal and EMI appealed that ruling and this month won a stay until their arguments could be heard by a higher court.

Even before Patel's ruling, the Justice Department was intrigued. Once it got the Hummer Winblad team's legal brief, it asked the Universal and EMI attorneys to send along whatever they filed in their defense, a music industry source said.

New York Atty. Gen. Eliot Spitzer also is investigating the most-favored-nation clauses and has issued subpoenas to the major record labels.

Most of the labels declined to comment on the renewed Justice Department interest.

But Jeanne Meyer, EMI North America's senior vice president, said the company believed that Patel had "misconstrued" the relevant documents.

"EMI was forthright with the Department of Justice in its 2001-03 investigation and cooperated with that inquiry, and we are confident that Judge Patel's ruling will be reversed," Meyer said.

Napster Suit Sparks Controversy (UPI/UPI)

United Press International, June 1, 2006

LOS ANGELES, May 31 (UPI) -- A federal court case in San Francisco over internet music piracy has gained the attention of federal antitrust officials.

Major record labels are suing the original Napster's financial backers for supporting the piracy-linked network.

One of the defendants, Hummer Winbald, has responded by accusing the labels of not allowing license of their music to Napster while providing such to other ventures.

Winbald's lawyers provided evidence of the labels' collusion which prompted the case's judge and the Justice Department to request additional materials from the labels and their attorneys.

The Los Angeles Times reports previous documents given to the Justice Department from the labels had major omissions, specifically regarding licensure.

In 2003, a federal inquiry into possible antitrust allegations against major music labels was dismissed due to lack of evidence.

Many of the major labels declined to comment on these newest allegations.

Google Unlikely To Make Own Web Browser (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - Google Inc. CEO Eric Schmidt on Wednesday told industry analysts the online search engine leader is unlikely to create its own Web browser, even though the company remains worried about being slighted by the next version of Microsoft Corp.'s Internet Explorer.

Responding to a question during a conference call, Schmidt said Google sees little need to develop its own browser because most people seem satisfied with Explorer and rivals such as Firefox, Apple Computer Inc.'s Safari and Opera.

Mountain View, Calif.-based Google already has a search toolbar installed in Firefox as part of its partnership with the Mozilla open source software project that introduced the browser in 2004.

"We would not build a browser just for the fun of building a browser," Schmidt said.

DOJ_NMG_0031018

Later in the call, Schmidt reiterated Google's concerns about Microsoft programming the next version of its Internet Explorer to steer more traffic to its own Internet search engine.

Google informally complained to the U.S. Justice Department about Microsoft's plans, but regulators decided they didn't need to intervene. Schmidt said Google still hopes Microsoft will make it easier for Explorer users to set up other search engines in the browser.

The next version of Explorer will be included in Microsoft's Vista, a long-awaited upgrade of the Windows operating system due out next year.

"We want to make sure the use of the power of Windows is done in a correct and legally appropriate way," Schmidt said.

Google reigns as the dominant Internet search engine with a 43 percent share of the U.S. market through April, well ahead of Yahoo Inc. at 28 percent and Microsoft's MSN at 13 percent, according to comScore Media Metrix.

Schmidt's comments occurred during a question-and-answer session that Google organized in an effort to improve its communication with Wall Street. Analysts and investors have complained about Google's cryptic ways since the company's initial public offering in August 2004 and now management is trying to change that perception without backing down from its policy against sharing its financial projections.

The presentation didn't seem to make much of an impression. Google's shares were up slightly when the conference call began, but then backtracked to close with a 12 cent decrease at $371.82 on the Nasdaq Stock Market. The stock lost another 82 cents in late-session trade.

Google covered familiar territory Wednesday, telling analysts to expect major investments heavily in new computer equipment and offices to accommodate the company's growing audience and work force.

The company spent $345 million on capital expenditures during the first quarter, including $112 million on information technology assets and $41 million on land and buildings.

Chief Financial Officer George Reyes said Google's hiring spree will continue at its recent pace, which has been increasing the company's work force by 14 percent to 20 percent every three months. In the past year, Google nearly doubled its payroll to just under 6,800 employees through March.

Akron Paper, 5 Others Await Word On Auction By McClatchy (AP)

By Thomas J. Sheeran

AP, June 1, 2006

CLEVELAND - Six former Knight Ridder Inc. newspapers awaited word Wednesday on possible suitors as the deadline passed for bidding on the mid- and small-sized papers.

There was no immediate word on how many bids were submitted, when new owner McClatchy Co. might decide on possible buyers or whether the papers would be sold as a group or one by one.

McClatchy, based in Sacramento, Calif., bought Knight's Ridder 32 newspapers in March and decided to sell 12 largely because they were in slower-growing markets.

With buyers found for six larger newspapers - including The Philadelphia Inquirer - McClatchy turned its attention to the six smallest. Among those, most attention has focused on the Akron Beacon Journal, the largest of the six remaining papers and once the flagship of Knight Ridder.

Advance Publications in New York, parent company of the Beacon Journal's biggest competitor and Ohio's largest newspaper, The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer, was believed to be among the possible bidders for the Akron newspaper. The papers are 40 miles apart and compete in some of the faster growing Cleveland and Akron suburbs, including Medina County and northern Summit County.

Copley Newspapers, the parent of Akron competitor The (Canton) Repository, also reportedly was interested in the Beacon Journal, but Hal Fuson, chief legal officer for San Diego-based Copley, said Wednesday that the chain did not make a bid.

Merging nearby papers might offer advantages through joint advertising sales and combined business side, printing and reporting work. Savings through merged operations would make sense for Advance, according to Larry Grimes, president of the W.B. Grimes newspaper brokerage in Gaithersburg, Md. He said he has heard of strong interest in all six papers but had no direct knowledge.

The remaining five papers to be sold were the American News in Aberdeen, S.D.; the Duluth News Tribune in Minnesota; the Grand Forks Herald in North Dakota; The News-Sentinel in Fort Wayne, Ind.; and the Times Leader in Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

Other possible bidders that have been mentioned include Yucaipa Cos. of Los Angeles, a financial backer for newspaper unions; Black Press Ltd. of Vancouver, British Columbia; and HM Capital Partners of Dallas.

McClatchy and HM Capital had no comment Wednesday. Advance, Black and Yucaipa didn't immediately return messages seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0031019

McClatchy previously agreed to sell The Philadelphia Inquirer and the Philadelphia Daily News to a Philadelphia investment group and to sell four other newspapers to MediaNews Group Inc., a privately held company based in Denver.

The Beacon Journal has won four Pulitzer Prizes, journalism's highest honors. The newspaper has average weekday circulation of about 128,000 daily, down 7.4 percent over the same period last year. The population of Akron, once the nation's tire-making capital, has been stable in recent years, down about 2 percent since 2000 to about 220,000.

An industry report in early May showed daily circulation fell 2.5 percent at U.S. newspapers in the six-month period ending in March. Newspaper circulation has been in general decline for years as many people, particularly young adults, turn to other media outlets including cable TV and the Internet for news and information.

Charles Knight bought the newspaper in 1903 and became publisher four years later.

His son, John S. Knight, became editor and publisher in 1933. He began a series of buys that made the Beacon the flagship of one of the nation's largest newspaper groups, Knight Newspapers. In 1974, the group merged with Ridder Publications to become Knight Ridder Inc.

EU Fines For Four Chemical Groups In Cartel (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

The European Union's top antitrust regulator yesterday imposed fines totalling €344.6m ($441.9m) on four chemical groups for operating a cartel in the market for plexiglas and similar acrylic glass products.

French oil group Total's Arkema unit was worst-affected, with a fine of €219.1m. Britain's ICI was ordered to pay €91.4m. Lucite, another UK group, was fined €25m and Quinn Barlo of Ireland €9m. Both Arkema and ICI saw fines increased by 50 per cent because of convictions in other cartel cases.

Degussa, a German chemical group and another member of the cartel, escaped punishment because it blew the whistle on its co-conspirators. The Commission said Degussa would otherwise have been made to pay €264.5m - the highest single fine of all the members.

Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, said: "Cartels are a scourge. I am shocked that companies like ICI and Arkema have been fined once again. These fines will serve as a cold shower for the management and shareholders of all these companies, who have to realise that cartels cannot and will not be tolerated."

The Commission said it had obtained handwritten notes of a meeting in a Dublin hotel room in October 1999, at which the companies agreed to raise their prices as of January 2000.

"Records of a meeting at a hotel in Germany in August 2000 reveal that the meeting focused on a co-ordinated price increase for November 2000," it added.

Acrylic glass is used for a wide range of products, including headlamps and tail-lights, for optical media such as DVDs and lenses and household products such as baths and showers. The EU market for acrylic glass products is worth about €665m a year, a Commission spokesman said.

Yesterday's total fine was the fourth-highest imposed by the Commission in a cartel case, and comes less than a month after the regulator slapped fines totalling €388m on another chemicals cartel. Again, Degussa had blown the whistle on the illegal arrangement and so escaped a fine of €130m - meaning the company saved itself nearly €400m in cartel fines in the space of four weeks.

EU Punishes Acrylic Glass Cartel With $442 Million in Fines

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- The European Commission on Wednesday imposed fines of about $442 million on four companies for fixing prices over a six-year period on acrylic glass which is widely used in cars, household appliances and DVDs.

European Union regulators said they had uncovered business behavior that was a "very serious infringement" of EU antitrust rules.

Cartels "allow the participants to shield themselves from competition, to charge higher prices and to be protected from the need to innovate," said EU spokesman Jonathan Todd. "Their customers -- both companies and final consumers -- pay the price in terms of higher prices and a narrower choice of products."

DOJ_NMG_0031020

French oil company Total SA's chemical unit Arkema was fined 219 million euros ($281 million) -- the fourth largest fine levied by the EU in such a case.

Britain's Imperial Chemical Industries PLC was ordered to pay 91 million euros ($117 million), British chemical company Lucite International was fined 25 million euros ($32 million) and Ireland's Quinn Group Ltd. has to pay 9 million euros ($11.5 million).

The EU said the fines took account of the size of the European market, worth around 665 million euros ($854 million) annually.

A fifth company, Germany's Degussa SA, escaped a 264 million euro ($339 million) fine because it was the first to blow the whistle on the cartel.

The EU said the five companies agreed, fixed and monitored target prices for acrylic glass, and exchanged commercially important and confidential information in Europe between 1997 and 2002.

Acrylic glass -- sold under trade names such as perspex, Plexiglas and Lucite -- is also used in lenses, electronics, baths and showers.

The companies have two months to appeal the fine to an EU court. If the fines are upheld, the money goes into the EU budget, usually funded by EU governments. The Commission said the fines ultimately reduce the burden on individual taxpayers.

Quinn Group bought the offending Barlo business after the cartel ended. ICI said the fine targeted its ICI Acrylics unit which was sold in 1999.

EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said she was shocked that ICI and Arkema -- now owned by Total -- had to be fined again. As repeat offenders, both companies saw their fines increased by 50 percent.

"Cartels are a scourge," Kroes said. "These fines will serve as a cold shower for the management and shareholders of all these companies, who have to realize that cartels cannot and will not be tolerated."

Degussa went to EU regulators in December 2002, confessing its role in this cartel and another cartel to fix the price of bleach. The Commission said the rivals met to coordinate price increases in a Dublin hotel room in October 1999 and a German hotel in August 2000.

Both Lucite and Total's group of companies -- Elf Aquitaine, Arkema, Altuglas and Altumax -- had their fines reduced for providing information to regulators.

ICI said it will make a provision for the fine in its second quarter income statement as a special item and will think about filing an appeal.

Todd said two other firms -- BASF AG and Repsol YPF -- had escaped fines even though both received preliminary charge sheets because they had been able to convince regulators that they were not involved to the same extent as the others.

"In the end we could not find them guilty of breaking the competition rules," he said.

Officials Seek More Funds From Exxon Mobil (AP)

By JEANNETTE J. LEE, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) - Federal and state authorities will seek more money from Exxon Mobil Corp. on Thursday to rehabilitate wildlife populations and clean up remaining oil from a devastating spill nearly 20 years ago, Alaska officials said.

Exxon has paid $900 million in restitution for the spill - the nation's largest - which emptied 11 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound in 1989.

A "reopener" provision in the settlement created a window from 2002 to 2006 in which the state and federal governments could claim up to an additional $100 million.

That reopener provision expires Sept. 1. State and federal officials must file a claim 90 days before that date, by the end of this week.

The specifics of the claim, including how much will be requested from Exxon, have not been released.

"We are going to make a claim, but all the details are still being worked out between the Department of Law and the Department of Justice," John Manly, spokesman for Gov. Frank Murkowski, said Wednesday.

Exxon Mobil spokesman Mark Boudreaux said Wednesday that the company hadn't been notified that the Justice Department would seek a reopener.

Hundreds of studies by Exxon have shown the environmental impact to be less serious than claimed by other researchers. Boudreaux said Exxon didn't know of any new scientific studies that would merit reopening the settlement.

DOJ_NMG_0031021

"We believe Prince William Sound is healthy, it's robust, it's thriving," Boudreaux said.

To claim the money, state and federal officials must prove that a population, habitat or species had suffered loss or decline in the area of the spill, and that loss can be linked to the spill. They also must prove the loss was not known or anticipated when the settlement was signed.

"The claim will include what we believe, based on good science, is attributable to the spill and lay out a plan on how to deal with the existing problems," said Mark Morones, spokesman for the state Department of Law.

A study published in May in the American Chemical Society journal and Environmental Science & Technology found that oil spilled from the Exxon Valdez extends farther into Alaska tidal waters than previously thought and could be causing long-term harm to wildlife.

Alaska Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski sought to cut the process short by asking Irving, Texas-based Exxon Mobil to voluntarily commit $100 million more to restoring the Sound.

The company, whose $36.1 billion in earnings last year were the highest ever by any U.S. corporation, rejected that proposal.

More than $100 million of the $900 million Exxon has paid has not yet been spent. Officials said they expect that to become an issue in negotiations.

US Judge Says Sea Lion Research Violates Animal Protection Laws (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jeannette J. Lee, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - ANCHORAGE, Alaska-A judge ruled the federal government must halt studies of threatened and endangered Steller sea lions because it did not properly asses how certain research techniques might harm the animals.

The National Marine Fisheries Service approved permits for research activities that include hot branding and tissue sampling of thousands of sea lions each year, said the suit filed last year by the Humane Society of the United States.

"We have concerns about the lack of environmental review, the structure of the research and how it's being done," Jonathan Lovvorn, an attorney for the Humane Society, said Tuesday. "Our main goal is and has always been to have them evaluate the research before authorization. We want to see that happen."

Lovern said they agency needs to better evaluate different research techniques, which range from minimally invasive to lethal.

"We don't oppose research in order to benefit the Steller sea lion," Lovvorn said. "The question is are we doing that here in accordance with the law."

The federal agency failed to comply with the National Environmental Protection Act by not preparing an environmental impact statement, and must give up its research permits, according to the decision on Friday by U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle in Washington, D.C.

The federal agency had issued permits that allowed researchers to attach tracking devices to more than 700 Steller sea lions, brand more than 2,900 and allowed for the incidental deaths of up to 60 of the animals a year, according to court documents.

The permits do not authorize the intentional killing of any Steller sea lions for scientific study, the documents said.

Fisheries service scientists said their research techniques are not harming the overall Steller sea lion population and are necessary to understanding the animals' unexplained decline and how to help them recover.

The research includes population monitoring and foraging and behavior patterns, said Kaja Brix, protected resources division director at the National Marine Fisheries Service's Alaska region office.

"The lack of ability to do the research certainly will have an impact as far as maintaining continuity in our research program and other entities in the state," she said. "They may have to abandon those studies for the time being and resume them once permits are reinstated."

The agency will have to revoke research permits from federal, state and non-goverment agencies studying Steller sea lions, including the Alaska SeaLife Center, North Pacific Universities Consortium, state Department of Fish and Game and the Aleutians East Borough.

Brix said the agency is already conducting an environmental impact statement, but it could be a year before it's completed.

The Steller sea lion habitat roughly follows the rim of the North Pacific Ocean from northern Japan to the south coast of Alaska. The animals also live on California's Channel Islands.

DOJ_NMG_0031022

The number of Steller sea lions in the western stock dropped from about 200,000 originally to 35,000 animals in 2002, federal fisheries scientists estimate. Scientists do not know the original population level of the genetically distinct eastern group, but as of 2002 there were 31,000 animals, with numbers on the rise.

The National Marine Fisheries Service in 1990 listed both populations as threatened. The western population in Alaska was listed as endangered in 1997 after a dramatic decrease was documented.

Deep Trouble As Demand For Coal Rises, Risky Mines Play Bigger Role (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

MCDOWELL, Ky. -- Last September, Timothy D. Hall was drilling holes in the deepest part of a low-roofed coal mine when an explosion thrust him from his drill machine and set him on fire.

He crawled 45 feet to a mudhole inside the mine to douse the flames. The fireball melted the bill of his hard hat, charred his oxygen canister and burned his jacket, according to government investigators. After he was carried outside, but before any pain set in, he was shocked to see the flesh of his fingers had melted together.

Mr. Hall, 36 years old, survived and has regained limited use of his hands. His episode is part of an alarming upswing in coal-mining accidents, at a time when the industry is in the midst of a boom. Since May 20, seven miners have died, bringing the number of workers killed in coal-mine accidents in the U.S. this year to 33 -- compared with 22 for all of last year.

Part of the problem, some say, is a rise in the number of small, undercapitalized mines that have become economical since coal prices have surged. Miners refer to them as "dogholes."

In many cases, small operators work as contractors for big coal companies. The mine where Mr. Hall worked, for instance, was owned by J. & R. Coal Inc., and employed 23 miners. It provided coal to Consol Energy Inc., the fourth-largest coal producer in the U.S.

Roger Bentley, J. & R. Coal's owner, declined to comment on the accident. He said the mine has closed and the company is no longer in business. Thomas Hoffman, a spokesman for Consol Energy, says it reviewed the safety records of Mr. Bentley, as it does for all mine operators it contracts with, and "we thought his safety performance in the past was pretty good."

Despite the recent rash of fatalities, coal mining has gotten safer overall, due to improved technology and mining methods. In the early part of the 20th century, when there were roughly seven times as many coal miners as today, the annual death toll from accidents often exceeded 2,000 miners. In 1950, there were 643 fatalities. By 1990, the number had dropped to 66.

But higher fatality rates at small mines, which many mine-safety experts define as those employing fewer than 50 miners, have plagued the industry even in years when the overall number was falling. A report by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, which examined data from 1988 to 1997, found the fatality rate at coal mines with fewer than 50 employees was 4.24 times the rate at mines with 250 or more workers. According to data from the Labor Department's Mine Safety and Health Administration, in each of the past three years, the fatality rate at underground coal mines with fewer than 50 workers was higher than the rate for all underground coal mines.

Small mines tend to open when coal prices rise. The average price of coal from Central Appalachia -- which includes parts of Virginia, Kentucky and West Virginia -- was $58 per ton last year, up from $29 in 2002. Prices are rising in part because of increased demand for coal to generate electricity from utilities seeking an alternative to natural gas as its price has risen. Domestic steelmakers have been using more metallurgical coal, while China's rapid industrialization is also creating demand for huge amounts of coal to make steel.

"As long as prices stay high, you're going to get the marginal producers coming in to capture a share of the market," says R. Larry Grayson, chairman of the department of mining and nuclear engineering at the University of Missouri-Rolla. He says the danger of accidents increases when smaller mines proliferate because they tend to have less-experienced workers, use older equipment and mine harder-to-reach coal seams that are passed over by big companies.

Mines with fewer than 50 employees represent about 25% of all underground coal-mining jobs, according to MSHA.

Fourteen of last year's 22 deaths at underground mines, surface mines and coal-preparation plants occurred at operations with fewer than 50 employees, according to MSHA data. Of the 33 deaths this year, 11 occurred at mines with fewer than 50 employees. Five miners were killed last month following an explosion at an underground mine operated by Kentucky Darby LLC of Middlesboro, Ky., which employed 34 miners, according to MSHA. Repeated calls to the mine's office went unanswered.

DOJ_NMG_0031023

"All of a sudden we're having a horrendous year in both West Virginia and Kentucky, and it's unacceptable," says Bill Caylor, president of the Kentucky Coal Association, which represents mostly big coal operators, many of which hire small contractors. But he says overall, "we've made tremendous strides and we're still pushing for safety."

Most fatalities that occur in mines of any size are the result of "freak accidents," and some are due to human error, says Mr. Caylor. The term "dogholes" is a sensational one, used by mine-safety "zealots," he adds. "But there is some legitimacy to this," he says. "There are some operators that are ruthless that have been the bad apple in the entire barrel."

More operators have opened mines to "try to make a quick profit because the coal market is high right now," says Dennis O'Dell, administrator of occupational health and safety for the United Mine Workers of America. Small mines are almost entirely nonunion, and miner advocates say workers at such operations often don't have the same protections as those at big unionized mines.

Of the 33 coal miners killed this year, three worked at unionized mines that employed at least 100 miners, according to MSHA. The other 30 worked at nonunion mines.

"More miners are at risk because of undercapitalized mines," says Tony Oppegard, a former MSHA official during the Clinton administration who is now a lawyer in Lexington, Ky., representing miners and their families. "I think the deaths are going to mount with the demand for coal."

Workers at small mines tend to be less experienced and more economically desperate than those at big mines, says Mr. Oppegard. "You've got this permanent base of unemployed people in eastern Kentucky," he says. "You'll always have people who are willing to work under whatever conditions that you impose."

Poor conditions in small operations have been linked to deaths. The 13th coal miner killed this year, Cornelius Yates, died Jan. 10 in a Pikeville, Ky., mine that employed nine. The 44-year-old was operating a machine used to drive six-foot-long bolts into the mine roof to secure it when the roof collapsed and killed him.

In that case, federal investigators determined the roof was unstable. "The condition was widespread and obvious and should have been detected by a reasonable prudent mine examiner," investigators wrote. The company was cited for safety violations related to the accident, but fines haven't been set yet, says MSHA.

James H. Blevins, owner of Maverick Mining Co., in Robinson Creek, Ky., which operated the mine, declined to comment.

Mr. Caylor, of the Kentucky Coal Association, believes the best way to improve safety is for state and federal inspectors to observe the working habits of a miner "and teach him how to work safer, rather than sitting there as a policeman, writing a ticket."

Others say enforcement needs to be tightened. In February, MSHA announced plans to toughen penalties for mine operators. One step: raising the maximum penalty for flagrant violations to $220,000 from $60,000. The agency said its penalty structure is 25 years old and needs updating.

Last week, the U.S. Senate passed broad mine-safety legislation that requires coal mines to store more oxygen underground, sets stricter fines and mandates use of wireless communications devices in mines within three years, among other things. The bill is pending in the House.

MSHA has recognized safety woes of small mines. In 2003, it opened the Small Mine Office to help mines with five or fewer employees, by providing safety guides, among other things. Mines of this size "do not have the resources to have sophisticated health-and-safety programs," said David Dye, MSHA's acting administrator, in a speech last fall.

"Technology is one of the factors that has led to improvements in mining safety, and larger mines are better able to take advantage of it," says Carol Raulston, spokeswoman for the National Mining Association, which represents big operators.

Even though coal prices are up, margins can still be tight for small operators. It often costs more per ton to extract coal from lower-quality seams. Many small operators don't own the land they mine; instead they mine on a contract basis, selling the coal at below-market prices to larger operators who own the mineral rights to the property.

Ron D. Bowling, who owns a company that plans to start operations this month at a small surface coal mine in Pike County, Ky., says higher prices for mining equipment and diesel fuel are also squeezing small operators. But he says most mine owners are diligent about safety.

"All the people I know in the business, their worst nightmare is getting someone hurt on the job," says Mr. Bowling, who plans to employ 12 to 15 people at his mine.

Some experts believe drug use among miners could be contributing to accidents, and small mines often do less drug-screening than large ones. But as another recent accident at a small mine shows, there can be a mix of factors.

In December, David Sherman Morris, Jr., a 29-year-old shuttle-car operator, was killed at a 31-employee coal mine operated by H&D Mining Inc., of Cumberland, Ky. He was struck by a loaded coal hauler, used to transport coal inside the mine. The hauler severed Mr. Morris's left leg above the ankle and crushed his right leg, according to an MSHA report.

A toxicology report of Mr. Morris's blood and urine found opiates as well as cannabinoid metabolites, which are typically generated from marijuana use. Unlike conventional alcohol testing, which measures impairment at the time of the test, drug testing measures usage in recent days or even weeks. A drug test administered on the operator of the coal hauler shortly after the accident also found opiates and cannabinoid metabolites.

MSHA investigators didn't speculate on whether any drug-related impairment contributed to the accident. Instead, they pointed to errors and negligence of mine management. Investigators said a major contributing cause was that side boards -- which allow more coal to be carried -- had been attached to the coal hauler, and coal was loaded 60 inches high, obstructing the view of the person operating it. The height of the mine where the accident occurred was 67 inches.

Struck From Behind

The company's procedures for operating equipment underground placed Mr. Morris in a dangerous position when he was struck from behind, investigators said. They also determined "this injury became a fatality because basic first-aid was not properly performed" by mine personnel. No fine has been issued for the accident yet, according to MSHA.

James H. Hurley, a co-owner of H&D Mining, says the accident wasn't the company's fault. "It was just an accident," he says. "It was no fault of equipment." He also says he doesn't think better first aid would have kept the miner alive.

Mr. Hurley says state and federal inspectors who visited the mine roughly every two weeks didn't complain about the sideboards before the accident, adding that the sideboards were put on by the manufacturer and that other operators are still using them. He has since removed them.

Drugs could have played a role, Mr. Hurley says. Since the accident, he says H&D has started drug testing all new employees and randomly testing current ones.

Mine owners say they are watched closely by federal and state inspectors who cite operators for numerous minor violations, such as not having the proper paperwork on hand, as well as more serious ones.

In many cases, however, fines issued by MSHA are appealed by coal operators, and the agency says 10% to 15% go unpaid. MSHA says it doesn't have authority to shut down mines if fines aren't paid. In February, MSHA filed what it called "precedent-setting" lawsuits against two Kentucky coal operators to force payment of long-overdue fines.

Multiple Risks

Miners say raising safety concerns at small mines can mean risking one's job, as well as future employment at other mines. Mr. Hall, who was burned in the explosion last fall, says he complained several times to management that the drill he used became dangerously hot while he was operating it. He says he was rebuffed by the mine's superintendent.

Sitting in his house in McDowell, Ky., in a room that serves as a living room and a bedroom for himself, his wife and two children, Mr. Hall, a miner his entire adult life, worries he won't be able to work again. To demonstrate the limited use of his hands, he bends his wrists slightly, and the scarred skin goes taut and white. "I don't think I could ever go back underground," he says. "I still have nightmares."

As a drill operator working in a mine that was 35 inches high, on average, Mr. Hall says he earned $18 an hour. He now receives roughly $2,200 in workers' compensation payments each month.

In February, Phil Stalnaker, a lawyer in Coal Run, Ky., who is representing Mr. Hall, filed a suit against J. & R. Coal and Mr. Bentley in Letcher County Circuit Court, alleging that Mr. Hall's application for workers' compensation benefits played a significant role in his termination from the company several weeks after the accident. Darrell Hall, an attorney in Whitesburg, Ky., who is representing J. & R. Coal, declined to comment on the case.

In March, MSHA fined J. & R. Coal $139,300, saying the accident involving Mr. Hall occurred "as a result of the operator's high negligence." MSHA cited the company for not keeping his drill and methane meters in proper condition, among other things. The fine hasn't been paid.

Mr. Bentley, the former owner of J. & R. Coal, didn't return calls seeking comment on payment of the fine.

Hints Of Oil Bonanzas Beneath Arctic Ocean (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The studies on Arctic sediment that appear today in the journal Nature tell a dramatic story of polar warming and cooling over millions of years. But what they tell petroleum geologists may be just as striking.

Though there is little mention of it in the papers, some scientists involved in the work said the huge amounts of organic material from dead algae and plants embedded in the ancient sedimentary layers suggested that the center of the Arctic Ocean could hold vast oil deposits.

Several of the researchers said they were reluctant to focus on that aspect of the work, saying it would be unfortunate if their climate studies prompted new oil exploration that could liberate more greenhouse gases and further warm the climate.

But one of the authors, Henk Brinkhuis of the University of Utrecht in the Netherlands, was not shy when he first pointed this out to reporters in 2004. This week, he said he remained confident that the prospect was real.

DOJ_NMG_0031025

"The entire Arctic rim is already one big exploration machine," Dr. Brinkhuis said. "I was nearly crucified for talking about this by some of the more politically environmentally friendly people out there. But it's a fact."

If the oil exists, it would probably take decades to develop techniques for exploiting such midocean deposits, Dr. Brinkhuis and other scientists said.

Still, a quarter of the world's undiscovered oil and gas resources lie in the Arctic, according to the United States Geological Survey.

Oil companies are clearly interested in what may lie beneath the sea, said Kathryn Moran, a professor of ocean engineering at the University of Rhode Island who was a chief scientist on the drilling project that led to the new studies.

Dr. Moran said she recently gave a talk on the project at the University of Alaska, Fairbanks, and was invited at the last minute by BP, the giant oil company, to stop over in Anchorage to present the talk to 30 petroleum geologists.

"They've definitely taken note," Dr. Moran said.

Studies Portray Tropical Arctic In Distant Past (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The first detailed analysis of an extraordinary climatic and biological record from the seabed near the North Pole shows that 55 million years ago the Arctic Ocean was much warmer than scientists imagined — a Floridian year-round average of 74 degrees.

The findings, published today in three papers in the journal Nature, fill in a blank spot in scientists' understanding of climate history. And while they show that much remains to be learned about climate change, they suggest that scientists have greatly underestimated the power of heat-trapping gases to warm the Arctic.

Previous computer simulations, done without the benefit of seabed sampling, did not suggest an ancient Arctic that was nearly so warm, the authors said. So the simulations must have missed elements that lead to greater warming.

"Something extra happens when you push the world into a warmer world, and we just don't understand what it is," said one lead author, Henk Brinkhuis, an expert on ancient Arctic ecology at the University of Utrecht in the Netherlands.

The studies draw on the work of a pioneering 2004 expedition that defied the Arctic Ocean ice and pulled the first significant samples from the ancient layered seabed 150 miles from the North Pole: 1,400 feet of slender shafts of muck, fossils of ancient organisms and rock representing a climate history that dates back 56 million years.

While there is ample fossil evidence around the edges of the Arctic Ocean showing great past swings in climate, until now the sediment samples from the undersea depths had gone back less than 400,000 years.

The new analysis confirms that the Arctic Ocean warmed remarkably 55 million years ago, which is when many scientists say the extraordinary planetwide warm-up called the Paleocene Eocene Thermal Maximum must have been caused by an enormous outburst of heat-trapping, or greenhouse, gases like methane and carbon dioxide. But no one has found a clear cause for the gas discharge. Almost all climate experts agree that the present-day gas buildup is predominantly a result of emissions from smokestacks, tailpipes and burning forests.

The samples also chronicle the subsequent cooling, with many ups and downs, that the researchers say began about 45 million years ago and led to the cycles of ice ages and brief warm spells of the last several million years.

Experts not connected with the studies say they support the idea that heat-trapping gases — not slight variations in Earth's orbit — largely determine warming and cooling.

"The new research provides additional important evidence that greenhouse-gas changes controlled much of climate history, which strengthens the argument that greenhouse-gas changes are likely to control much of the climate future," said one such expert, Richard B. Alley, a geoscientist at Pennsylvania State University.

The $12.5 million Arctic Coring Expedition, run by a consortium called the International Ocean Drilling Program, was the first to drill deep into the layers of sediment deposited over millions of years in the Arctic. The samples were gathered late in the summer of 2004 as two icebreakers shattered huge drifting floes so that a third ship could hold its position and bore for core samples.

Estimates of the prevailing temperatures in the different eras represented by the sediments were made in part by tracking the comings and goings of certain algae called dinoflagellates that typically indicate subtropical or tropical conditions.

Because the samples lacked remains of shell-bearing plankton that are usually relied on to provide temperature records, the researchers used a newer method for approximating past temperatures: gauging changes in the chemical composition of the remains of a primitive phylum of microbes called Crenarchaeota.

Some scientists familiar with the research said that while there were still questions about the precision of this method at temperatures like those in the ancient Arctic Ocean, it was clear that the area was warm.

The temperatures recorded in the samples, right through the peak of warming 55 million years ago, were consistently about 18 degrees higher than those projected by computer models trying to "backcast" what the Arctic was like at the time, according to one of the papers.

Another significant discovery came in layers from 49 million years ago, where conditions suddenly fostered the summertime growth of vast mats of an ancient cousin of the Azolla duckweed that now cloaks suburban ponds. The researchers propose that this occurred when straits closed between the Arctic Ocean and the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans.

The flow of water from precipitation and rivers created a great pool of fresh water, but about 800,000 years after the blossoming of duckweed began, it ended with a sudden warming of a few additional degrees. The researchers suggest that this signaled when shifting land formations reconnected the Arctic with the Atlantic, allowing salty, warmer water to flow in, killing off the weed.

The researchers said the sediments held hints that Earth's long slide to colder conditions, and the recent cycle of ice ages and brief thaws, began quite soon after the hothouse conditions 50 million years ago. A centerpiece of their argument is a single pebble, about the size of a chickpea, found in a layer created 45 million years ago.

The stone could have been deposited on the raised undersea ridge only if it had been carried overhead in ice, said Kathryn Moran, a chief scientist on the drilling project, who teaches at the University of Rhode Island.

The stone was probably embedded in an iceberg or perhaps a plate of sea ice that tore free from a gravelly shore. It sank as the ice melted or broke apart, Dr. Moran proposed. Such "dropstones" have long been used to date when an oceanic region has been ice covered or ice free.

The amount of ice-carried debris in the sediment layers began to increase about 14 million years ago, the scientists said. That is also about when the great ice sheet that now weighs down eastern Antarctica originated, Dr. Moran noted. In general, the results from the Arctic drilling project suggest that the cooling and ice buildup at both poles happened in relative lockstep.

This simultaneity tends to support the idea that the cooling was caused by a drop in concentrations of carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping gases, which mix uniformly in the global atmosphere, said Dr. Moran and other members of the team.

Julie Brigham-Grette of the University of Massachusetts, an expert in past Arctic climates who was not connected with the new studies, cautioned against giving too much significance to the single sample, and particularly the single stone from 45 million years ago.

Dr. Brigham-Grette said it was vital to try to mesh the new core results with data gathered around Arctic coasts, where there is plenty of evidence for warm conditions in at least some places as recently as 2.4 million years ago.

Despite her doubts, she said, the project was a stunning achievement.

"It's all very, very exciting to me, because now we can start to rewrite the history of the Arctic," Dr. Brigham-Grette said. "It's like working a giant landscape puzzle of 500 pieces. For a while we only had 100 pieces. Now we have 100 more, and the picture is getting clearer."

Corporate America Warms To Fight Against Global Warming (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Corporate leaders don't normally invite the federal government to raise their taxes. But that's exactly what Paul Anderson is doing.

Anderson, the chairman of Charlotte-based Duke Energy, wants the federal government to fight global warming by taxing companies based on the “greenhouse gases” they pump into the atmosphere — just the sort of big-government remedy the Bush administration says would hobble the economy.

For his efforts, Anderson has been excoriated by conservative talk radio host Rush Limbaugh and threatened with an “exorcism” by an industry peer.

But Anderson, 61, is no closet left-winger. He's a registered Republican, Bush backer and member of the president's Council of Advisors on Science and Technology. That such a Big Business stalwart is demanding federal action on climate change illustrates an unmistakable evolution in corporate thinking, motivated both by evidence that global warming already is affecting the economy and by the prospect of fat profits from new environment-friendly products.

“If we approach this rationally, it will not be disruptive to the economy and will not turn the world upside down and will, at the same time, address the problem,” says Anderson.

Corporate America, which once regarded cries of “global warming” about as favorably as The Communist Manifesto, increasingly is embracing the need for reducing human contributions to the planet's rising temperatures. Forty companies — including Boeing, IBM, John Hancock and Whirlpool — have publicly endorsed the notion that climate change is real by joining a business council organized by the Pew Center on Global Climate Change.

Electric power companies are the single largest industrial emitter of carbon dioxide, the chief chemical culprit in "global warming." But Duke Energy on the East Coast, California's PG&E on the West Coast, and other utilities see mandatory federal emission caps as preferable to the current patchwork of state regulations they confront. A uniform national standard would eliminate costly uncertainties hanging over investment decisions on new multibillion-dollar power plants, they say.

It's not just power companies that are agitating for action. Institutional investors are demanding that companies disclose their financial exposure to future climate changes. Insurers are abandoning underwriting in coastal areas threatened by costly Hurricane Katrina clones, and companies such as General Electric and DuPont are gearing up to prosper from the transition to a carbon-constrained world. Last year, Goldman Sachs Chairman Henry Paulson, now Treasury secretary-designate, warned that the time needed to address climate change was running out.

"There's a sea change underway in American business," says Al Gore, the former vice president. "What's different in business audiences in the past year or so is a new and widespread receptivity, a keen awareness, an eagerness on the part of large numbers to find out how they can take a leadership position. And a recognition, too, that there are profits to be made."

Insurers may prove to be the canaries in the coal mine of climate change. As global temperatures rise, instances of severe weather — hurricanes, tornadoes, even hailstorms — are expected to become more intense and more damaging. Though no single event can be definitively linked to long-term warming of the atmosphere, Mother Nature is getting more costly for insurers.

Annual weather-related insured losses rose from $1 billion in the 1970s to an inflation-adjusted average $15 billion in the past decade, according to Ceres, a coalition of institutional investors and environmental groups. The group said soaring weather-related insurance claims, which it linked to the warming climate, are leading to higher premiums and greater coverage restrictions for policyholders. As private insurers flee vulnerable areas, state and local government "insurers of last resort" are being left with the bill, Ceres said.

After being battered by losses from four Florida hurricanes in 2004, Allstate last year refused to renew policies with 95,000 homeowners and 16,000 commercial property owners in the state.

"We are girding for the onslaught of the next hurricane season," Allstate CEO Ed Liddy said last month. "What's new is the intensity of this (storm) cycle could be a lot worse than things that we've seen before."

Well before climate change turns Iowa into oceanfront property, its financial impact on insurers could affect everything from building codes to land-use policy, says Tim Wagner, director of the Nebraska Department of Insurance, who chairs a National Association of Insurance Commissioners (NAIC) climate-change task force.

The panel was scheduled to kick off its deliberations last year at a September conference in New Orleans, which was washed out by Hurricane Katrina.

In Nebraska, several years of unusually severe hailstorms have prompted insurers to raise deductibles and encourage a shift to hail-resistant roofing — which costs about twice as much as a conventional asphalt roof.

The potential financial impact on insurers is so great that it threatens to paralyze policy-writing in the most vulnerable geographic areas. To ensure the industry has the financial resources to weather repeated catastrophic events, a federal reserve fund financed by a new tax on all insurance policies might be needed, Wagner says.

"Climate change is so big, it's very hard for the man-on-the-street to understand what's taking place. The plain truth of the matter is it's here and it's going to be costly," Wagner says.

A clear sign that climate concerns have moved into the financial mainstream is the growing activism of institutional shareholders. Over the past few years, investors have become increasingly worried about insufficient disclosure about the risks companies face from global warming. Under existing regulations, publicly traded companies are required to disclose to investors any information that could have a "material" impact on their financial results. There are no additional requirements governing climate-change issues.

A changing climate threatens companies throughout the economy with costs from future regulations, the physical effects of a changing landscape, even the danger of massive lawsuits, such as the claims filed against tobacco companies. In 2004, eight states and New York City sued five power companies seeking to force them to cut carbon dioxide emissions. (Last year, a federal district judge dismissed the lawsuit, saying Congress, not the courts, should set environmental policy. The plaintiffs are appealing that decision.)

A recent Mercer Investment Consulting survey of 183 institutional investors found that 44% thought climate change was "very" or "somewhat important" in economic terms. An additional 14% said it would become important within five years.

In February, a London-based investor coalition called the Carbon Disclosure Project sent its fourth annual request for information on greenhouse-gas emissions to 1,800 of the largest publicly traded companies in the world. A total of 211 institutional investors with a collective $31 trillion under management signed the letter — up from the 35 investors representing $4.5 trillion worth of capital who signed the first report.

Among the U.S. signatories: Merrill Lynch, Franklin Templeton, Dreyfus, State Street Global Advisors, New York state and city employee pension funds, and the state treasurers of Maine, Vermont and Oregon.

The nation's largest public pension fund, the $182 billion California Public Employees' Retirement System (Calpers), also signed and has backed shareholder resolutions at Ford Motor and General Motors. “Our focus is to get companies to expand and to improve the disclosure and transparency of environmental data,” says Dennis Johnson, Calpers' senior portfolio manager for corporate governance.

Johnson says the pension fund doesn't plan to sell any of its holdings to force greater disclosure, preferring instead to work with the companies in which it owns shares.

Each year, about 30 corporations confront shareholder resolutions seeking greater disclosure of the potential impact of climate change, according to Mindy Lubbers of Ceres. The past two years, climate change has been the leading source of non-financial shareholder resolutions, according to Gary Guzy of Marsh & McClennan.

In April, a Ceres-backed shareholder resolution requiring Dominion Resources, a Richmond, Va.-based utility, to report on its exposure to climate change was defeated with 22.5% of the votes. But that was almost three times the 8% support a similar measure garnered at last year's annual meeting.

Dominion's management opposed the resolutions, arguing that its environmental officer regularly updated its board and that information on its policies was available to shareholders on the company website. The past two years, more than one dozen electric power companies have issued such reports, according to Ceres.

The Bush administration stirred global controversy by refusing in 2001 to sign the 1997 Kyoto treaty, which would have required the U.S. to sharply reduce carbon dioxide emissions by 2010.

President Bush has repeatedly insisted that mandatory emissions curbs like those contained in the treaty would cost the U.S. economy too much. “I walked away from Kyoto because it would have damaged the American economy, it would have destroyed the American economy, it was a lousy deal for the American economy,” he said in a July interview with British TV network ITV.

Government and private estimates of the annual cost to the $13 trillion U.S. economy of implementing the Kyoto restrictions range from $125 billion to $400 billion.

Yet, the leaders of major U.S. corporations such as General Electric and DuPont say addressing climate change offers the technology-rich USA a chance to make — not lose — big money.

One year ago, Jeff Immelt, GE's chief executive, unveiled a plan to cut his company's greenhouse-gas emissions by more than 40% by 2012. At the same time, Immelt said GE would double its annual revenue from a broad portfolio of environmentally sound products to $20 billion by 2010.

GE identified an opportunity to boost profit by concentrating on environmental technologies after customers in many industries and many countries began demanding help meeting tougher regulations, says Lorraine Bolsinger, the executive in charge of GE's Ecomagination initiative. “I don't see the downside. I know folks say there will be some kind of economic tax. … I'm not sure anyone who worries about that has done the full analysis,” adds Bolsinger.

At DuPont, a previous brush with environmental controversy shaped an early embrace of the climate-change issue. In the late 1980s, the company came under pressure to stop producing chemicals called chlorofluorocarbons, which were blamed for depleting the ozone layer. In 1988, DuPont agreed to do so. That experience helped shape DuPont's response to calls for action to combat climate change, says Linda Fisher, the company's vice president of environment, health and safety. DuPont set its first goal for reducing greenhouse gases in 1991. By 2003, it had trimmed its emissions by 72%.

Along the way, it racked up savings of $3 billion through energy conservation. Example: In plants in Alabama, Tennessee and Missouri, DuPont is replacing natural gas with methane from landfills in its industrial boilers. Elsewhere, the company redesigned scores of industrial processes to squeeze efficiencies from every step of chemicals manufacturing.

“What started as an effort to address our carbon footprint has turned out to be financially a very good thing,” says Fisher.

This fall, DuPont expects to start using corn to produce a chemical called PDO, which is used to make clothing. The Loudon, Tenn., plant will use 40% less energy than traditional oil-based processes, the company says. The resulting reduction in greenhouse-gas emissions is equivalent to removing 22,000 cars from the roads.

Executives say such examples are representative of the environmental gains that could be achieved throughout the economy — if there were federal action. With Europe and Japan having embraced Kyoto, many business leaders in the United States say it is inevitable that the U.S. will eventually adopt similar emission limits. The Senate last year approved a non-binding resolution that called for such action.

The choice for business, they say, is between trying to block the inevitable or trying to shape whatever climate-change policy the government ultimately adopts. The financial stakes are enormous: The wrong policy, no matter how well-intentioned, could cripple the economy in a quest for environmental improvement.

"If we get out and shape it, we can craft a result that works for us and moderates the (economic) impact," says Peter Darbee, CEO of PG&E. "One can always say, 'We won't do it until everybody does it.' But leadership isn't about waiting for everybody to agree. … Leadership is about doing the right thing and doing it early."

The Interior Department's 'Relief Pitcher' (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Even in a big bureaucracy, some things can happen fast.

On his first day on the job this week as secretary of the interior, Dirk Kempthorne found out he is already a defendant in thousands of lawsuits, give or take a few.

Interior's deputy solicitor, David L. Bernhardt, tried to break the news gently, noting that Kempthorne's name was simply replacing that of his predecessor, Gale A. Norton. And in some cases he's not formally named, or the Justice Department is taking the lead. "Don't take it personally," Bernhardt said.

Resolving the long list of lawsuits -- including one accusing the government of cheating American Indians out of as much as $137.2 billion over the past 118 years -- is one of many tasks the former Idaho governor and senator faces as the nation's 49th interior secretary. With 30 months before the administration ends, he must confront everything from a huge maintenance backlog at the national parks to a contentious debate over how to best protect endangered species.

"I'm coming in in the seventh inning. I'm the relief pitcher," Kempthorne, 54, said in an interview in the midst of his first official day, which began at 6:30 a.m. Tuesday, when he left his apartment for a Fox News interview, and ended at 9 p.m., after he polished off Costco sandwiches his staff had brought in and did some paperwork. "I'm going to come in there, and I want to make sure it's a winning series."

Kempthorne spent his first day doing what he does best: stroking the egos of interest-group leaders, chatting up tourists standing by historic memorials he now oversees, and bonding with politicians. Gamely hobbling on the left foot he broke more than a week ago while jogging on uneven pavement, he shook hands with every Interior employee he could spot and signed autographs for schoolchildren before heading to the top of the Washington Monument.

Aware that federal prosecutors are investigating several current and former Interior officials for possible improper ties to disgraced GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Kempthorne began his day with an ethics briefing by agency lawyers, working on an agency-wide memo on professional conduct and asking if he could accept a personalized windbreaker from a political group or a piece of Park Service haberdashery. (Both are fine, as long as the outside gift was reported; a couple of hours later, Kempthorne sported the Park Service baseball cap on the Mall.)

During a lunch with officials from the National Congress of American Indians, he raised the possibility of settling the suit tribal members have lodged against Interior, and he told his staff that President Bush has urged him to use the department as a bridge to its often fractious constituents.

"He said, 'I don't want it to be polarized. I want us to be bipartisan,' " Kempthorne said.

Unlike Norton, who did little to cultivate environmental leaders, Kempthorne has occasionally made overtures to liberal groups. On Tuesday he held a conference call with 25 conservation, environmental and sporting organizations, including the Defenders of Wildlife and Environmental Defense. He used the word "respect" at least a dozen times during the day, telling the environmentalists at the close of their conversation: "This was my way of showing respect for all you men and women."

"The fact that he made the call was more noteworthy than the substance of the call itself," said Michael J. Bean, a senior attorney for Environmental Defense, who has worked with Kempthorne on protecting endangered species. "He's an open and accessible guy, willing to listen to points of view with which he might ultimately disagree."

Other environmentalists pointed out that in the end, Kempthorne usually goes against them. As governor, he resisted the reintroduction of grizzly bears into Idaho's Selway-Bitterroot Wilderness area (he called them "flesh-eating") and called for eradicating wolves in his state "by any means necessary." During his one term in the Senate, he earned a 1 percent voting score from the League of Conservation Voters.

"He might put it in a more charming way, but it's still going to be catering to special interests rather than serving as a steward of our public lands," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, the group's legislative director.

Kempthorne is an optimist, a former University of Idaho student president who revels in the fact that he'd found a sales clerk at the Pentagon City mall to help him pick out ties (he wore a shiny mint-green one on Tuesday) and that his father, who will turn 90 on July 4, will be able to watch fireworks on the Mall from the interior secretary's balcony.

Asked about the environmental impact of mining -- mining, timber and energy firms contributed generously to his gubernatorial and Senate campaigns -- Kempthorne said it's important to remember what mining does for average Americans.

"When we ride on a bicycle, that's brought to us by mining. When you ride in a car, that's brought to you by mining," he said, pausing to display his wedding ring. "This ring was brought to me by mining, but it's also the symbol of my love for my wife."

That's the sort of philosophy that prompted Sen. Larry Craig (R-Idaho) to declare on the Senate floor last week: "I believe in the next 2 1/2 years [that] Dirk Kempthorne presides over the Department of Interior as the second secretary of the interior of this Bush administration, he will, by his presence and the efforts currently underway, actually produce more energy for this nation and our nation's energy consumers than will the secretary of energy."

Kempthorne shies away from such talk. He says he hopes a combination of drilling and alternative energy sources will help wean the United States from its dependence on foreign oil.

People have underestimated Kempthorne in the past, said the Idaho Conservation League's executive director, Rick Johnson: "He's viewed as not a high-powered dude, and there's more going on there."

But Johnson, who has negotiated with Kempthorne over environmental issues, suggested it will be hard for him to leave a mark or to broker meaningful compromises among farmers and American Indians, environmentalists and oil and gas developers, and other warring factions.

"The administration was looking for someone to keep a steady hand on the tiller," Johnson said. "I don't think he'll have that much of an impact."

Upper Sioux Tribe To Banish Drug Offenders (AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

GRANITE FALLS, Minn. - A small American Indian reservation in southwest Minnesota plans to banish drug offenders.

The plan targets anyone who commits a drug crime on the Upper Sioux's reservation land in southwest Minnesota. The individual is automatically prohibited from setting foot on the reservation.

Tribal courts will decide how long the banishment lasts. The banned individual will retain tribal membership.

The policy also includes anyone who commits gang-related or violent crimes. The new law was passed earlier this month as part of the tribe's "zero tolerance" policy.

"Our goal is to ensure the safety of our members, their children, our tribal lands, our guests to our tribal lands," said Kevin Jensvold, chairman of the Upper Sioux's governing Board of Trustees. "Our survival depends on upon our ability to face this enemy."

Too often government refrains from taking strong stands against serious problems, he said. And drugs are a serious problem. Jensvold said no one can say the Upper Sioux were too timid to take a stand.

Banishment has a long history in Indian culture, although the Upper Sioux version is less harsh than tradition banishment, which in ancient times treated offenders as if they were dead.

Jensvold said the Upper Sioux policy is a tough love approach and is designed to encourage rehabilitation. "We are here to assist our members to refrain or recover," he said. "We are here to demonstrate that we are a tribal nation who care."

The push for the new policy came after a tribal examination of the dangers of methamphetamine use. Tribal secretary Elitta Gouge said no one knows how extensive drug use is on the reservation, but they know the tribe has to fight back.

"We're going to warn everyone who is a dealer or a supplier that we're going to prosecute to the fullest extent of the law, if they should bring drugs onto the rez," she said.

The Upper Sioux is among the smallest reservations in Minnesota, at about 2 square miles. Many of the tribe's 430 members live off the reservation but nearby.

San Francisco Chronicle Writers Challenge Bonds Leak Subpoena (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

AP, June 1, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury about how they got Barry Bonds' leaked testimony urged a judge on Wednesday to let them off the hook.

The Chronicle's Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, the latest reporters to become entangled in the federal government's ramped-up efforts to investigate leaks, argued that the First Amendment protects reporters and their sources.

In an affidavit accompanying their filing, Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Carl Bernstein wrote to U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins of San Francisco that anonymous sources were instrumental in breaking the Watergate scandal.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams have been have been subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury investigating who leaked them the secret testimony of San Francisco giants slugger Bonds, the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi and other professional athletes.

About two dozen athletes were called before an earlier San Francisco grand jury in 2004 as part of the government's investigation into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative - the California nutritional supplement lab that was exposed as a steroid ring.

The Chronicle published the testimony in a series of stories beginning in late 2004. Both Fainaru-Wada and Williams say they aren't going to comply with the supoena, which means they could be fined and jailed until they divulge their sources. The reporters also could be jailed for a fixed term for contempt if Jenkins forces them to appear before the grand jury.

Justice Dept. Is Criticized By Ex-Official On Subpoenas (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Subpoenas issued last month to reporters for The San Francisco Chronicle were criticized yesterday by a former chief spokesman for Attorney General John Ashcroft as a "reckless abuse of power."

The former spokesman, Mark Corallo, made similar statements in an affidavit filed in federal court yesterday. He said Mr. Ashcroft's successor, Alberto R. Gonzales, had acted improperly in issuing the subpoenas.

"This is the most reckless abuse of power I have seen in years," Mr. Corallo said in an interview. "They really should be ashamed of themselves."

The subpoenas, part of an effort to identify The Chronicle's sources for its coverage of steroid use in baseball, would not have been authorized by Mr. Ashcroft, Mr. Corallo said. "You just don't ride roughshod over the rights of reporters to gather information from confidential sources," he added.

Mr. Corallo left the Justice Department in 2005. His public relations firm represents, among others, Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser. A spokeswoman for Mr. Ashcroft, who also stepped down in 2005, declined to comment on Mr. Corallo's sworn statement, which was submitted with the reporters' motion to quash the subpoena.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said he could not address the subpoena to the Chronicle reporters. Subpoenas, he said, are "handled consistent with Justice Department guidelines and on a case-by-case basis on facts specific to the case that only those in the Justice Department would be aware of."

Mr. Gonzales has in recent weeks hinted that the Justice Department may move beyond subpoenas for journalists' sources, and pursue the criminal prosecution of reporters under espionage laws for publishing classified information.

Mr. Corallo said the department's attitude toward news organizations "is starting to look like a policy shift, a policy shift for the worse."

Specialists in journalism and First Amendment law said that Mr. Corallo's statement was itself significant evidence of a shift.

"This illustrates in an unmistakable fashion," said Mark Feldstein, director of the journalism program at George Washington University, "that the Gonzales Justice Department has moved so far away from the mainstream of established legal opinion and case law when it comes to press freedom that even judicial conservatives are disturbed by it."

The Chronicle reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, submitted Mr. Corallo's sworn statement along with their motion to quash the subpoenas, which was filed yesterday in Federal District Court in San Francisco.

The articles in The Chronicle that gave rise to the subpoenas had quoted, apparently verbatim, transcripts of grand jury testimony from prominent athletes, including the baseball stars Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi. Whoever provided those transcripts to the reporters may have violated grand jury secrecy rules or a judge's order.

Under the Justice Department's internal guidelines, subpoenas to the press for confidential sources require authorization by the attorney general. Under Mr. Ashcroft, Mr. Corallo said, he and others also had authority to deny such requests.

Mr. Corallo said that in three years as the department's press secretary and public affairs director, he approved a single subpoena to the press, involving what he called a serious national security matter, and turned down many more. One of those he refused, he said in the court filing, concerned "a public corruption case involving leaks of grand jury information."

Mr. Gonzales has defended his decision to issue the subpoenas. "I think it was information that was necessary, that we needed to have in connection with that investigation," he told the editorial board of The Houston Chronicle last month.

Mr. Corallo said he had used a different standard, one rooted in Justice Department policy.

"It has to be a matter of grave national security or impending physical harm to innocent people," he said, "not just, well, this is the only way we're going to be able to get this information."

N.Y. Judge: 40 Years For One Of Biggest Foreign Drug Catches (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 31, 2006

NEW YORK -- A man described as one of the biggest foreign heroin dealers ever extradited to the United States was sentenced Wednesday to 40 years in prison, dodging a life term in a U.S. deal with Colombia that was hotly debated in court.

Ramiro Lopez-Imitola, who prosecutors said headed a heroin trafficking organization in Colombia and Venezuela, was sentenced in U.S. District Court and ordered to forfeit $200 million in assets, though he claimed to be broke.

In a release, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said Lopez-Imitola was "not only one of the biggest heroin traffickers ever extradited to the United States, but he maintained his empire through brutality and corruption."

His sentencing in Manhattan lasted all day as lawyers disputed the meaning of an extradition deal in which the United States agreed he would not be sentenced to life in prison for heading a drug group in Cucuta, Colombia, and Caracas, Venezuela.

The argument over what constitutes a life sentence highlighted a concern the United States faces with other countries when it tries to extradite prisoners into a legal system that demands stiff penalties for drug crimes.

The system yielded to an extent as U.S. District Judge Robert P. Patterson said he took into account the defendant's age, 61, when he decided on a sentence that left him a shot at freedom in his 90s _ for good behavior behind bars and credit for time served.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Neil M. Barofsky had demanded a 60-year prison term, saying the Colombian government had agreed that 60 years would be acceptable since that is the maximum prison term allowed in its own courts.

Defense lawyer Salvador Delgado said a prison term that long would be a life sentence, and he noted that judges in Colombia usually take into account a defendant's age at sentencing. He requested a 10-year sentence.

The lawyer said his client was in frail health and was unlikely to survive much longer than that in prison.

Lopez-Imitola said he was not the "animal they are trying to take to the slaughterhouse."

But the prosecutor told the judge that Lopez-Imitola was a brutal drug lord who led an international heroin trafficking organization that sold $200 million worth of the drug in the United States alone.

He said Lopez-Imitola burned one of his drug couriers with a hot iron because he believed the courier had failed to pay him $100,000 from the sale of heroin and ordered the body of another courier cut open to extract drugs after the man died of an overdose in Miami.

"He has shown absolutely no remorse for his crimes," Barofsky said.

Drug Enforcement Administration special agent John P. Gilbride called the desecration of the drug courier "the extent to which a monster would go in order to make millions from the drug trade."

For more than an hour, Lopez-Imitola denied carrying out the torture and insisted he was unfairly victimized by others before he pleaded guilty March 15, 2005, to drug charges.

"I'm not a man who hates," he said. "I've admitted I'm guilty, but I'm not as guilty as they're making me out to be."

Telford Man Pleads Guilty In Drug Case (GS)

Greeneville Sun, May 31, 2006

A Telford man federal authorities alleged was a key local figure in a decade-long conspiracy to import drugs into Northeast Tennessee pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court here on Monday to two conspiracy charges.

Mark Allen Saults, 34, whose last known address was Old State Route 34 Telford, pleaded guilty before Senior U.S. District Judge Leon Jordan to two counts of a federal indictment.

One indictment count charged Saults with conspiring with others to distribute 15,000 pounds of marijuana.

The second indictment count alleged that Saults conspired to distribute 25 pounds of methamphetamine.

Saults faces the possibility of receiving a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years in prison when he is sentenced by Judge Jordan on Oct. 11, plus up to a $4 million fine and a term of supervised release of from five years to life.

However, according to a plea agreement filed in his case, Saults has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors.

The government, in turn, has agreed to, at the time of sentencing, “bring to the court’s attention the nature, extent, and value” of that cooperation.

Under the plea agreement in his case, Saults also agrees to testify before federal grand juries and during trials if requested to do so by the U.S. Attorney’s office.

Allegedly Part Of Large Ring

During a January press conference in Johnson City, Acting U.S. Attorney James R. Dedrick alleged that Saults and co-defendants that included Greene County resident Richard Glenn Milburn, were members of "one of the largest, if not the largest, drug importation and distribution organizations that Upper East Tennessee has had in a long time."

Dedrick also said that the illegal drug organization in which the indicted men allegedly took part had generated "millions and millions of dollars" over the years.

On Tuesday, Washington County Sheriff Ed Graybeal said he was glad to hear that Saults had pleaded guilty.

Graybeal said the investigation that led to federal charges against Saults, and others, had taken "a lot of drugs off the street."

The Washington County sheriff also praised the cooperation among federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies that led to the federal indictments against Saults and his co-defendants.

Case Against Saults

A court document called an "agreed factual basis" filed in Saults' case states that between January 1995 and December 2005, Saults "did knowingly, intentionally and without authority, conspire with at least one other person to distribute and possess, with the intent to distribute, 15,000 pounds of marijuana and 25 pounds of a mixture of a substance containing methamphetamine ... ."

During the course of the conspiracy, according to court documents, Saults "obtained marijuana and/or methamphetamine from various locations across the country, including Cleveland, Ga., and Albuquerque, N.M., and through co-conspirators and couriers, Saults had the drugs transported to the Eastern District of Tennessee."

The marijuana and methamphetamine, obtained from New Mexico, were acquired by Saults' alleged co-conspirator Sidney Charles Terrell, or from alleged co-conspirators Victor Hugo Vargas and Louis Antonio Medina, and allegedly transported by various individuals, including Doug Keith Davis, to Thomas Turner, in Cleveland, Ga., according to court records.

Saults would then acquire the illegal drugs from Turner for transportation by co-conspirators to the Eastern District of Tennessee, according to court records Subsequently, court records allege, the drugs were distributed in Northeast Tennessee by Saults and others, including: "Richard Glenn Milburn, Travis Brown, Derek Anthony Keys, James Franklin Devotie, Robert Anthony Hampton, Shannon Luttrell and Michael Damon Bawgus."

Saults and Milburn, according to the agreed factual basis, were arrested on Dec. 1, 2005, by agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration when the two came to meet with an informant from whom they allegedly had agreed to purchase 50 pounds of marijuana and two pounds of "pure methamphetamine."

At that time, $36,000 in cash was seized from Saults' person, according to the agreed factual basis.

When he was arrested last Dec. 1, according to the agreed factual basis, officers allegedly found a loaded handgun on Milburn and another firearm behind the seat of his vehicle. In addition, about 14 grams of "crystal methamphetamine" was allegedly seized from Milburn's truck, according to the agreed factual basis.

Trial Set July 31

Trial for Milburn and Victor Hugo Vargas is scheduled to begin on July 31 in U.S. District Court here.

A change of plea hearing for co-defendant Eric Phillip Shawback was scheduled for today in U.S. District Court in Knoxville.

Similar change of plea hearings are scheduled for June 13 in Knoxville for co-defendants Doug Keith Davis, Robert Anthony Hampton and Travis Brown, according to court documents.

A hearing for Hampton originally was scheduled for Tuesday in U.S. District Court here, but it was rescheduled at the request of his attorney, David Leonard.

Shannon Luttrell pleaded guilty earlier, as did Thomas Turner. Both are awaiting sentencing.

Federal Indictment Handed Down For Man From Otis And Salem (LCNG)

Lincoln City News Guard, May 31, 2006

On May 24, a federal grand jury indicted a Salem and Otis resident on multiple charges, including the charge of "human trafficking," according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Ramon Lopez-Montanez, 39, was indicted on charges of forced labor, marijuana manufacturing and use of a false government document.

Lopez-Montanez was investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, U.S. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Oregon State Police, Multnomah County Sheriff's Human Trafficking Task Force, Salem Police Department, Drug Enforcement Administration, Lincoln County Interagency Narcotics Team and the Lincoln County Sheriff's Office.

Lopez was arrested in Salem on May 23. The indictment documents were unsealed on May 24 in preparation for appearance before a magistrate in Portland.

DOJ_NMG_0031034

According to the indictment, Lopez-Montanez is charged with growing marijuana in Salem and Otis and using a false Oregon driver's license to open an account at Wells Fargo Bank in Lincoln City.

Lopez-Montanez is a citizen of Mexico, according to the Department of Justice.

The indictment charges that Lopez-Montanez obtained the "labor and services" of a woman in Mexico "by threats of serious harm to and physical restraint against" this woman and her family and friends. According to the Department of Justice, he also forced her to witness acts of violence against others and subjected her to acts of violence.

"The U.S. Attorney's Office will work closely with our law enforcement partners to investigate and prosecute what amounts to modern-day slavery," said U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut for the District of Oregon. "We will not tolerate the exploitation and abuse of men, women and children who are the victims of human trafficking."

No trial date had been set for Lopez-Montanez as of press deadlines.

Alton Man Receives 25-year Sentence (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, May 31, 2006

A 39-year-old Alton man was sentenced in federal court in East St. Louis Tuesday to 25 years in prison on crack cocaine charges.

Christopher B. Taylor was convicted of distributing and possessing with intent to distribute crack cocaine.

Taylor also was fined and must serve 5 years supervised release after completing his sentence, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

The case was investigated by agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration, federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives and the Alton Police Department. It was prosecuted by Assistant U.S. attorneys Thomas M. Daly and Andrew Simonson.

The case was prosecuted as part of a continuing DEA investigation targeting crack cocaine trafficking in Alton.

Woman Gets Prison In Drug Deal (FLJOURNAL)

Flint Journal (MI), May 31, 2006

FLINT - A woman who delivered an ounce of crack cocaine to undercover investigators last year was sentenced Tuesday to nearly 4 years in prison, even though her attorney argued for probation, saying her involvement in the drug trade was her boyfriend's fault.

U.S. District Judge Paul Gadola sentenced Renee Holmes, 31, to 3 years and 10 months in prison.

"It's a question of role," argued her lawyer, C. Frederick Robinson, before she was sentenced. "Her involvement was minimal in this offense."

He noted that Holmes, a mother of two, had a good employment record, attended church and only "answered her boyfriend's phone" on May 17, 2005 - the date she was charged with delivering crack cocaine to law enforcement authorities.

"She has good standing in the community," said Robinson. "She has no pattern of criminal conduct. She's a victim of her affiliation with her boyfriend."

But the judge noted at Holmes' sentencing Tuesday that she had pleaded guilty for a transaction in which she, not her boyfriend, spoke with a confidential informant who'd been working with law enforcement about the sale of an ounce of crack, and it was Holmes who delivered it and took $850 for it.

"You chose to engage yourself in this business," the judge told her. "It's a very, very serious offense."

Gadola noted that Holmes had a 1994 conviction for carrying a concealed weapon, but that conviction apparently had been suppressed or sealed, and he could not consider it as he sentenced her.

Gadola said Holmes' involvement in the drug trade tended to "melt away" the positive aspects of her life.

"(Crack has) destroyed young people in great numbers, families, neighborhoods, communities," he said.

Holmes and her boyfriend, Damon D. Cooper, were among nine people indicted by a grand jury on federal drug charges last September after an investigation by federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents and Flint police.

Holmes asked for time before she was sentenced to prison so she could make arrangements for the care of her children, but Gadola said she should have dealt with that before she was to be sentenced. Federal rules require a drug offender to be immediately remanded to the Bureau of Prisons, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert W. Haviland said.

Holmes' relatives cried and hugged one another as she was led from the courtroom to start her prison term.

Former Prosecutor's Spouse Fights Cash Seizure (ALBANYTU)

Federal officials say $352,680 found in SUV is tied to drug dealing

ALBANY -- Federal authorities are moving to seize $352,680 in cash that Illinois state troopers confiscated from a car being driven across the country by the husband of a former Albany County prosecutor.

The Justice Department contends the money, which was sealed in shrink-wrap and lined with scented fabric-softener sheets, is the proceeds of drug dealing and therefore subject to seizure.

But Robert L. Schultz, 45, who is married to former Assistant District Attorney Kimberly A. Mariani, is challenging the government's assertion. He filed court papers in Illinois last week arguing that troopers illegally searched his car and authorities cannot keep the money simply because he gave varying accounts of where it came from.

Mariani was fired from her job in December after she invoked her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. She refused to testify before a federal grand jury in Illinois that was investigating her husband, officials said.

The case broke open on Nov. 20 when a trooper stopped Schultz for speeding along Interstate 80 in Atkinson, Ill. Schultz was driving a Nissan Xterra sport utility vehicle that he had rented two days earlier in Fresno, Calif., after he missed a flight to Albany.

The trooper claimed he smelled a strong odor of marijuana coming from inside the car and from Schultz's body. But after authorities impounded the car, they did not find a trace of illegal drugs and have not offered an explanation for the trooper's actions.

"There was no probable cause to search the vehicle in the first place, (the trooper's) assertation that he smelled cannabis was fabricated and merely a pretext to pursue an otherwise illegal search," said a motion filed recently in U.S. District Court in Illinois by Schultz's attorney, Joseph M. McCoy of Albany.

Still, federal authorities contend Schultz, who worked part-time for his father-in-law, Timothy Coughtry, in Altamont, and also owned a small, self-named construction company in California, gave police several accounts of where the money was from and why he was driving it across the country, according to federal authorities.

Schultz told troopers the money was from his parents, whom he described as millionaires, and that it was a down payment for a $500,000 home in Aruba. He also stated it was from his father, who is a professional gambler; that it was an inheritance; that it was a wedding gift for him and his wife; and that it was to pay his in-laws back for a $200,000 loan, according to a federal complaint.

"When Schultz was questioned about why his father vacuumed sealed the currency in plastic bags, he indicated ... that it was just the way he keeps his money," the complaint states. "Schultz also told law enforcement that maybe his mom puts scented fabric softener sheets between the plastic and the money so that the money would not mold."

Attorneys for Mariani and Schultz did return telephone calls seeking comment.

Mariani was interviewed at least once by DEA agents in Albany, according to federal authorities and her attorney, E. Stewart Jones.

Mariani and Schultz, who were married in January 2005 and have shared a home in Altamont, met in California several years ago. He spends most of his time on the West Coast, Jones said previously.

The couple had recently been exploring options for purchasing a home in Aruba, but Jones said nothing was finalized.

Schultz, who was alone in the car that day, has not been charged with any crime.

Mariani joined the Albany County district attorney's office in January 2000, working under former district attorneys Sol Greenberg and Paul A. Clyne.

Defendant In Drug Case Wants Name Of Informant (GC)

Greenwood Commonwealth, May 31, 2006

Kevin Matthews wants to know the identity of the federal informant who turned on him, but the U.S. attorney's office said the law doesn't require them to identify that person until trial time.

The pleading filed by Matthews' attorney, Kenneth Coghlan of Oxford, is the latest in a flurry of paper thrown back and forth in the Greenwood man's federal case.

During raids conducted by agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics in October, Matthews and three other Greenwood men were among the 36 total suspects arrested in a Delta drug sweep.

Matthews remains in jail on federal cocaine charges, and no bond has been set in the case.

Leflore County Sheriff Ricky Banks has identified Matthews as a longtime drug dealer and said he has tried unsuccessfully for the last 25 years to arrest Matthews on drug-related charges.

In court pleadings Matthews' attorney has argued that the judge should dismiss the case against his client because the conspiracy count against him doesn't state particular acts.

DOJ_NMG_0031036

But prosecutors said the indictment meets all the criteria, charging that Matthews conspired with others to distribute cocaine base, or crack, between January 2000 and November 2005.

And, failing the dismissal, Matthews seeks the identity of the informants who lead DEA and MBN agents to him because they will have a key role as witnesses.

Prosecutors told the court in counter-pleadings that the informant "is fearful for his own safety" should his identity become known.

Coghlan also asked the court to allow him to interview Darrell Christian, who is expected to testify against Matthews.

Christian, whose street name is "D," was arrested by DEA agents in Bolivar County last summer with two others at the residence of Mary Sutton, according to court records.

DEA agents discovered about 22 pounds of cocaine and $200,000 cash at the scene.

In July 2005, Christian was indicted by a federal grand jury. He pleaded guilty in November to possession with intent to distribute.

Federal prosecutors have responded to Coghlan's request to interview Christian by saying that their witness fears for his life and that the defense doesn't really need the pre-trial interview to prepare its defense.

Christian was scheduled to be sentenced last week in federal court, but his sentencing date has been continued indefinitely.

Doping Probe Clears Armstrong (AP)

Associated Press

AP, June 1, 2006

AMSTERDAM -- A Dutch investigator's report cleared Lance Armstrong of doping in the 1999 Tour de France on Wednesday, calling the accusations against him "completely irresponsible" and raising the possibility of misconduct by anti-doping authorities.

The 132-page report recommended convening a tribunal to discuss possible legal and ethical violations by the World Anti-Doping Agency and to consider "appropriate sanctions to remedy the violations."

The French sports daily L'Equipe reported in August that six of Mr. Armstrong's urine samples from 1999, when he won the first of his record seven straight Tour titles, came back positive for the endurance-boosting hormone EPO when they were retested in 2004.

Mr. Armstrong has repeatedly denied using banned substances.

"Today's comprehensive report makes it clear that there is no truth to that accusation," Mr. Armstrong said in a written statement. "I have now retired, but for the sake of all athletes still competing who deserve a level playing field and a fair system of drug testing, the time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks before they destroy the credibility of WADA and, in turn, the international anti-doping system."

The International Cycling Union appointed Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman last October to investigate the handling of urine tests from the 1999 Tour by the French national anti-doping laboratory, known by its French acronym LNDD. Mr. Vrijman said Wednesday his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely with respect to alleged use of doping in the 1999 Tour de France."

The report said tests on the samples were conducted improperly, and fell so short of scientific standards that it was "completely irresponsible" to suggest that the results "constitute evidence of anything." It said no proper records were kept of the samples, there had been no "chain of custody" guaranteeing their integrity, and no way of knowing whether the samples had been "spiked" with banned substances.

The report said WADA and the LNDD may have "behaved in ways that are completely inconsistent with the rules and regulations of international anti-doping control testing," and may also have been against the law. It accused WADA of putting pressure on the LNDD to summarize the results of the tests, and said both agencies violated rules of confidentiality by openly discussing them.

It said neither Mr. Armstrong nor any of the other riders that were tested retroactively could fairly be accused of violating anti-doping regulations based on the LNDD's examination.

WADA chief Dick Pound said he hadn't received the report yet but, based on what he had read in news accounts, was critical of Mr. Vrijman's findings. "There was no interest in determining whether the samples Armstrong provided were positive or not," he told the Associated Press by telephone from Montreal. "We were afraid of that from the very beginning."

Mr. Pound reiterated his claim that the UCI had leaked the forms to a reporter from L'Equipe and was responsible for the doping samples being linked to Mr. Armstrong.

DOJ_NMG_0031037

"Whether the samples were positive or not, I don't know how a Dutch lawyer with no expertise came to a conclusion that one of the leading laboratories in the world messed up on the analysis. To say Armstrong is totally exonerated seems strange," Mr. Pound said.

The UCI said it was upset with Mr. Vrijman for commenting on the report before all parties involved in the case were informed. "Upon reception of the document, the UCI will study in details the content before publishing it in its whole," the UCI said in a statement.

In a separate statement, WADA expressed "grave concern and strong disappointment" over Mr. Vrijman's reported comments. "Elementary courtesy and professionalism would have dictated that WADA should have been provided with a copy of the report before interviews were given to the media," the statement said.

Mario Zorzoli, the doctor who gave copies of Armstrong's doping control forms to L'Equipe, was suspended by the UCI for one month earlier this year. He has since been reinstated.

Mr. Vrijman, who headed the Dutch anti-doping agency for 10 years and later defended athletes accused of doping, worked on the report with Adriaan van der Veen, a scientist with the Dutch Metrology Laboratory.

EPO, or erythropoietin, is a synthetic hormone that boosts the oxygen-carrying capacity of the blood. Testing for EPO only began in 2001.

Doping Agency Challenges Probe That Clears Armstrong (KR)

By Elliott Almond

Knight Ridder, May 31, 2006

An investigator's report clearing Lance Armstrong of taking drugs during the 1999 Tour de France was challenged Wednesday by World Anti-Doping Agency officials, indicating the case against America's greatest cyclist might not be over.

The 132-page report, written by the former chief of the Netherlands' anti-doping agency, called the accusations against Armstrong "completely irresponsible."

The investigator, Emile Vrijman, examined test results taken from the year Armstrong won his first of seven consecutive Tour de France titles. The cyclist won all those races after surviving testicular cancer.

The investigation was initiated after the French sports newspaper L'Equipe reported last August that six of Armstrong's urine samples from 1999 were positive for the blood-boosting drug EPO when retested in 2004.

There was no valid test for EPO until 2001. French testers froze specimens from the 1999 Tour to check when they had developed one. But the re-tests were not meant to be used to punish anyone.

While Armstrong hailed the report's conclusion, officials from the World Anti-Doping Agency said in a statement they were concerned that the investigation had focused on how the retired cyclist's urine tests were leaked to a newspaper and not whether the results were valid.

A WADA spokesman declined further comment Wednesday.

But the group's president, Dick Pound, told The Associated Press: "There was no interest in determining whether the samples Armstrong provided were positive or not.

"I don't know how a Dutch lawyer with no expertise came to a conclusion that one of the leading laboratories in the world messed up on the analysis. To say Armstrong is totally exonerated seems strange."

The investigator's report said the French laboratory did not follow accepted scientific standards. It dismissed the results as lacking credibility.

"Today's comprehensive report makes it clear that there is no truth to that accusation," Armstrong said in a statement.

He blamed Pound, WADA, the laboratory, L'Equipe and Tour de France organizers for trying to discredit him.

"For the sake of all athletes still competing who deserve a level playing field and a fair system of drug testing, the time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks," said Armstrong, who has never publicly failed a drug test.

Sean Petty, USA Cycling's chief of staff, said Wednesday the sport has continued to grow despite years of rumors about Armstrong.

"I hope that is the last we hear of it," he said. "We just want it to be not a lot of rhetoric and based on facts."

The report, however, surfaced amid a growing drug scandal in Spain that has implicated some elite cyclists and team officials.

With a code name "Operacion Puerto," Spanish police last week raided the homes of a Spanish team manager and physician to collect evidence of blood doping. They arrested five individuals connected to the sport, according to Spanish news accounts. On Wednesday, a newspaper reported that the team Comunidad Valenciana might lose its wild-card place for next month's Tour de France because one of its officials was targeted in the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0031038

The action echoes the BALCO Laboratories scandal involving Barry Bonds, Marion Jones and other American sports stars. Jose Enrique Gutierrez, who finished second last week at the Giro d'Italia, is one of a handful of elite cyclists connected to the investigation.

Jim Ochowicz, USA Cycling president, said he welcomed the inquiry, although it comes at the height of the summer season. He said Spain used to be an "outpost where the doping issue was concerned." The recent action shows the country is redoubling its efforts to stop drug use in the sport, he said.

Although Armstrong's case has no relation to the Spanish investigation, the two events underscore the sport's struggle with drugs.

"Cycling has a long, rich colorful history of doping," said Chuck Yesalis, a Penn State health professor who has written books about steroid use in sports. "It's no surprise cycling is involved."

Report Reopens Doping Debate Over Armstrong (LAT)

By Alan Abrahamson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

A Dutch investigator's report that purports to clear Lance Armstrong of using performance-enhancing substances in the 1999 Tour de France ignited a controversy that roared through Europe and across the Atlantic on Wednesday, spotlighting the complexities and schisms that have riven a sport awash in allegations of doping.

The report, commissioned last year by the International Cycling Union after a French news account that six Armstrong urine samples from 1999 had tested positive in 2004 for the blood-booster EPO, asserted those tests were conducted so improperly it would be "completely irresponsible" to suggest they amounted to "evidence of anything."

The 132-page report, made public Wednesday, was not immediately available. But according to news accounts, Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman said his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely" with regard to the 1999 allegations. Armstrong, who has repeatedly denied the use of banned substances, said in a statement that Vrijman's report "confirms my innocence."

But the World Anti-Doping Agency, in Montreal, issued a statement expressing "grave concern and strong disappointment." WADA, the statement also said, "continues to stress its concern that an investigation into the matter must consider all aspects," including "the question of whether anti-doping rules were violated by athletes."

WADA Chairman Dick Pound, who has long asserted the cycling federation, which goes by the acronym UCI, leaked the 1999 doping forms to the French newspaper L'Equipe, questioned how Vrijman had reached the conclusion that one of the top anti-doping labs in the world -- the French national lab, near Paris -- had so thoroughly botched tests. The lab is known by its French acronym, LNDD.

Vrijman's report, for instance, asserts there is no way to know if the samples had been spiked with a banned substance, according to news accounts, which also said the report raises the possibility of misconduct by WADA and LNDD.

In a telephone interview, Pound said of the cycling federation, "They weren't interested in what happened, only in how the information became public and -- surprise, surprise -- cleared the only organization that made it possible for this thing to happen. To say that UCI had no role -- that's nuts."

Swiss-based UCI also issued a statement. It said its officials had "learned with great surprise" the "declarations conveyed to the Dutch press by Mr. Emile Vrijman," making clear the report's release was "prematurely voiced" and the UCI was still "waiting to receive the definite version."

UCI, the statement went on to say, "firmly deplores the behavior of Mr. Vrijman," a former head of the Dutch anti-doping lab. He has since been active in defending athletes accused of doping.

The release of Vrijman's report comes as cycling grapples with a doping scandal in Spain, which has the potential to rival the scandal that shook the sport amid the 1998 Tour de France, when police nabbed a Festina team employee with drugs. Some Tour riders were ejected; others quit; the Tour almost collapsed.

Police in Madrid, in a raid last Tuesday, reportedly seized steroids, EPO and dozens of bags of frozen blood. Among those questioned was Manolo Saiz, director of the Liberty Seguros cycling team. The Boston-based Liberty Mutual insurance company responded by canceling its sponsorship of the team.

It has long been known in cycling circles -- as in other endurance sports -- that transfusing one's own blood can increase oxygen-carrying red blood cells, thereby boosting endurance. Detecting such transfusions can be problematic, if not impossible.

EPO, or erythropoietin, is a synthetic hormone. It too can boost the oxygen-carrying capacity of the blood.

In 1999, though EPO was on the banned list, there was no effective test to detect it; UCI would not begin using such a test until 2001.

On Aug. 23, L'Equipe reported that six of Armstrong's 1999 samples had come back positive for EPO when re-tested in 2004. The 1999 Tour marked the first of Armstrong's seven straight Tour wins.

DOJ_NMG_0031039

The French newspaper's investigation was based on what doping authorities call the "B sample," the second half of urine samples used in doping tests. The A samples were used up in 1999. The B samples at issue were among those hauled out of deep freeze in 2004 to perfect the French lab's EPO testing procedures.

To make a typical doping case, then and now, authorities must prove a positive A and B sample. However, decisions issued in December involving U.S. track and field stars Tim Montgomery and Chryste Gaines, sparked by the BALCO matter, have made plain that a wide range of evidence can be used to build a doping case.

Armstrong's critics maintained the L'Equipe story offered evidence pointing to doping but acknowledged that the B samples alone could not make a formal doping case against him. Armstrong, as he did again in his statement Wednesday, said he was the target of a "witch hunt."

Report Says Lab Mishandled Armstrong's Samples From '99 (NYT)

By Juliet Macur

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Lance Armstrong received a boost yesterday toward clearing his name of doping allegations connected with his triumph in the 1999 Tour de France, the first of his record seven victories in the race.

Emile Vrijman, a Dutch lawyer hired by the International Cycling Union, issued a report that said drug testers had mishandled Armstrong's urine samples, so any positive results fail to "constitute evidence of anything."

Vrijman, the former head of the Dutch anti-doping organization, said the French national anti-doping laboratory did not follow proper procedures when retroactively testing the samples from the 1999 Tour. He also said the laboratory, the French Ministry of Sport and the World Anti-Doping Agency had refused to cooperate fully with his investigation.

In the 130-page report, Vrijman stated that there was no proof that Armstrong had used EPO, a synthetic version of a naturally occurring hormone that increases oxygen-rich red blood cells, because there was no way to prove that Armstrong's urine samples had not been tampered with or tainted. In turn, Vrijman wrote that the cycling union should "refrain from initiating any disciplinary action whatsoever."

"The report confirms my innocence," Armstrong said in a statement, which also criticized a number of involved parties, including the World Anti-Doping Agency's chairman, Dick Pound.

Pound told The Associated Press in Canada: "Whether the samples were positive or not, I don't know how a Dutch lawyer with no expertise came to a conclusion that one of the leading laboratories in the world messed up on the analysis. To say Armstrong is totally exonerated seems strange."

Armstrong, a 34-year-old Texan, retired from cycling last July after winning his seventh Tour de France. Even as a spectator, he has continued to dispute accusations that he used performance-enhancing drugs. The murmurs began with his fairy-tale victory in the 1999 Tour de France after he beat testicular cancer.

Recently, Armstrong has attacked those cheating accusations through lawsuits, including a case he filed against SCA Promotions, a Dallas-based insurance company. That case was closed in February, after a state district judge in Dallas awarded him $5 million, and $181,327.87 interest.

In the suit, Armstrong claimed that the insurance company owed him a $5 million bonus for winning his sixth Tour, but withheld payment after the book, "L.A. Confidential, the Secrets of Lance Armstrong," alleged he had used performance-enhancing drugs. The company had asked for Armstrong's medical records to find out if he had cheated.

Armstrong, who was in Los Angeles filming a commercial yesterday, has two other ongoing cases. Both are defamation suits involving the "L.A. Confidential" book: one is against the book's authors and its publisher, the other is against a London newspaper that printed excerpts of the book. Bill Stapleton, Armstrong's agent, said that both cases are in their initial stages and that trial dates have not been set.

"I can't help but think that an independent investigation exonerating him can't do anything but help his case," Stapleton said, regarding the report released yesterday.

The issue of doping has been a cloud over cycling for decades. Most recently, in a case thought to involve cyclists and perhaps other athletes, the police in Madrid raided three apartments and seized large amounts of steroids, hormones, EPO and nearly 100 bags of frozen blood and equipment for treating blood.

Another high-profile case began at the 2004 Olympics, when the American Tyler Hamilton won a gold medal but was barred from the sport for two years for testing positive for a blood transfusion that would increase red blood cells and, in turn, endurance.

Armstrong has repeatedly denied using performance-enhancing drugs. In his statement yesterday, he called the retroactive testing of his 1999 urine samples a "witch hunt," and he placed the blame on Pound, the French lab, the French Ministry of

Sport, the Tour de France organizers and L'Équipe, the French sports newspaper that shares its parent company with the Tour. He said they "ignored the rules and broke the law."

L'Équipe reported last August that Armstrong's urine samples from the 1999 Tour tested positive for EPO in tests conducted in 2004. EPO tests were not available in 1999.

Vrijman, the investigator, was hired last October to investigate the handling of those urine samples from 1999. In his report, he wrote that the analyses of those and other urine samples were supposed to be for research purposes only, not to implicate an athlete. He wrote that the World Anti-Doping Agency and the French laboratory were unethical because they had not followed anti-doping testing procedures and, among other things, had violated confidentiality rules.

Vrijman also wrote that the anti-doping agency forced the French laboratory to generate a report using identification numbers on the sample, promising that "it would treat the research data as confidential and that they would not be the basis for any sanction against any athlete." But the agency did not keep its promise, Vrijman noted.

The International Cycling Union was not available for comment about the case, but posted a comment on its Web site. The statement said it "deplores the behaviour" of Vrijman because he "prematurely voiced" the report.

"The UCI underlines its deep displeasure with regards to the regrettable development of this case," the statement said.

Armstrong Cleared Of Doping At 1999 Tour De France (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Sam Sheringham

Bloomberg, May 31, 2006

(Bloomberg) -- Lance Armstrong was cleared of taking banned drugs at the 1999 Tour de France by independent investigators who said the World Anti-Doping Agency may be guilty of misconduct in its handling of the case.

``There is no basis for disciplinary action against any rider," Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman said in his 132-page report today. The International Cycling Union ``is recommended to refrain from taking any disciplinary action whatsoever."

Armstrong's maiden seven-minute win at the 1999 Tour led to persistent whispers in the French press that he boosted his performances with drugs because he'd only returned to cycling in the previous year after recovering from cancer. Vrijman's probe began after French newspaper L'Equipe last August said six of Armstrong's urine samples from the race showed traces of the banned hormone erythropoietin, or EPO.

Armstrong denied ever using illegal substances during a career that ended last year with a record-extending seventh Tour de France title. The 34-year-old Texan said he was considering suing L'Equipe after its story appeared.

The rider today accused the French drug-testing laboratory, Tour de France organizers, L'Equipe, the French Sports Ministry and WADA President Dick Pound of a ``witch hunt."

``Pound, along with the French lab and the French ministry, have ignored the rules and broken the law," Armstrong said in an e-mailed statement. ``The time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks before they destroy the credibility of WADA and, in turn, the international anti-doping system."

Tribunal

A tribunal should be convened to examine possible legal and ethical violations by WADA in its treatment of the rider, Vrijman's report said. After the L'Equipe report, Pound said the allegations were ``pretty serious" if they could be proven.

``WADA violated applicable rules on athlete confidentiality by commenting publicly on the alleged positive findings, especially in relation with a particular rider, Lance Armstrong," Vrijman concluded.

Montreal-based WADA said it had ``grave concern" about Vrijman's findings, because his probe was too narrowly focused.

``An investigation into the matter must consider all aspects -- not limited to how the damaging information regarding athletes' urine samples became public -- but also addressing the question of whether anti-doping rules were violated," WADA said in an e-mailed statement.

Criticism

WADA, the UCI and L'Equipe criticized Vrijman for releasing the report before first informing them of his findings. The UCI, cycling's ruling body, in October appointed the lawyer from the Hague-based firm Scholten C.S. to investigate the handling of urine tests from the 1999 race.

``The UCI firmly deplores the behavior of Mr. Vrijman, who has spoken prematurely," the UCI said.

L'Equipe's journalist Damien Ressiot, the author of the Aug. 23 report, declined to comment before Vrijman's findings are fully disclosed. L'Equipe, France's main sports daily, is one of the main organizers of the Tour de France.

Armstrong won two more Tour de France titles than the most prolific former winners -- Jacques Anquetil, Eddy Merckx, Bernard Hinault and Miguel Indurain.

DOJ_NMG_0031041

His exoneration comes a week after Spanish police said 200 riders may be guilty of blood doping following the discovery in Madrid and Zaragoza apartments of notes about drug-taking and bags of athletes' blood. Five men were arrested, including Manolo Saiz, manager of the Liberty Seguros team, who was released after two days.

Bans

Spanish cyclist Roberto Heras was banned for two years and stripped of his record fourth Tour of Spain title in February for testing positive for EPO. Two days later, U.S. Olympic cycling champion Tyler Hamilton lost his appeal against a two- year ban for doping.

Armstrong said the current scandal in Spain could be more serious than the so-called Festina affair of 1998, when Richard Virenque's squad was thrown off the Tour de France after drugs were found in a team car. At the 2001 Tour of Italy, 40 riders were charged with drug possession.

Report Clears Lance Armstrong Of Drug Allegations (FOR)

By Parmy Olson

Forbes, May 31, 2006

London - WADA loada baloney: Remember those swirling assertions back in 1999 about seven-time Tour de France winner Lance Armstrong and his apparent penchant for performance-enhancing drugs? Well according to a new 132-page report from a clutch of independent Dutch investigators, those allegations, made via certain press reports, were unfounded. The finger of blame is now being pointed squarely at anti-doping authorities including France's LNDD and the World Anti-Doping Agency, otherwise known as WADA.

It was in August last year that the French sports newspaper L'Equipe first brought the allegations to the fore after obtaining leaked test results of urine samples taken in 1999. It prompted the Texan cyclist to announce, tongue-in-cheek, that he might do the Tour again, just to "piss [the French] off". Mr. Armstrong, who ranks 15 on the Forbes Celebrity 100 list and counts AMD (nyse: AMD - news - people), Bristol-Myers Squibb (nyse: BMY - news - people) and Sirius Satellite Radio (nasdaq: SIRI - news - people) among his sponsors, can now stay in retirement and let cycling's governing body, the UCI, study the Dutch report before deciding its course of action.

One little hitch though. The UCI is reported to be rather miffed that the investigators and in particular the Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman, had announced their findings without going through the proper channels--namely, the UCI. The group said in a statement that it "firmly deplores the behavior of Mr. Vrijman." WADA also expressed "grave concern" in a statement posted on its Web site, over Vrijman's criticisms of anti-doping authorities.

It seems hard to condemn the lawyer for his zeal, though. He seems confident that his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely with respect to alleged use of doping in the 1999 Tour de France," and told The Associated Press that Wada and the LNDD may have "behaved in ways that are completely inconsistent with the rules and regulations of international anti-doping control testing."

Vrijman is now suggesting that a tribunal be created to "provide a fair hearing" to the people and organizations suspected of misconduct and decide on sanctions, if warranted. The full report was sent to the UCI, the LNDD, the French sports ministry, WADA and Armstrong's lawyer. The International Olympic Committee also had requested a copy.

Innocent Armstrong Quick To Attack (CNN)

CNN, June 1, 2006

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands -- An independent investigation has cleared seven times Tour de France champion Lance Armstrong of doping during the 1999 event and strongly criticised the World Anti-Doping Agency (WADA).

"The report confirms my innocence, but also finds that (WADA president) Mr (Dick) Pound along with the French lab and the French ministry have ignored the rules and broken the law," the American said in a statement.

"They have also refused to cooperate with the investigation in an effort to conceal the full scope of their wrongdoing."

He added: "I have now retired, but for the sake of all athletes still competing who deserve a level playing field and a fair system of drug testing, the time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks before they destroy the credibility of WADA and, in turn, the international anti-doping system."

Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman, assigned by the International Cycling Union (UCI) to investigate newspaper allegations, said on Wednesday testing procedures were insufficient to label Armstrong's sample positive.

He also referred to "misconduct" by WADA and the French national doping laboratory LNDD.

Armstrong had been accused by the French sports paper L'Equipe of using the endurance-boosting drug EPO on the way to the first of his seven victories.

DOJ_NMG_0031042

And in an strongly-worded press release on Wednesday, the UCI said that they 'deplored' the behavior of Vrijman, claiming that he had released the report without their permission to the Dutch press and before all "interested parties" could comment.

"The UCI underlines its deep displeasure with regards to the regrettable development of this case," read a statement.

The 132-page report by Vrijman and his panel comes down firmly in favor of Armstrong, who has strenuously denied using banned substances. Possible violations

It recommended convening a tribunal to discuss possible legal and ethical violations by the World Anti-Doping Agency (WADA) and to consider "appropriate sanctions to remedy the violations."

L'Equipe reported in August 2005 that six of Armstrong's urine samples from 1999 came back positive for EPO when they were retested in 2004.

It claimed they were able to match the doping control forms attached to his old samples with alleged positive tests.

But Vrijman said on Wednesday that his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely with respect to alleged use of doping in the 1999 Tour de France."

The report also said the UCI had not damaged Armstrong by releasing doping control forms to the French.

Armstrong had challenged the validity of testing samples frozen six years ago, and how they were handled.

On his personal Web site he described the reports as part of a "witchhunt."

The aftermath of the report saw a string of accusations and counter-arguments.

WADA chief Dick Pound accused former ICU president Hein Verbruggen of leaking documents about the alleged positive tests to a reporter from L'Equipe.

Pound also questioned the union's willingness to fully investigate the allegations against Armstrong.

The French anti-doping laboratory at Chatenay-Malabry where the tests were carried out has been accused of violating confidentiality regulations.

While Mario Zorzoli, the doctor who gave copies of Armstrong's doping control forms to L'Equipe, was suspended by the UCI for one month earlier this year. He has since been reinstated.

Report Backs Armstrong And Criticises Drug-testing Procedures (GUA)

Guardian, June 1, 2006

Lance Armstrong yesterday repeated his accusation that he was the victim of a "witch-hunt" after the appearance of a report into allegations made last August in the French newspaper L'Equipe that the blood-booster erythropoietin was found in urine samples provided by the seven-times Tour de France winner during his first win in the race in 1999.

The report from the Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman, who used to head his country's anti-doping agency, is yet to be published by cycling's governing body, the UCI, but was seen yesterday by the Guardian. In it Vrijman and two other investigators were unable to confirm whether proper procedures had been followed when samples from the 1999 Tour were re-tested in France's top anti-doping laboratory for erythropoietin, which was undetectable until 2000

Article continues

The report is also highly critical of the World Anti-Doping Agency and its head Dick Pound for his reaction that the revelations in L'Equipe needed investigating .

Armstrong said: "Although I am not surprised by the report's findings, I am pleased they confirm what I have been saying since this witch-hunt began: Dick Pound, Wada, the French laboratory, the French Ministry of Sport, L'Equipe and the Tour de France organisers (ASO) have been out to discredit and target me without any basis. The report confirms my innocence but also finds Mr Pound along with the French lab and the French ministry have ignored the rules and broken the law."

Pound said: "I don't know how a Dutch lawyer with no expertise came to a conclusion one of the leading laboratories in the world messed up the analysis. To say Armstrong is exonerated seems strange."

Cyclist Lance Armstrong Cleared Of Doping Charges (VOA)

Voice of America, May 31, 2006

Six-time Tour de France champion Lance ArmstrongIndependent Dutch investigators have cleared seven-time Tour de France cycling champion Lance Armstrong of the United States of doping in the 1999 race, and have blamed anti-doping officials for misconduct in the case.

In a 132-page report, the Dutch investigators recommended convening a tribunal to discuss possible legal and ethical violations by the World Anti-Doping Agency in the case.

The International Cycling Union had appointed Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman to investigate a French laboratory's handling of Armstrong's urine tests from the 1999 Tour.

DOJ_NMG_0031043

Vrijman said his report "exonerates Armstrong completely." The cyclist has never tested positive for drugs and has vehemently denied using performance-enhancing substances.

Last year, the French newspaper L'Equipe had accused Armstrong of using the banned endurance-booster EPO in 1999. L'Equipe based its story on alleged analyses of Armstrong's samples.

The International Cycling Union and the World Anti Doping Agency have criticized Vrijman for making his report public before they had a chance to read it.

Armstrong Cleared In Drug Inquiry (BBC)

BBC, May 31, 2006

Armstrong retired after his record seventh straight win in Le Tour Independent Dutch investigators have cleared Lance Armstrong of doping in the 1999 Tour de France.

French sports newspaper L'Equipe had claimed that Armstrong's samples on the 1999 Tour later tested positive.

But investigators exonerated him in a 132-page report on Wednesday and blamed anti-doping authorities for misconduct in dealing with the American cyclist.

"The report confirms my innocence," said Armstrong, who has repeatedly denied using banned substances.

Armstrong said the case amounted to a "witch-hunt" that was designed to "discredit" him.

"I have now retired, but for the sake of all athletes still competing who deserve a fair system of drug testing, the time has come to take action against these kinds of attacks before they destroy the credibility of WADA and, in turn, the international anti-doping system."

Cycling's governing body, the UCI, said it would make a full statement after studying the report.

If you look at how the result was obtained it was so different from the analysis procedure required by Wada... it doesn't even qualify as a finding

Emile Vrijman

Inquiry chairman L'Equipe reported last August that six of his urine samples from 1999, when he won his first Tour title, came back positive for the endurance-boosting hormone EPO after they were retested in 2004.

The UCI then appointed Dutch lawyer Emile Vrijman last October to investigate the handling of urine tests by the French national anti-doping laboratory, known as LNDD.

But Vrijman, who headed the Dutch anti-doping agency for 10 years and later defended athletes accused of doping, said on Wednesday that his report "exonerates Lance Armstrong completely with respect to alleged use of doping in the 1999 Tour de France".

The report added that the UCI had not damaged Armstrong by releasing doping control forms to L'Equipe.

But it said Wada and the LNDD may have "behaved in ways that are completely inconsistent with the rules and regulations of international anti-doping control testing", and their actions may also have been against the law.

Vrijman said the laboratory had analysed the samples only as part of a research programme for the detection of EPO, so there was no way of confirming the tests.

Wada will respond in due course once it has fully reviewed the report

A World Anti-Doping Agency statement

"If you look at how the result was obtained it was so different from the analysis procedure required by Wada... it doesn't even qualify as a finding," he said.

"It may suffice for research purposes but as a valid doping result - no way."

He said samples may be used in research programmes only on the condition that all information tracing them to an individual is removed, but this was not the case.

Vrijman added: "Sometimes with doping cases you can say it was a technicality.

"These are not technicalities, these are fundamental issues which should have been done completely differently."

Five Live: Have your say However, the UCI (International Cycling Union) and the World Anti-Doping Agency (Wada) both criticised Vrijman for making the report public.

"The World Anti-Doping Agency expresses grave concern and strong disappointment," said an official Wada statement.

"Wada is not in a position to comment at this time other than to state that elementary courtesy and professionalism would have dictated that Wada should have been provided with a copy of the report before interviews were given to the media."

The UCI added in a statement: "Still waiting to receive the definite version of the said report written by Mr Vrijman, the UCI underlines its deep displeasure with regards to the regrettable development of this case."

Fentanyl Made In Illegal Labs (DN)

DOJ_NMG_0031044

By Brad Heath And Joel Kurth

Detroit News, June 1, 2006

Doses of the painkiller fentanyl, thought to be the cause of dozens of drug overdose deaths in Metro Detroit in the past two weeks, appear to have been made illegally in underground laboratories, people familiar with an expanding police investigation said Wednesday.

The findings are based on chemical tests that indicate the fentanyl -- a powerful pain medication -- was not made the same way as the prescription forms of the drug, said Calvin Trent, director of the Detroit Bureau of Substance Abuse. He and others said investigators laid out those findings at a meeting with health officials Wednesday morning, though they offered few details.

"They've confirmed it's being clandestinely manufactured, but not in the Detroit or Wayne County area," Trent said. "It appears that the fentanyl was not made here or mixed here, but it was brought here and sold here."

Authorities suspect the painkiller, mixed with either heroin or cocaine, is to blame for a spike in drug overdose deaths involving 50 people in Wayne County during the past two weeks, including two on Wednesday.

They will not be able to definitively link the deaths to fentanyl until they complete toxicology tests, which can take several weeks. Since January 2005, the county has confirmed 130 fentanyl overdose deaths.

Other cases have been confirmed from Philadelphia to Chicago; a handful have been reported elsewhere in Michigan.

"There's still a lot of questions, but all evidence points to it being a mix that came onto the street from illegal networks," said Dr. Mark Greenwald, a Wayne State University psychiatry professor who is part of a task force of health officials and others assembled to respond to the overdoses.

Police seizures of the lethal cocktail in Detroit indicate it comes in varying strains, Greenwald said. Some drug mixes contained mostly fentanyl and some heroin; in others, the ratio was reversed.. Experts said prescription versions of fentanyl are chemically different from illegally produced versions and that tests can tell the two apart.

Carolyn Gibson, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said investigators won't say conclusively the drugs were illegally manufactured until all their tests are complete.

"We'd be premature in saying it's 100 percent definite, but that's what it's looking like," she said. Police in Philadelphia, where fentanyl has been blamed for about 40 deaths over two months, said they also suspect the drug was made illegally and that it was mixed into packets of heroin before reaching the city. They think all originated from one shipment of tainted heroin that was distributed to cities in the Northeast and Midwest, Philadelphia Police Lt. Pat Quinn said.

Illegal fentanyl labs have been around for at least 20 years, but are exceedingly rare because the process requires advanced knowledge of chemistry, said Tom Abercrombie, an Oakland, Calif., crime laboratory criminalist supervisor, who has investigated two such labs.

152 Nabbed During Blitz On Fugitives (BUFFNEWS)

By Vanessa Thomas, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, June 1, 2006

Murder suspect prominent among arrests over 5 days

A 26-year-old man wanted in a Rochester slaying was one of 152 dangerous fugitives and sexual predators arrested in Erie and Niagara counties during a five-day blitz that ended Saturday.

Mario Collier, arrested in Buffalo, is accused of shooting an accused drug dealer to death in January after luring him to the meeting place by dousing his friend with gasoline. He had been a fugitive for the last four months. A team of officers searched for him for three straight days, at the homes of relatives and friends, from Buffalo to Cheektowaga.

Teams of local, state and federal officers from 20 law enforcement agencies fanned out across the two counties to apprehend fugitives wanted on felony warrants for assault, rape, burglary, narcotics, parole and probation violations and failure to register as a sex offender. During the operation, 213 outstanding warrants were executed.

The sweep was part of Operation Rolling Thunder, a statewide initiative that began in November to capture the state's worst fugitives.

"This was our attempt to hunt down fugitives - the most dangerous fugitives - to take them off the streets in Rochester, Syracuse, Albany and Buffalo," U.S. Marshal Peter A. Lawrence said during a news conference Tuesday in Buffalo Police Headquarters.

"It's been extremely successful," said Lawrence, standing at a lectern and flanked by 12 of the region's top law enforcement officials. "This was great cooperation of every law enforcement agency in the area."

Saturday, police traced Collier to a home on Janet Street. But when officers knocked on the door, a woman spoke through the door, saying, "I'm naked. Come back tomorrow." Police negotiated with the woman, who eventually opened the door, clothed, and officers saw Collier, who surrendered without incident.

Across the state, 619 fugitives have been arrested so far during Operation Rolling Thunder stings in Rochester, Syracuse and Albany, according to Chauncey G. Parker, director of criminal justice for the state Division of Criminal Justice Services.

"Collier, without a doubt, was our No. 1 priority," said Daniel Larish, supervisory deputy for the U.S. marshals. "Any time you take a suspected murderer off the street, you help to make the streets safer." Collier, aka Marlo Allen Jr., was the last of four men arrested in the slaying of Josue Marrero, 23, in Rochester on Jan. 18.

The four men were trying to rob Marrero of his drugs and money, but when they could not find him, they kidnapped his friend, Terry Holmes, 23, and coerced him to set up a meeting with Marrero, and then shot and robbed Marrero when he arrived, according to Rochester police.

During the blitz in Erie and Niagara counties, officers seized three handguns and an assault rifle at a Hewitt Avenue address.

They also arrested Anthony Colon, 17, of Busti Avenue, who was wanted for violating parole from a sex-assault charge for abusing a girl, 8, police said.

Police said Colon is an active member of the 7th Street gang, a violent street gang that is battling the 1015 gang, whose turf warfare led to a double slaying April 17.

Also arrested was Marisa A. Battle, 36, on a Family Court violation, police said, and she faces more charges after officers found an illegal check-printing operation on Emerson Place.

The joint initiative was led by the Western District Office of the U.S. Marshals and the New York/New Jersey Regional Fugitive Task Force, assisted by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the FBI, the U.S. Immigration & Customs Enforcement, the State Police, the New York State parole officers, the Erie and Niagara county sheriff's departments, the Erie County Department of Probation, and local police departments - Buffalo, Niagara Falls, Cheektowaga, Amherst, the City of Tonawanda, the Town of Tonawanda, West Seneca, and Lewiston - and the U.S. attorney's office for the Western District of New York, and the Erie and Niagara county district attorney's offices.

Neither Federal Officer Nor Gentleman, Women Say (NYT)

By Vivian S. Toy And Julia C. Mead

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Richard S. Kudlik enjoyed regaling his girlfriend with tales of his life as a United States marshal: of his dangerous assignments hunting fugitive criminals and of being so close to Hillary Rodham Clinton that she would request that he and his team provide for her security on certain occasions.

He would show up at her Long Island home with his gun and badge, Pam Brown recalled yesterday, wearing his blue raid jacket with "U.S. Marshal" emblazoned across the back. The license plate on his pickup truck read, "OFF2HUNT," and there was a United States marshal sticker on the windshield.

But after they had been dating for eight months, Ms. Brown said, Mr. Kudlik told one story too many, and what turned out to be his fictional life as a federal law enforcement officer quickly unraveled.

Ms. Brown set up a Web site last month to expose Mr. Kudlik as a 43-year-old heating and ventilation worker from Port Jefferson who is married and has two teenage children. She then reported him to the Marshals Service — as did several others, according to the agency — and he was arrested on Tuesday on charges of having a counterfeit marshal badge, a misdemeanor punishable by up to six months in prison.

Mr. Kudlik, who was freed on $5,000 bail, would not come to the door of his ranch house in Port Jefferson yesterday, but his wife, Denise Kudlik, fiercely defended him. She called Ms. Brown "a vindictive person" who is out to hurt her family "because she had an affair with my husband and she got burned," she said. "I have a 17-year happy marriage, and I'm not letting him go."

But Ms. Brown said her Web site, off2hunt.com, was about more than just Mr. Kudlik, as stated on its home page: "Our mission: Exposing married liars and cheaters! Do you think your man is cheating? Think he is lying to you?" It continues, "We'll expose him for you!" In the background, the pop singer Shaggy sings, "It Wasn't Me."

The site is among the latest in a series of Web sites with the goal of exposing cheating paramours.

"I didn't do any of this to get even with him," said Ms. Brown, a Web designer from Mattituck. "I did it because women need to be made aware that you have to be careful, and that even the best can turn out to be losers."

The Web site includes what it says are e-mailed testimonials from other women who say that Mr. Kudlik duped them with the same story: that he was a divorced father of two and that his work as a marshal meant irregular hours and an inability to meet on weekends and holidays.

Ms. Brown said that she met Mr. Kudlik several years ago through a mutual friend, but that he met most of his other lovers in a chat room for Long Island singles over 40. One wrote: "He told umpteen stories of all the 'missions' he was on in such great detail he could write a book."

DOJ_NMG_0031046

Ms. Brown said she started dating Mr. Kudlik in September, but became suspicious in March, when he told her that he would be working at a Mississippi concert to protect Jennifer Nettles, a singer with the country band Sugarland and a childhood friend of his. Ms. Brown and three friends decided to go to the concert, and he promised to get them in.

"I went down there on his word," she said, but once she arrived, he was nowhere to be found. One of her friends was able to talk to Ms. Nettles. "She said, 'I have no clue who he is,' " Ms. Brown said. "That's when it all started to blow up."

Back on Long Island, Ms. Brown said, Mr. Kudlik apologized profusely and said that he had been unreachable in Mississippi because he had been too busy working. Ms. Brown said she believed him. "I wanted to believe him," she said.

A few weeks later, she said, she received an anonymous online instant message saying that Mr. Kudlik was not who he claimed to be and that he was married. That is when Ms. Brown decided to find a home phone number for him and wound up on the phone with his wife.

Ralph Rosado, a spokesman for the United States Marshals Service, said the service first learned of Mr. Kudlik more than a year ago, when marshals confiscated a badge and other marshal paraphernalia from Mr. Kudlik in April 2005 after a tip from the Nassau County police.

Mr. Kudlik told marshals that he had purchased the counterfeit items on the Internet and promised to stop masquerading as a marshal, so the marshals did not press charges.

But when he was arrested on Tuesday, marshals found several marshals' badges and money clips, five rifles, five handguns and two starter pistols. Mr. Rosado said the weapons were legal under a sports permit.

"We don't see this kind of thing too often," Mr. Rosado said. "I'm sure a lot of guys say a lot of things in bars, but to have all the paraphernalia to go with it — that's pretty unusual."

As for the Web site, Ms. Brown said that Mr. Kudlik had pleaded with her to take it down. "But that Web site is staying up," she said, "until a judge tells me to take it down."

Fake Fed Is A Chat Room Phony (NSDY)

By Christine Armario, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 1, 2006

Girlfriend finds beau neither an officer nor a gentleman, but rather a married mechanic's helper at Plum Island

The women he met on a "Long Island Over 40" America Online chat room knew him as U.S. Marshal Rick Kudlik. And he had everything to prove it: pewter badges, jackets and caps with the marshal's emblem, and detailed stories about busting fugitives and providing security for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"You couldn't even question his stories because you could see emotion in his face as he told them," said Pamela Brown, 39, of Mattituck, who dated Kudlik until recently. "He was real, he was kind, he cared about his work, but he also cared about people, no matter what they had done."

But the marshal's service says Kudlik was a fraud, and that the only federal entity he worked for was the Plum Island Animal Disease Center of the Department of Homeland Security, where, according to officials, he was a mechanic's helper.

The 34-year-old Port Jefferson man was arrested Tuesday by the real U.S. marshals, for allegedly possessing counterfeit marshal gear, after several women, including Brown, discovered they'd been duped and reported him.

"He was using the marshals service as a way to get girls," Deputy U.S. Marshal Ralph Rosado said. "He's really married with kids."

Kudlik did not return several calls to his home for comment.

Rosado said Kudlik had his first brush with the law in April of last year, when a Suffolk police officer spotted a marshal's jacket in Kudlik's car. Federal agents tracked him down and confiscated a fake badge. After he apologized, surrendering two marshal's emblem stickers and a jacket, the service agreed not to press charges and settled on a warning.

"But after information was received that he was continuing in his impersonation of a federal agent, we continued [to investigate]," said Rosado, referring to the complaints filed by Brown and other women.

Officials recovered an assortment of fake marshal paraphernalia in Kudlik's car when they arrested him as he embarked on an Orient Point ferry: patches, duffel bags, memo pads and three laminated "Fraternal Order of the U.S. Marshals" cards listing him as president.

Rosado said they were uncertain how Kudlik obtained the goods, but that he had a receipt from a German company that made him replica badges.

Kudlik was arraigned in federal court in Central Islip, where he pleaded not guilty and was released on a $5,000 unsecured bond on Tuesday, Rosado said.

Brown said that since someone anonymously informed her online that Kudlik wasn't who he claimed to be, she has encountered up to 10 other women with similar stories.

"He let people believe he was a man of integrity," Brown said. And his work as a marshal "was all he spoke about. It was like his being a marshal was his entire existence."

Brown said Kudlik often described his missions to her. Once, he told her he could not spend Christmas with her because he had to apprehend a fugitive in Wisconsin. "The guy was sitting in his kitchen eating dinner and Rick portrayed himself as the telephone repairman to supposedly gain access," she said of the story.

Brown said she ended their relationship in April when she discovered he was married, and confronted his wife, who told her he wasn't a marshal. She then created a Web site, www.off2hunt.com, after one of his chat-room names, to let others know her story and encourage more women to report him.

Christopher Kelly, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, said Kudlik works for a contract agency, Field Support Services, hired by the agency, and was suspended this week from all DHS facilities.

Brown said Kudlik often said "Semper Fi" in passing conversation, meaning "always faithful."

"Always insisted on honesty, loyalty," she said. "All the things that seem to be so important to him was everything he isn't."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Agency Head Slams Senate's Alien Bill (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

The Senate immigration bill makes the same mistake as the 1986 amnesty by restricting the ability of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services to share information on illegal alien guest-worker applicants who are criminals and terrorists, the agency's director said yesterday.

Emilio T. Gonzalez, whose agency would have to administer a guest-worker program, said not allowing the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to share information on someone who applies means they cannot begin the process of removing criminals and national security threats, even after they are rejected from the guest-worker program.

"It is important for us to be able to act on what we get when we run a background check on somebody," Mr. Gonzalez said in a briefing with reporters in which he weighed in on the Senate immigration bill, which would offer a chance for citizenship to millions of illegal aliens, expand legal immigration and start a new foreign-worker program.

Mr. Gonzalez said he hasn't seen any deal breakers in the bill, but said moving forward policy-makers will have to answer key questions about eligibility, types of acceptable documents, information-sharing and limits to judicial appeals.

"If we don't ask those hard national security questions, shame on me," he said.

The Senate passed its bill 62-36 last week, and now must work out differences with the House, which in December passed a bill that focuses mainly on securing the borders and cracking down on employers who hire illegal aliens.

Yesterday was the second time Mr. Gonzalez met with reporters since taking over as director on Jan. 4, and he is juggling an ongoing backlog reduction at the same time he is preparing his agency for new instructions from Congress. He said much press attention has been given to the guest-worker program, but the Senate bill also includes a major increase in legal permanent residents, or "green card" holders, which his agency will also have to process.

Mr. Gonzalez, a naturalized citizen himself, has established a new tone that national security should be foremost in employees' minds at the agency. He said his agency will need at least six months and maybe as much as a year to register current illegal aliens for a foreign-worker program -- far longer than the Senate bill envisions.

On the issue of information sharing and confidentiality of applications, Mr. Gonzalez said the law usually allows his agency to share information when its employees come across an application that raises questions. But he said the 1986 amnesty included confidentiality provisions that prohibited sharing information from those applications, and he said the Senate bill makes the same mistake.

"We ought not to be kept from using that information," he said.

The issue has already been fought out in the Senate, when Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, offered an amendment to change the confidentiality requirements. His amendment failed on a tie vote, 49-49.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and a key backer of the Senate bill, fought Mr. Cornyn's amendment. He said the underlying bill struck a balance that still allows law enforcement to go after cheaters, while at the same time not discouraging illegal aliens from coming forward.

DOJ_NMG_0031048

"Our bill removes criminals and those trying to game the system. But it also protects the confidentiality of honest people applying to stay here and work. Otherwise they will remain in the underground economy and never apply, and that hurts American jobs and wages," he said.

His main worry was that sharing information would discourage some aliens from coming forward because they would fear making an innocent mistake that would hurt them later.

But Mr. Cornyn said his amendment only waived confidentiality at the end of all appeals, when the person would have been finally deemed ineligible.

"If you've exhausted all your appeals and you haven't played by the rules your information should be shared so that the same alien can't commit fraud elsewhere," said Don Stewart, a spokesman for Mr. Cornyn.

He said Mr. Gonzalez's statement should be a boost as they head into negotiations on a final bill.

"The director who has to actually implement many of the programs people are proposing is an important voice in this, and his guidance should inform this debate," Mr. Stewart said.

Immigration Bills Curb Court Reviews (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Immigration legislation now before Congress is threatening a long-standing safeguard to keep politics out of final decisions about who becomes an American, legal experts and immigrant rights advocates say.

The House and Senate have passed immigration bills that would reduce or eliminate federal courts' ability to intervene when immigration officials decide that applicants for citizenship lack "good moral character," a legal requirement. Critics of the proposed change contend the final say of a subjective standard should not be left to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, whose director is a presidential appointee.

"Should you have a political branch of the government deciding who gets to vote?" Seattle immigration lawyer Robert Gibbs said.

Current law allows immigrants denied citizenship to request a court review of their cases.

The House bill would eliminate that possibility. Under the Senate bill, authority of the courts would be "severely limited," says David Leopold of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. American Bar Association President Michael Greco says it "would take away meaningful judicial review."

Emilio Gonzalez, director of the immigration service, said his agency is already straining to eliminate backlogs and keep up with 7 million applications a year for visas, work permits and other benefits. "You should have some limit on the review process."

Last year, the immigration service approved 594,260 citizenship applications and denied 108,058. Of the denials, 10,151 requested new hearings before a different immigration adjudicator; 6,367 obtained citizenship.

Immigration attorneys insist court review is needed. Gibbs won a class-action case last year over the denial of citizenship to Washington state immigrants. "Our poster-child plaintiff had a misdemeanor ticket for being eight over the limit of oysters permitted to be picked up from the beach," he said.

Many Hondurans, Nicaraguans Failing To Renew TPS Permits (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Tens of thousands of Honduran and Nicaraguan immigrants nationwide risk losing their legal status in the United States today because they have not renewed their temporary work permits under a program to help victims of natural disasters, some in the mistaken belief that they will soon be on the path to becoming U.S. citizens.

With the deadline approaching by the end of today, about half the eligible applicants have yet to apply for renewal. They could lose their jobs and face deportation, jeopardizing the livelihoods of thousands of relatives here and in their homelands who depend on their salaries.

About 75,000 Hondurans and 4,000 Nicaraguans got the permits, issued under the Temporary Protected Status (TPS) Program, after Hurricane Mitch in 1998. The permits, if renewed, would allow them to live and work legally in the United States for another year.

According to the latest numbers available as of Friday, only 37,870 Hondurans and 1,778 Nicaraguans nationwide have renewed, U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services said.

Spokesman Shawn Saucier said the agency hopes the other eligible applicants would renew by the end of today. But so far the numbers are far less than at this time in previous renewal years.

"We feel that these numbers are very low," Saucier said. "We're very concerned."

DOJ_NMG_0031049

Many Hondurans and Nicaraguans have not yet renewed because they think they will soon benefit from immigration reforms, including a guest worker program and other measures that could pave the way for citizenship, immigrant advocates said. Many are reluctant to spend the $250 TPS renewal fee, preferring to save their money for future citizenship applications.

"We still believe there's a lot of confusion over the immigration reforms," said David Hernandez, counselor for immigration affairs at the Honduran Embassy. "Many appear to be waiting for the new rules.

"They think it's going to cost a lot," he said. "They believe they will pay double if they renew."

The confusion is being fueled by various factors, ranging from hope raised by the creation of a national immigrant rights movement to a misunderstanding about the way the U.S. political system works. Spanish-language media have also been predicting the passage of immigration legislation now winding through Congress.

Last week, the Senate approved legislation that would establish a guest worker program and allow illegal immigrants who have been here five years or longer to stay and apply for citizenship, as long as they pay back taxes, learn English and have not committed any serious crimes. The bill still faces tough opposition in the House.

"We're hopeful that people will realize that there is no temporary guest worker program at this time and will not take a chance of being deported from the United States," Saucier said.

There are other reasons, too, according to immigration advocates, diplomats and TPS applicants. Some Hondurans and Nicaraguans have run out of money because people with TPS had to pay federal income taxes in April.

Others are concerned that the United States might stop the program or give preference to other immigrant populations. If they renew, they fear that authorities will know their whereabouts and deport them. Others are concerned that if they have the permits, they might not be eligible for a future guest worker plan.

TPS is intended to help immigrants who have difficulty returning to their homelands because of civil conflict or natural disaster. The current permits expire July 5 and must to be renewed by the end of today.

In recent weeks, senior Honduran and Nicaraguan diplomats have traveled to cities with large populations from their countries, giving radio, television and newspaper interviews urging people to renew. In Honduras, the government has called upon citizens, through commercials and posters, to urge their relatives in the United States to renew their permits, Hernandez said.

U.S. immigration officials rejected an official request for an extension of today's deadline, he said. Yesterday, Honduran consulates across the nation were advised to find post offices that closed late today. Consular officials say they are expecting a last minute rush.

But the question on many minds is: How many?

The Rev. Brian Jordan of the Franciscan Immigration Center in New York City has urged Hondurans and Nicaraguans to renew their permits for weeks. Yesterday, four Hondurans and five Nicaraguans turned up at his center to get help.

"It's not a lot, but it's better than a month ago, when there was none," Jordan said.

Today, he's praying for more applicants.

"On this last day, I hope they realize this false optimism needs to be pushed away and be replaced with a reality check," Jordan said. "I just hope they get their facts straight and not get swayed about what TPS is or is not."

Between A Rock And 'Reform' (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

"Why should we bother to reply to Kautsky?" Lenin asked. "He would reply to us, and we would have to reply to his reply. There is no end to that. It will be quite enough for us to announce that Kautsky is a traitor to the working class, and everyone will understand everything." The immigration debate, which is mostly among, and dangerous primarily to, Republicans, is becoming like that.

Rep. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, denounces as "selling American citizenship" the provision in the Senate bill that requires illegal immigrants to pay back taxes and fines, a provision that its supporters, such as John McCain, call "earned citizenship." And last week McCain said that denying illegal immigrants Social Security and other entitlements is akin to forcing them to "ride in the back of the bus." Regardless of what one thinks of his immigration policy and his aggressive rhetoric in its defense, one must admire his willingness to undo, by teaming with Ted Kennedy to pass "earned citizenship" provisions, much of what he has assiduously done to ingratiate himself with conservatives.

As members of the House and Senate head for a conference to try to reconcile the stark and probably irreconcilable differences incorporated in their two immigration bills, Republicans are between a rock and a hard place. And another rock. And another.

First, if the conferees agree to anything like the Senate bill, the House will reject it -- if it comes to a vote. Speaker Dennis Hastert has a "majority of the majority" rule: Nothing comes to the floor that does not have the support of a majority of Republicans. Probably 75 percent of House Republicans -- including Sensenbrenner, who will probably be the lead House negotiator -- oppose the two pillars of the Senate bill, a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already here. Actually, there are three paths: one for those who have been here five or more years, one for those who have been here between two and five years, and a path away from citizenship and the country for those who have been here less than two years. This plan, which is a huge incentive for the sort of traffic in fraudulent documents that is already pandemic, is to be enforced by a government that will not or cannot enforce existing immigration laws.

Second, if the conference agrees to anything like the House "enforcement first and, for now, only" bill, it will be rejected or filibustered to death in the Senate. All but six Democrats voted for the Senate bill, which a majority of Republicans opposed, so it has no momentum for respect among House Republican conferees.

Third, if any legislation is passed that contains any provision that can be stigmatized as "amnesty," come November some of the Republican base, which is already boiling, will emigrate from the political process by not voting.

Fourth, if no immigration legislation is enacted, voters of various stripes may say, as voters said of congressional Democrats who were in disarray over a crime bill in the summer of 1994, that these people cannot govern and should be given, like unruly 8-year-olds, a timeout. The timeout is now in its 12th year.

But if Congress fails to pass immigration reform, that will not really deserve to be called a failure, for two reasons. First, the moment may not be ripe for reform, because the country is of two minds -- actually, more than two -- about the issue. Second, the system the Framers created, with two legislative bodies having different dynamics because their constituencies have different characteristics, is in this instance performing approximately as the Framers intended.

Senators, only one-third of whom are ever facing imminent elections, are somewhat insulated by six-year terms from the public's fevers. And senators represent larger, less homogenous, more complex constituencies than most House members do.

There is more to democracy than government by adding machine -- merely counting numbers. There also should be institutional ways of measuring, venting and accommodating the intensity of factions. The Senate does that by permitting filibusters. In the House, two-year terms guarantee that intensities are registered. As Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R-Minn.) recently told The Post, "House members' elections are not periods with us, they're just commas. We keep our finger on the public pulse all the time, not just every six years."

The House is supposed to be the barometer that measures the political weather of the moment. It is not failing to do that.

Have Republicans Forgotten? (WT)

By Gary Bauer

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

Would Republicans regret the day they stood against amnesty for illegal immigrants?

In the New York Times, columnist David Brooks asked of conservatives, "Do they think the GOP can have a future if it insults even the Hispanics who are already here [by opposing amnesty proposals]?"

Mr. Brooks was echoing the sentiment of more than a few normally clear-sighted conservatives who suggest that unless the Republican Party gets behind liberal immigration reform plans it will alienate Hispanics and soon be relegated to minority status.

Former Republican National Committee Chairman Ed Gillespie recently warned: "Anti-immigration rhetoric [read: border-security-first legislation] is a political siren song, and Republicans must resist its lure by lashing ourselves to our party's twin masts of freedom and growth or our majority will crash on the shoals."

But as lawmakers consider various immigration reform measures, they should take a hard look at the reams of polling data that show that standing strong on conservative values, not giving in on amnesty, is the key to winning the hearts, minds and votes of Hispanic Americans.

First off, Hispanics are much more conservative on immigration than is commonly believed. An August 2005 Time poll of Hispanics revealed 61 percent considered illegal immigration either an "extremely serious" or "very serious" problem. In addition, 41 percent thought the U.S. was not doing enough to secure its borders against illegal immigration, while 19 percent felt it was doing "too much." Moreover, a 2005 Pew Hispanic Center poll showed a majority of both American-born and foreign-born Hispanics opposed increasing the flow of legal immigrants from Mexico and Latin America.A majority of Hispanics (53 percent) even supported building vast border fences and stiffening penalties for illegal aliens.

As an alternative to amnesty, Indiana Rep. Mike Pence recently presented the Border Integrity and Immigration Reform Act, which would require all illegal citizens to leave the country, obtain a visa and re-enter legally. Essentially, the bill includes all of the important border security measures of the House bill passed last year, and adds a provision — allowing illegals to obtain guest worker visas for a duration of two years. Mr. Pence's plan would also create private worker placement agencies to link specific workers to specific jobs for specified time periods in the United States.

Mr. Pence's "rational middle ground approach" is a breath of fresh air in the immigration debate, because it recognizes the economic need for additional workers while also addressing the security issues at stake. This non-amnesty solution would be acceptable not only to conservatives, but also to American Hispanics who oppose illegal immigration and "reform" proposals that reward delinquency. After all, many Hispanic Americans did things the right way — enduring a long legal process to enter the country and pursue citizenship. For these immigrants, calls for amnesty by their former compatriots mock the laws and values that made America so appealing in the first place.

So, what can Republicans do to win the allegiance of Hispanic voters? Simple: Stand up for conservative values. A recent Time poll found that 72 percent of Hispanics considered "moral values issues" as either "extremely" or "very" important, while 87 percent felt similarly about homeland security.

Hispanics' cultural conservatism is well established. On abortion, a plurality of Hispanics (45 percent in the Time survey) wants to see Roe v. Wade overturned, even as Roe maintains majority support (65 percent) among the population at large. Hispanics also oppose homosexuality and homosexual marriage. A 2002 Pew Hispanic Center and Kaiser Family Foundation poll found 72 percent of Hispanics said they felt homosexual sex between adults is "unacceptable," compared to 59 percent for whites. Polls also routinely show much less support among Hispanics for same-sex "marriage."

Republicans have a distinct advantage with Hispanics on national security, too. A 2004 pre-election survey of Hispanics revealed that 40 percent planned to vote for President Bush mainly because of his solid stance on national security issues.

Republican lawmakers must recognize that Hispanics are conservative in a fundamental way. In fact, it was on the strength of his conservative positions on values issues that George W. Bush doubled the Republican share of the Hispanic vote for president in just eight years. No small feat.

Clearly, reaching out to the burgeoning Hispanic electorate has become a matter of political necessity for Democrats and Republicans alike. Not only are Hispanics the fastest growing ethnic group in America, but they are, politically speaking, a relatively untapped resource — only 47 percent of eligible Hispanics voted in 2004, compared to 64 percent of the population at large.

But if, in attempting to capitalize on these powerful electoral realities, Republicans capitulate on amnesty, not only will they give their conservative base reason to stay home on Election Day, but they may alienate a growing constituency that shares those core conservative values of family, hard work, respect for the rule of law and patriotism.

In Defense Of Familia (USAT)

By Ruben Navarrette

USA Today, June 1, 2006

As a Mexican-American, I'm hearing from a lot of U.S.-born Hispanics who are convinced that the immigration debate is a proxy for an assault on them, their language and their culture. The Senate fed that perception last month when it voted to declare English the "national language," and turned the debate over immigration into a debate over language.

Correction: This was always a debate about language — and culture and ethnicity. The Senate just made it official.

For many Americans, the problem isn't just that people are coming into the country illegally. It's that once they get here, these folks change their surroundings, maintain their Spanish and transform Main Street into Little Mexico. Those changes terrify many Americans, who complain about feeling like visitors in their native land.

And how do they respond? A recent report by the Southern Poverty Law Center found that tension over illegal immigration has contributed to a spike in hate groups and hate crimes. In fact, says a spokesman for the center, the immigration issue is a recruitment tool for racists and reactionaries.

Heated reactions

I could have told them that. As one of the few Hispanic syndicated columnists, I'm treated like a piata. There was the reader who accused me of supporting "the Mexican invasion because you're Mexican" and the gentleman who suggested that by supporting comprehensive reform, I was probably "protecting some relatives."

There was even a woman who called to complain about a column I had written and ended up screaming into the phone about how "you people never understand" the immigration issue.

I understand this much: As the national mood on immigration reform turns vile and even in some cases violent, there is the very real possibility of a backlash by assimilated, U.S.-born Hispanics.

It makes sense. There is so much bad out there — from death threats received by California Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, to the deliberate burning of a Mexican restaurant near San Diego, to the beating and sodomizing of a Hispanic youth in Houston by two young thugs who, according to police, yelled racial slurs — that it is bound to repel the good-hearted.

Recently, my cousin called me in a rage after stumbling on to a video game in which players shoot Mexican immigrants crossing the border. The game refers to some Mexicans as "breeders" and splatters blood when players hit their target. Even as an assimilated Mexican-American with limited exposure to Mexico, my cousin said, the ugliness of it made him want to defend Mexican immigrants just as he would a member of his immediate family.

Other Mexican-Americans tell me the same thing. A lot of them use the same word: defend. They want to defend immigrants.

Granted, 40 million Hispanics aren't monolithic. Note the emergence of You Don't Speak for Me, a group of Hispanics who oppose illegal immigration. Also note that in a poll last year by the Pew Hispanic Center, U.S.-born Hispanics were divided. Fifty-five percent said illegal immigrants help the economy by providing low-cost labor, while 34% said they hurt the economy by driving down wages.

Shifting attitudes

Here's the deal. The U.S-born Hispanic community is no different from the American community. There are the extremes, but the majority of folks are in the sensible center. Whenever someone does something dumb or hurtful, they recoil.

When protesters waved the Mexican flag, some folks in the middle moved to the right. But now that they've read about hate crimes and racist video games and English being declared the national language, some are likely to move to the left and toward a greater identification with immigrants.

That's what I saw at a taping in Los Angeles of the 2006 ALMA awards, which honor Hispanics in entertainment. In a 90-minute ceremony to be aired on ABC on Monday, there were at least a dozen references to immigration and many references by presenters to Mexican immigrants as familia (family).

Actor Jimmy Smits noted the irony of playing, on NBC's The West Wing, a Hispanic who gets elected president while, as he put it, "out in the streets, my people were yelling si se puede (yes, we can)."

I got stuck on the "my people." Smits isn't Mexican-American. His father was born in the Dutch Suriname, in South America, and his mother is Puerto Rican. No matter. In this fight, he identifies with Mexican immigrants.

Something significant is happening in the Hispanic community. People say the immigration issue woke the Sleeping Giant. But mark my words: It's not just the giant whom immigrant-bashers should worry about. It's his familia.

TAX:

Death And Taxes (WSJ)

By Edward C. Prescott

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

You can't take it with you. Too bad, because it would sure be convenient to set up an eternal rollover account for financial assets. Just think of all the time and resources that would be saved if people didn't have to hire expensive lawyers and clever accountants to get around the government's attempt to grab a share of their earthly bounty. Not to mention the better use of those accountants' and lawyers' time.

And while we're at it, our public employees have better things to do than construct estate tax codes, design Web sites with FAQs and answer phones to explain how those taxes work, and then penalize those who unwittingly or otherwise skirt the law. Those costs are real and must be part of the equation when considering the efficacy of estate taxes.

These and other issues loom large as Congress grapples with how to deal with coming changes in estate tax law. Under the Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act of 2001, the estate tax is slated to expire in 2010 -- for one year -- and return in 2011 with personal exclusion rates that are below current levels. Today, Americans can transfer $2 million to beneficiaries federal tax free, with that rate increasing to $3.5 million in 2009 before the big switch in 2010. The House has already passed a bill to make the repeal of estate taxes permanent and the ball is now in the Senate's court.

Putting aside the inefficiencies of such inconsistent rule making, the point remains that people cannot take their IRAs with them, and the fundamental question is this: Who gets it? It's a simple question that deserves a simple answer, but when a certain little word -- tax -- gets involved, things are never very easy.

Economists like simplicity. It's one of our most endearing traits. As soon as you complicate things by getting between a man and his intentions you create all sorts of distortions that are often suboptimal (and are the devil to model). Taxes excel at these shenanigans. And those distortions don't end when the grim reaper comes calling. Ashes to ashes, dust to trust.

In the end, though, all those opportunity costs -- both private and public -- would be worth absorbing if we were really getting a good return on our estate taxes. From what I can tell, there are two main arguments in favor of an estate tax: the increased revenue that government receives to go about the people's business; and the desire to somehow balance life's unfairness by limiting the amount of capital assets that "the rich" can leave their kids.

On the second point, there is little to say except that what's fair for one is often penalty for another. What is fair, for example, about telling someone that he will be unable to distribute his hard-earned money, which has already been taxed once, to his heirs as he sees fit? Such a person has zero incentive to accept an estate tax for which he sees no justification. He will do his best to try to avoid this tax through every legal means necessary, after which he may be inclined to consume more than he otherwise would, or just quit working sooner than otherwise. And while there's nothing wrong with consuming one's assets, if such consumption comes at the expense of capital that would otherwise be put to better use, such consumption is suboptimal. Recent empirical work on the disincentive effects of estate taxes has proven these phenomena true.

And that gets to our first point about the supposed budgetary benefits of such a tax. Since an estate tax is really just another name for a tax on capital income, then there is certainly no justification for such a tax. I, and others, have written before in these pages about the inefficiency of capital income taxes, and there's no need to revive those arguments here, except to say that we can only grip the neck of our vibrant economic goose so tightly before it eventually dies and quits laying those golden eggs. And many of those golden eggs come in the form of capital that allows descendents to keep family businesses intact, or to begin new businesses that fuel our economy.

Besides, even if estate taxes were not inefficient and could be construed as fair, they would still do little to address the budget deficit. In 2003, net estate taxes accounted for $20.7 billion, a drop in the bucket of an $11 trillion economy. Clearly, we are not going to balance the budget by grave robbing.

Yet what about all the money that is left in bequests to fund university alumni buildings, art museum wings and public broadcasting? If we abolish the death tax, won't charitable organizations be hurt? I admit to a soft spot for this argument, but the fact is that people will still give to charity. In 2003, charitable contributions reported on 1040 income tax forms totaled $145 billion, which is roughly 10 times the $14.6 billion charitable contributions reported on the estate tax forms. This indicates that people are motivated to give to their favorite causes for a variety of reasons and will not cease such philanthropy if estate taxes are abolished; also, fundraisers will not lose their incentives.

The old maxim says that there are only two things in life that we can't avoid, death and taxes, but why pile on by combining the two? The Senate should join the House in permanently repealing the estate tax.

An Accidental Tax Boon (WP)

By Robert H. Nelson

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Sometimes in Washington, good things are more likely to happen by accident than by congressional or executive design. Treasury secretary nominee Henry M. Paulson Jr. is no doubt aware of this fact, but it's one worth keeping in mind in the continuing debate over tax reform, which is sure to command a good deal of the new secretary's attention. I'm thinking of one program in particular: the alternative minimum tax, or AMT.

The AMT is viewed by many as a bad thing. Yet, consider this: There is wide agreement among economists on the benefits of a federal "flat tax" on income that would apply a uniform rate to every taxpayer and eliminate most current deductions and tax credits. A flat tax would get rid of a large number of economic distortions resulting from the many tax "subsidies" that often benefit narrow interest groups. This is tax "pork," and Congress is as addicted to it as to the ordinary spending kind.

In places around the world, including Eastern Europe, governments creating new tax systems have been turning to a flat tax to avoid this sort of thing. What does this have to do with the AMT? Just this: As Post business reporter Albert B. Crenshaw has noted, the AMT "approaches a modern-day flat tax." It imposes a uniform rate of 26 percent up to $175,000 in income, and above that 28 percent.

Tax revolutions are few and far between. Taxes are so important to the economy that major changes in tax law are best achieved incrementally, giving notice well in advance and avoiding potentially large disruptions from big surprises. That's part of the genius of the AMT. If it is left alone, it will move us gradually but steadily toward a flat tax on income as inflation brings more people within its ambit.

Some leading Republican conservatives have long advocated a flat tax. Yet few of them are speaking out vigorously for retention of the AMT. In fact, many are joining the clamor in Congress for its repeal or limitation. It would seem that they were either hypocritical in advocating a flat tax or have somehow failed to recognize that the AMT is in essence a new, evolving form of flat tax.

Many Democrats are joining the calls for drastic cutbacks in the AMT. This shows a certain disregard for the fact that the existing system of tax subsidies is most generous to higher-income groups and does less for the bottom half of the income distribution -- their supposed constituency.

The alternative minimum tax dates to the 1960s -- and in its present form, to the 1980s. It was never intended as a major tax reform but rather was simply a political expedient to provide some cover when a few very rich people were revealed to be paying little in income taxes. But as Americans' incomes have risen, more and more people have been finding that their tax payments are now determined by the AMT.

Congress has already taken steps to reduce the AMT's impact. The recently enacted tax bill raises the special AMT "standard exemption" to $62,550 for a couple filing jointly and to $42,500 for a single filer. At these levels, some 5 million taxpayers will be subject to the AMT for their 2006 taxes. But these changes are for one year, and absent new congressional action, the exemption will fall back to $45,000 for couples and $33,750 for individuals in the 2007 tax year. If that happens, as many as 25 million taxpayers might be affected by the AMT. We would be moving toward a nationwide flat tax.

If we wait long enough, and with some continuing degree of inflation, the AMT flat tax eventually will apply to most taxpayers. The AMT will, in effect, have become the federal income tax system. And unlike most other important policy changes, this is one in which Congress need do nothing, although at some point it would probably be desirable to modify details of the current AMT that limit its effectiveness as a flat tax.

If the present AMT rates were applied as a universal flat tax -- and especially if the AMT exemption were reduced and certain remaining AMT exclusions eliminated -- the resulting federal revenue might even come to exceed current expenditure levels. The solution would then be to reduce the flat tax rate (the AMT rate) so that revenue and expenditures were brought back into balance.

In the longer run, the AMT could open the way to more radical reforms that might even change the basic nature of Washington spending habits. One option would be as follows: Each year the president would submit his budget proposal, and Congress, in response, would enact final appropriations. A neutral expert commission would then estimate the resulting federal revenue requirements, and a new flat tax rate, calculated to balance the budget, would be set for the forthcoming tax year. If Congress wanted to go on a spending spree, taxpayers would see the consequences directly and immediately in their pocketbooks.

The Social Security system is another area in which the AMT might facilitate radical change. Social Security taxes could be abolished and the flat tax adjusted upward to compensate for the lost revenue. The Social Security trust fund is largely an accounting fiction, and it is time to integrate the Social Security tax with the income tax system. Alternatively, Social Security tax payments could become a deductible credit from the required AMT payment.

Such major changes in tax law, and some needed refinements to the existing AMT, can be debated and discussed. Right now, the most important step is to keep Congress from ruining a good thing. If it can be persuaded to leave the AMT alone next year and in future years, Congress will continue progress toward a flat tax revolution that has been in the works for many years. Such a gradual process is probably the only way the United States will ever adopt such a major change. The AMT is a tax policy windfall that ought to be protected and preserved.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Gives CIA's New Director A Boost (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, May 31, 2006

President Bush gave the embattled Central Intelligence Agency his vote of confidence on Wednesday, saying the spy outfit will succeed at its mission and make Americans safer with new director Gen. Michael Hayden at its helm.

Bush made the quick trip from the White House to CIA headquarters in suburban Virginia for a ceremonial swearing-in of Hayden. The former head of the National Security Agency who served as the United States' No. 2 intelligence official for the last year was officially sworn in Tuesday and had already had his first day on the job when Bush arrived.

"He's such a good man we're going to swear him in twice," the president joked.

DOJ_NMG_0031055

While the CIA once was pre-eminent among the U.S. intelligence community's 15 other spy agencies, the 2004 intelligence reform law made it equal to other organizations including the NSA and Defense Intelligence Agency.

Bush, seeking to both reassure CIA employees and spur them on to additional changes, said he had tasked Hayden with further developing the agency's old-fashioned spy capabilities and improving its analytical skills.

"America's leaders are going to have the best possible intelligence and Mike Hayden is going to work with you to see that that's the case," the president said. "Mike understands the CIA must transform to confront new dangers and do so without slowing the high tempo at which it already operates."

Bush appeared warmly welcomed by the several hundred employees gathered in the CIA's main lobby despite his White House's tussles with the CIA and the agency's tradition of remaining distant from politics. He said he is confident a Hayden-led CIA can deliver.

"In Mike Hayden, you have a leader who recognizes your talents, who understands your challenges and will ensure that you remain the finest intelligence agency in the world," Bush said.

The president was briefed privately on unknown topics for about 45 minutes before the short public event.

After taking the oath for a second time, Hayden spoke briefly to the CIA's officers in his blue Air Force uniform, four stars on each shoulder. This week marks the first time since 1953 that the agency has been headed by an active duty military officer.

"Let's just go to work," he said.

Hayden Takes Oath As CIA Director (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

New CIA Director Gen. Michael V. Hayden yesterday drew 1,500 rank-and-file agency employees to the halls of the spy agency's Langley headquarters for his second swearing-in this week, telling his co-workers in clipped military parlance, "Let's just go to work."

The Air Force general was officially sworn in Monday at the agency, but returned to the same site yesterday for a ceremonial swearing-in.

"He's such a good man, we're going to swear him in twice," President Bush joked.

The president lavished praise on the general, who wore his blue Air Force uniform, four stars on each shoulder, for the ceremony.

"Mike is a patriot; he's a reformer. He's one of our nation's finest intelligence professionals. I know firsthand how good this guy is," Mr. Bush said. "He brings more than two decades of experience in the intelligence field. He is going to be a superb leader for the dedicated men and women of the CIA."

For his part, Gen. Hayden told the president and the employees now working under him: "I could not be more grateful."

The oath was given to Gen. Hayden by Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, who oversees more than a dozen spy operations, including those at the CIA.

Gen. Hayden, 61, was confirmed last week by the Senate by a vote of 78-15, even though Democrats initially questioned his past leadership at the National Security Agency, which oversaw a controversial domestic wiretap program. He replaces Porter J. Goss, a former congressman who resigned after 18 months as the agency's director amid criticism that he had failed to push the agency into the 21st-century war against terror.

The president sought to reassure the rank-and-file at the CIA that their new boss was the right man for the job.

"America's leaders are going to have the best possible intelligence, and Mike Hayden is going to work with you to see that that's the case," Mr. Bush said. "Mike understands the CIA must transform to confront new dangers and do so without slowing the high tempo at which it already operates. ... In Mike Hayden, you have a leader who recognizes your talents, who understands your challenges and will ensure that you remain the finest intelligence agency in the world."

After taking the oath for the second time, Gen. Hayden, the first active-duty military officer to head the spy agency since 1953, spoke briefly to the CIA staff.

"To my new friends and partners here at the Central Intelligence Agency, thank you for the warmth of your welcome over the last 24 hours. ... Mr. President, thank you for the honor of placing your confidence in me, and for all of us here and around the world, thank you for the faith you have placed in this agency," the general said.

Bush Hails Role Of C.I.A. As New Chief Takes Oath (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031056

WASHINGTON, May 31 — President Bush delivered a pep talk to employees of the Central Intelligence Agency on Wednesday, assuring them that the beleaguered agency played a critical role in the nation's security and remained "vital" to the work of the White House.

Addressing the employees after Gen. Michael V. Hayden was sworn in as C.I.A. director, Mr. Bush praised the agency's work, which he called "essential to understanding the plans and intentions of dangerous regimes and terrorist organizations around the world."

"I cannot do my job without the Central Intelligence Agency," Mr. Bush said, addressing employees inside the main lobby of the agency's headquarters at Langley, Va.

The event was the second swearing-in for General Hayden in two days. The general officially became director at a private ceremony on Tuesday, and Wednesday's public event seemed largely intended to lift morale inside an agency that has lost its place as the cornerstone of the American intelligence community.

In contrast to the private White House ceremony 20 months ago, when Porter J. Goss was sworn in as director, the speeches on Wednesday were also an effort to portray calm after several rocky years at the C.I.A.

Standing alongside General Hayden and John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, Mr. Bush praised both men and predicted a more streamlined intelligence community.

Earlier this month, Mr. Goss resigned as C.I.A director after fierce turf battles with Mr. Negroponte over the agency's role in intelligence collection and analysis.

Mr. Bush praised Mr. Goss on Wednesday, saying the former director "leaves behind a C.I.A. that's stronger than the one he found."

General Hayden, who addressed C.I.A. employees on Tuesday and received a standing ovation, refrained from a lengthy public address on Wednesday.

He thanked the president and his family and said, "Let's just go to work."

General Hayden wore his blue Air Force uniform at the ceremony, and has indicated that he has no immediate plans either to retire from the military or to begin dressing in civilian clothes as head of the C.I.A.

At his confirmation hearings, he said that his military career had shaped his worldview, and that deciding to wear civilian clothes would change little.

"The fact that I have to decide what tie to put on in the morning doesn't change who I am," he said.

But the general said that if he believed that being in the military was hindering his ability to bond with the C.I.A. work force, he would consider retiring his military commission.

The choice of a military officer to lead the civilian spy agency initially drew criticism from several lawmakers, who suggested that the C.I.A. might surrender its independence as the Pentagon was expanding its intelligence gathering operations.

But after the confirmation hearings, several senators said he had convinced them that he would act independently of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld while in charge at the C.I.A.

Yet the issue remains sensitive on Capitol Hill. Last Thursday, the Senate Intelligence Committee approved language in the 2007 authorization bill that future C.I.A. directors be civilians and that General Hayden was "not subject to the supervision or control of the secretary of defense" so long as he ran the C.I.A. as an active duty officer.

Spies Are Called Essential (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

President Bush, at the public ceremony swearing in Gen. Michael V. Hayden as director of the CIA, yesterday urged continued development of human intelligence, calling it essential in determining the intentions of "dangerous regimes and terrorist organizations."

In focusing his brief remarks on the CIA's need to recruit spies "to penetrate closed societies and secretive organizations," the president hit on an agency problem highlighted last week in a Senate Select Committee on Intelligence report. The committee said it was concerned that the CIA had not resolved issues that made it difficult to place new officers abroad under "non-official cover," a status that puts them in covert civilian roles and outside U.S. embassies where they lack diplomatic protection.

At his confirmation hearing last month, Hayden pledged increased use of such covert operations. This emphasis has been underway at the CIA since then-Director George J. Tenet began, after the Sept. 11 attacks, to move more case officers in the agency's clandestine service out of embassies and into undercover roles that would allow them to meet and attempt to recruit individuals who could penetrate terrorist circles. That movement continued, though more slowly, during the past 18 months that former representative Porter J. Goss (R-Fla.) ran the agency.

Placing U.S.-born covert officers abroad is difficult and dangerous, present and former CIA officials said. Recently, an Italian magistrate publicly identified what he said were 13 CIA officers operating in that country. And agency aircraft used to transport suspected terrorists have been spotted by civilian airport watchers.

All are a sign that the CIA is not doing enough to keep its covert officers' identities secret, especially in the Internet age when so much personal information can be easily searched, said one congressional aide familiar with the Senate report.

"We understand how difficult it is, and they are working to fix it, but the agency doesn't seem yet up to the task," the aide said.

An agency official with clandestine experience said such protections are essential. "Because cover exists to protect our people and assist our operations, its strength and improvement are a constant concern for CIA," the official said. "We have been enhancing our cover tradecraft to meet the challenges of the Internet age, when personal data is more easily accessible than ever before. To be sure, there is more to be done, and no one here underestimates the complexity and difficulty of the task," he added.

But even more important than such security is recruiting the right person, said a former CIA station chief with experience in the Middle East. The right person must be able to live the life of the cover assignment as well as operate as an intelligence gatherer, often in a difficult foreign environment. One classic past cover for such covert officer was with American businesses doing work abroad. But because the officers had to be identified to the top company officials, there was always fear of exposure.

"Not many Americans want to do this, and most Americans, who are terrible with foreign languages, do not do it very well," the former station chief said. He cited examples where Arab-speaking Americans from Detroit's Arab population were sent to the Middle East and were easily identified because of their accents or dialect.

Another official, still working for the agency, recalled that Cuban intelligence quickly identified Spanish-speaking CIA officers who infiltrated that country because of their manner of speaking. "They could even tell where they learned their Spanish," the official said. Even easier to identify were African Americans sent to African countries who could not hide their lack of knowledge of tribal dialects or history.

"The Hollywood version of a 'Mission Impossible' team, where people somehow mystically integrate themselves into a society, has taken hold. In real life, it does not work that way," the former station chief said. The CIA "ought to go back to basics and stop believing there mystically is some new kind of cover for placing officers abroad."

Stolen Data On Vets Include Addresses, Phone Numbers (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Veterans Affairs Department lost more personal data on 26.5 million veterans than it first acknowledged last week, according to a memo released Wednesday. In addition to Social Security numbers and birthdates, files stolen from a VA analyst's home last month included addresses and phone numbers in many cases, the memo said.

One file containing more than 6,700 records pertaining to veterans exposed to mustard gas was lost, said the memo, which was written by a VA privacy officer. The VA gave the memo to the House Veterans' Affairs Committee at the request of Rep. Bob Filner of California, the panel's acting ranking Democrat. USA TODAY obtained the memo from the committee.

Privacy experts say the Social Security numbers could be used to open fraudulent credit cards or bank accounts.

“These types of data contain more than limited financial information. The codes contain information about veterans' medical conditions,” Filner said in a statement.

Joe Davis, a spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said the VA needs to do a better job of reaching out to affected veterans. He said it's particularly important for the department to contact older veterans and their families to encourage them to monitor their bank and credit card accounts.

“It's maddening that the VA is not more forthcoming,” Davis said.

Matthew Burns, a spokesman for the VA, said the department has taken aggressive steps to secure its data, including personnel changes in the department from which the data were lost.

“VA's initial and primary efforts have focused on notifying veterans and some spouses whose most sensitive and identifiable information … may have been compromised,” Burns said.

The VA said it was dismissing the analyst, and his supervisor has resigned. Dennis Duffy, the acting head of the division in which the analyst worked, has been placed on administrative leave.

Also Wednesday, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson named former Maricopa County, Ariz., prosecutor Richard Romley as his new special adviser for information security.

DOJ_NMG_0031058

A department analyst had taken the data home on computer disks and an external storage device, the memo said. On May 3, burglars stole the disks, memory device and a laptop computer from the analyst's suburban Washington home. Nicholson has said that the crime appeared to be random and that the data were not a target.

The memo noted that the information was written in a code that requires training and software to access. The VA says it has not received reports of stolen data being used for fraudulent purposes.

VA Data In Format Not Widely Used (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The sensitive personal information of 26.5 million veterans that was stolen from a Department of Veterans Affairs data analyst last month was stored in a format that could make it difficult for thieves to use, according to an internal VA memo.

In the May 5 memo, VA privacy officer Mark Whitney wrote that the critical data "may not be easily accessible" because most of it -- including names, birth dates and Social Security numbers -- was stored in a specialized, standard format used for data manipulation and statistical analysis.

The format "requires specialized application software and training" to write computer code "to access and manipulate the data for use," Whitney wrote in the memo, obtained yesterday by The Washington Post.

Ari Schwartz, deputy director of the nonprofit Center for Democracy and Technology, a privacy group, said Whitney is generally right that the information would be hard to extract.

It would be easier, however, if the laptop stolen along with an external hard drive and several data disks has the software needed to view the data, he said. "This is not nearly the type of protection they would have had if they had followed basic security procedures and encrypted this," Schwartz said.

The Whitney memo, dated two days after the burglary at the analyst's Aspen Hill home and distributed to several high-ranking VA officials, provides the first public indication that some addresses and telephone numbers were among the stolen data; it refers to such information being part of electronic files of a national survey of about 20,000 veterans in 2001.

Also stolen was an electronic spreadsheet with 6,744 records about "mustard gas veterans" -- generally, veterans who took part in chemical warfare tests during World War II. Another stolen file contains as many as 10 diagnostic codes from the treatment file of one veteran who visited the VA health-care system on 57 dates.

"These type of data contain more than limited financial information, the codes contain information about veterans' medical conditions," Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) said in a statement. "It is not appropriate for this information to ever enter the public domain."

Matthew Burns, a VA spokesman, said the department has been "focused on getting notification to veterans that some of the most sensitive data was out there."

Also yesterday, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson announced that he had named Richard M. Romley, a former prosecutor from Maricopa County, Ariz., as his new special adviser for information security. Romley, a Marine Corps veteran, will evaluate the department's computer security procedures and recommend improvements.

The move follows the resignation last week of Michael H. McLendon, a VA deputy assistant secretary who learned of the May 3 burglary within hours of the crime but did not immediately tell top-ranked officials.

Nicholson announced Tuesday that the employee will be fired and that Dennis M. Duffy, who has been acting assistant secretary for policy and planning, had been placed on administrative leave. The employee worked in McLendon's office, and Duffy was in charge of the division in which both worked.

Nicholson learned of the information breach on May 16 and told the public on May 22, nearly three weeks after the crime.

Treasury Pick Draws Praise, Policy Doesn't (AP-Y2)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP2, May 31, 2006

President Bush's selection of a savvy Wall Street veteran to be his third treasury secretary is winning widespread praise, but Democrats say it will take a change in policies — not just personnel — to deal with budget and trade deficits and other economic problems.

With his approval rating at record lows despite strong economic growth and low unemployment, Bush announced Tuesday that he was turning to Henry Paulson, chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs, to become the administration's chief economic spokesman.

By choosing a 32-year veteran of one of Wall Street's premier investment houses, Bush is hoping for the same economic credibility that Bill Clinton gained when he picked Robert Rubin, one of Paulson's predecessors at Goldman Sachs, as his treasury secretary.

Paulson, whose Senate confirmation seems assured, would succeed John Snow, the former head of CSX Corp. Snow had followed Alcoa chief executive Paul O'Neill, who was forced to resign in late 2002.

While both Snow and O'Neill came from corporate America, the administration decided it needed someone with high standing on Wall Street to be a more effective salesman for its economic program.

"Mr. Paulson's experience in running Goldman Sachs, a global financial firm involved in all kinds of sophisticated corporate and financial activities, makes him a near-perfect appointment," Allen Sinai of Decision Economics said in a typical Wall Street reaction.

Snow had been rumored to be on his way out for more than a year, but the selection of Paulson, 60, came as a surprise because of recent administration signals that it had failed to lure a big Wall Street name as a replacement.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush met with Paulson on May 20 and Paulson accepted the job the next day. He said White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten, who used to work at Goldman Sachs, was the matchmaker, and the president sealed the deal after Paulson expressed reservations.

"I know that there had been some conversations, and that he expressed reluctance — I'm not sure it was a flat `No,'" Snow said Wednesday. "I do know that the final answer was yes and I do know that Josh Bolten continued to speak with him."

Snow did not elaborate on how the president convinced Paulson to do the job. "It is safe to say that he (Paulson) had some reluctance about doing it, and was insistent on a series of conditions, and apparently his concerns were addressed," Snow said.

While Paulson was chosen to bolster confidence on Wall Street about the administration's policies, investors on Tuesday ignored the initial news to focus instead on worries about higher oil prices and sliding consumer confidence, pushing the Dow Jones industrial average down by 184 points.

Analysts said the sell-off, one of a number of recent steep slides, highlighted the challenges Paulson faces at a time when inflation is threatening to accelerate and economic growth is slowing.

Given this administration's past practice of using its treasury secretary chiefly as a salesman for policies set inside the White House, some analysts questioned how much impact Paulson will have.

"Will the new treasury secretary have any more influence than his two predecessors did, and will this administration be able to get anything through Congress with just 2 1/2 years to go?" said David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's in New York.

Bush's top second term domestic priority, Social Security overhaul, is currently dead, his drive to overhaul the tax code is in the deep freeze, and Democrats are massing to defeat the president's effort to make permanent his first-term tax cuts, charging they are unaffordable in light of huge budget deficits.

"The Bush administration must use its remaining years in office to right the fiscal wrongs of its first term," said Rep. Charles Rangel (news, bio, voting record), top Democrat on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee.

"It is essential that Mr. Paulson provide a realistic viewpoint of the serious issues facing the American economy," said Sen. Jack Reed (news, bio, voting record), D-R.I.

Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y., said Paulson's long experience in dealing with China should help in the administration's campaign to get the Chinese government to allow its currency rise in value against the dollar as a way of dealing with a record $202 billion U.S. trade deficit with China.

In his writings and speeches, Paulson has been a strong supporter of the administration's tax cuts and its free-trade agenda. He also gave a pivotal speech in 2002 in support of a crackdown on corporate crime in the wake of the Enron Corp. and other business scandals.

A strong environmentalist and devoted bird watcher and fisherman, Paulson has supported the need to attack global warming, a stand that could put him at odds with Bush's environmental views, although treasury does not have responsibility for those issues.

Paulson, a Christian Scientist who does not drink or smoke, has used a fortune estimated at well over $500 million to make generous contributions to Republican candidates, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a campaign watchdog group.

During a brief White House announcement ceremony on Tuesday, Paulson called the American economy "truly a marvel, but we cannot take it for granted. We must take steps to maintain our competitive edge in the world."

2 New Captains Of The Economy Face Volatile Global Markets (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 31 — One reached the pinnacle of wealth and prestige as a dealmaker on Wall Street. The other was an academic superstar, brilliant but somewhat shy and more at ease in Bermuda shorts than suits.

But now they find themselves side by side in confronting a stiff new test: helping to guide the economy from a period of fast growth and cheap money through one of higher interest rates, jittery markets and a falling dollar.

Henry M. Paulson Jr., the chief executive of Goldman Sachs and President Bush's choice to become his new Treasury secretary, is expected to arrive at his post at a time when global financial markets are suddenly more volatile and investors are more risk-averse than they have been in years.

Ben S. Bernanke, the former Princeton economics professor who became chairman of the Federal Reserve on Feb. 1, has already endured a baptism of fire as the Fed has struggled over when to stop raising interest rates.

Just a few weeks ago, bond prices dropped and critics complained that Mr. Bernanke lacked "manhood" or at least "Street cred" as an inflation fighter. In more recent days, investors have been rattled by the opposite fear: Mr. Bernanke might be too tough and push interest rates higher than they had thought, potentially slowing or reversing the liquidity-driven investment boom of recent years.

Mr. Paulson provoked speculation about the dollar even before he left Mr. Bush's side at the announcement of his nomination on Tuesday morning.

Mr. Paulson called for "steps to maintain our competitive edge in the world," a bland remark that some investors nonetheless interpreted as code for using a weaker dollar to make American exports cheaper in other countries.

"These two captains are forced to navigate in some very choppy waters," said Richard Yamarone, chief economist at Argus Research. "The message that the Fed is sending is that they don't have a clear grasp on the goings-on of the economy, and the same could be said of the Bush administration."

At first glance, the pairing of Mr. Bernanke and Mr. Paulson looks like an attempt to recreate the celebrated collaboration between Alan Greenspan and Robert E. Rubin in the 1990's, when the economy and the stock market soared and the federal budget swung from deficits to surpluses.

Mr. Greenspan, who ran the Fed, was not an academic but shared Mr. Bernanke's penchant for poring over economic data and challenging conventional wisdom.

Mr. Rubin, Treasury secretary under President Bill Clinton, had, like Mr. Paulson, been a chairman of Goldman Sachs. He teamed up with Mr. Greenspan to champion tough restraints on government spending, employed his credibility on Wall Street to assure financial markets that Mr. Clinton was serious about dealing with the budget deficit and played an influential role in shaping foreign policy.

Mr. Paulson, whose nomination has been praised by Democrats as well as Republicans, is almost certain to win easy Senate approval and become a central player on Mr. Bush's team.

But analysts say both he and Mr. Bernanke need to establish their credibility in financial markets at a time when the economy is in a major transition.

For the first time in nearly two decades, inflation is on an upward rather than downward trend. Energy prices remain near historic highs, even though oil prices dropped on Wednesday as immediate fears of a confrontation with Iran eased. Long-term interest rates — the fuel that powers the housing market when they are low — are on the rise.

Meanwhile, the economy faces structural budget deficits that will not disappear without major changes in taxes and spending, and the Fed could find itself in a clash with the Bush administration if budget deficits remain high.

Perhaps most important, however, investors around the world have become more anxious about the United States' huge trade deficits and its ballooning foreign debt. That is pushing down the value of the dollar, a trend that would help reduce trade imbalances but has also elevated worries about a more painful crash for the American currency.

Much of the uncertainty stems from a shift at the Federal Reserve and other central banks. After propping up economic growth by keeping interest rates far below normal levels, the central banks are removing the cushion of cheap money.

"The marketplace over all is being forced to reabsorb risk that formerly had been underwritten by the big three central banks — the Fed, the Bank of Japan and the People's Bank of China," said Paul McCulley, managing director of Pimco Advisers, the giant bond management firm. "When you've got all three taking away the punch bowl, the partyers at the party are not going to be happy."

Mr. Bernanke arrived at the Fed when monetary policy was already at a tipping point. Having raised short-term interest rates under Mr. Greenspan's guidance for nearly two years by the time Mr. Bernanke took over, Fed officials knew they were nearing the point where they could stop. But because there is such a long lag time between changes in monetary policy and their impact, inflationary pressures were on the rise and economic growth was still torrid.

In late April, Mr. Bernanke confounded markets even as he struggled to explain that the Fed needed to keep its options open by basing decisions on incoming economic data rather than maintaining monetary policy on automatic pilot.

Testifying before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress on April 27, Mr. Bernanke set off a rally by announcing that the Fed might pause in its rate increases to assess the impact of its previous increases.

What startled bond investors was Mr. Bernanke's added twist: that the Fed might pause even if "the risks to its objectives are not entirely balanced" meaning that it might take its foot off the monetary brakes, at least temporarily, even if there were signs of slightly higher inflation risks.

Bond investors, suspecting that Mr. Bernanke might be soft on inflation at a time when energy prices were shooting up, began demanding higher yields on long-term Treasury bonds.

Pundits began accusing Mr. Bernanke of vacillating.

"In jest, I've been saying that Mr. Bernanke needs to regain his monetary manhood," Larry Kudlow, an economist and talk show host, recently told viewers on CNBC. "He was people-pleasing Wall Street. Now he has got to go back on message."

Barry Ritholtz, an economic consultant and operator of an economic blog, the Big Picture, went further and called Mr. Bernanke the "Neville Chamberlain of inflation fighters."

"I got the sense that Mr. Bernanke was appeasing the stock market," Mr. Ritholtz said in an interview. "It's not that he has to go out and prove his manhood and his street-fighting cred. It's just that he has to navigate at a particularly perilous moment in the economy, and he has to navigate absolutely flawlessly."

Two days after raising the prospect of a pause, Mr. Bernanke compounded the confusion by venting his frustration about being "misunderstood" during an off-camera conversation with Maria Bartiromo, a correspondent for CNBC.

Word of the comments set off another round of feverish trading on April 29. Last week, Mr. Bernanke told lawmakers at the Senate Banking committee that his remarks to Ms. Bartiromo had been a "lapse in judgment" and that in the future, he would communicate only through formal channels.

Despite the bumpy path, Mr. Bernanke's first few months have been far smoother than Mr. Greenspan's arrival in August 1987. Bond investors, convinced that Mr. Greenspan could not match the inflation-fighting prowess of his predecessor, Paul A. Volcker, quickly pushed up interest rates on long-term Treasury Bonds.

Yields on 10-year Treasury bonds shot up from 8.8 percent to more than 10 percent during Mr. Greenspan's first two months as Fed chairman. The stock market, plagued by a host of uncertainties, fell 22.6 percent on October 19, 1987.

By contrast, rates on 10-year Treasury bonds have climbed modestly since Mr. Bernanke took office, from about 4.5 percent to about 5 percent today. One crucial indicator of inflation expectations, the difference in price between regular Treasury bonds and special inflation-protected Treasury securities, are not much higher today than when Mr. Bernanke took over in February.

Edward McKelvey, an economist at Goldman Sachs, said Mr. Bernanke's message had in fact been clear even if that left investors unsure about the Fed's next move.

"He is sending a fairly consistent message that says we're going to evaluate the data insofar as they affect the outlook," Mr. McKelvey said. "This is child's play compared to what Greenspan had in the first two or three months of his term."

Mr. Paulson may face his own trial by fire. As Treasury secretary, Mr. Paulson would have authority over the government's policy on exchange rates and the value of the dollar.

Mr. Paulson is likely to continue the policy of his predecessor, John W. Snow, in supporting a "strong dollar" but insisting that its value be determined by market forces. In practice, the administration has been content to let the dollar drift down in value for the last two years, a trend that makes American exports cheaper and imports more expensive.

Mr. Snow did not have to grapple with any major currency disruptions, but Mr. Paulson may not be so lucky.

"There are fewer certainties," said Lou Crandall, chief economist at Wrightson ICAP. "He is walking into an environment where the dollar is widely perceived to be at risk."

Paulson Has The Tools But Needs Bush's Support (FT)

By Stephen Cecchetti

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

The announcement of Hank Paulson's nomination as US Treasury secretary is good news for everyone. In many ways he is the perfect complement to Ben Bernanke, the new Federal Reserve chairman. A giant among monetary policy thinkers is being joined by one of the most important financiers in the world. We now have the essential combination of a theorist working with a practitioner.

DOJ_NMG_0031062

The big question is what will President George W. Bush do with his new top-quality team? Will the White House finally promote high-quality economic policy above pure politics? Or will Mr Paulson be frustrated in the way that past Bush economic advisers have been?

We will at least see the benefit of having a highly placed government official who knows how to communicate with Wall Street. Having spent nearly his entire professional life in the financial markets, Mr Paulson is fluent in the language of traders and investment bankers. He knows the concerns of the markets and how to respond to them using an efficiency of language that comes only from experience.

As we have seen recently, it can be very difficult to communicate economic policy. Small missteps can create large movements in stock and bond prices – movements that are potentially damaging. Since the retirement of Alan Greenspan as Fed chairman, no one on the Bush economic team has had the ability to soothe the markets in the face of minor problems of language. It is amazing how important it is to get the adverbs and adjectives exactly right when speaking to financial markets. Now we have someone who knows how to do it, leaving the Fed to concentrate on making interest rate policy. The benefits are likely to be enormous.

But we can expect much more than just words from a person of Mr Paulson's experience and accomplishments. We now have someone who has the tools to face the country's big economic problems head on. Those challenges are huge. A successful Paulson Treasury must put the relationship of capital markets and economic growth on a more solid footing. This means facing three separate, but related issues: the relationship of the federal government to the economy, the interactions between the US economy and the rest of the world's economies, and the problems associated with financing retirees.

The job of fiscal policy is to provide the underlying foundation for a growing economy. That is a very complex job involving not only security, but ensuring that capital flows to its most productive uses. The ideal Treasury secretary is a successful advocate for fiscal policies that maximise economic efficiency. This is a matter of implementing the right combination of tax and expenditure policies. In recent years, tax law has become riddled with special provisions that both distort incentives and leave most people feeling it is unfair. The solution is fairly simple: we need to simplify the tax system and, of course, find a way to reduce the fiscal deficit at the same time. This requires a good relationship with the US Congress – something few recent Treasury heads have had.

In an increasingly globalised economy, the Treasury secretary has taken on an ever bigger role as the facilitator of international capital flows. This is more than just running US exchange rate policy, which the secretary does in conjunction with the Federal Reserve. It includes working to ensure that global imbalances are kept under control, reducing the threat of large, sudden movements in exchange rates, or abrupt reversals of the flow of capital. Again, a steady hand (and voice) at the Treasury can help to reassure foreign governments and investors, thereby reducing harmful volatility.

We can be optimistic that there will be an improvement in the relationship between the US and China. Economic policy towards China is about much more than just exchange rates. It is about how to integrate emerging Asia into the modern economic system. Here, Mr Paulson seems likely to excel, assuming that he is given the appropriate independence to make policy.

Finally, Americans are consuming all that they earn, saving nothing. Foreigners are providing all of the 7 per cent of gross domestic product that makes up investment net of depreciation. As a result, it is hard to see how Americans will be able to finance their retirement years. Something has to be done about this. We need someone with the stature to lead a national debate on this subject, culminating in a course of action that is agreed by all parties.

Solving these problems means negotiating the co-operation of groups with disparate interests. Mr Paulson will have to negotiate tax reform and deficit reduction; find a way to convince people that trade creates low-priced goods that benefit everyone and that international capital flows allow us to grow faster. He must persuade younger workers to save while convincing the relatively well-off elderly to give up some of their government-supplied pension benefits.

Among the hardest to convince of any of this will be Congress. Paul O'Neill and John Snow, the previous two Bush Treasury secretaries, surely understood the economics of everything that I am saying. But they lacked the full support of the White House to push for good economic policy in the face of political unpopularity, and the ability to articulate the message using the language that markets understand. Mr Paulson will definitely provide the second of these. Let us hope that President Bush gives us the first.

Paulson Of The Treasury (WSJ)

By Lawrence Kudlow

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031063

In spearing a big-fish successor for departing Treasury Secretary John Snow, our first MBA president finally turned to Wall Street for another MBA: Goldman Sachs CEO Henry Paulson. According to all news accounts, Mr. Paulson was a tough man to recruit -- but it's a bullish sign for the fate of the president's supply-side agenda as well as the U.S. dollar.

In the Rose Garden this week, President Bush said Mr. Paulson "has an intimate knowledge of financial markets and an ability to explain economic issues in clear terms." Wall Street would agree. But more importantly, the president said that "As Treasury secretary, Hank will be my principal adviser on the broad range of domestic and international economic issues that affect the well-being of all Americans."

There's a change going on here, probably a big one. Under the new Josh Bolten-run White House, Mr. Paulson is essentially being appointed deputy president for economic policy -- a mandate not given to his two predecessors. This is a bigger shakeup than meets the eye.

Up to this point of the Bush presidency, economic policy has emanated from the West Wing. The spokesmen at Treasury and OMB have been designated as communicators to sell that policy. My hunch is that the Henry Paulson appointment marks a power shift in policy making.

As Mr. Bush noted, Treasury has the play on taxes, financial markets, federal spending, trade and currency policy. So if Mr. Paulson -- the astute and highly successful financial man from New York -- has any new ideas, he will have an opportunity to forcefully present them, even if they represent a new policy direction. Mr. Paulson's formidable background will serve him well in D.C. He won't hear the phrase "You don't know what you're talking about" in the Oval Office, the Senate or the House. He has been an engaged, hands-on, sharp-elbowed Wall Street operator; a man who brought Goldman Sachs and its share price to the loftiest levels in the storied firm's history.

Surprisingly for a CEO, Mr. Paulson has a considerable paper trail of economic and political opinions. He is a confirmed free-trader who has cultivated an expanding economic and business relationship between the U.S. and China. He is also a tax-cutter, one who strongly supported Mr. Bush's broad-based tax cuts of 2001 and the economic-growth-igniting tax incentives of 2003. In the Rose Garden, Mr. Paulson echoed the supply-side message of these tax cuts, just as he has in op-ed pieces on this page and elsewhere: "Put capital behind people and ideas."

Yes, he is a capitalist. And yes, there is a "green" environmental component to the man. He was chairman of the Nature Conservancy, and some critics believe he shouldn't have used Goldman money for certain transactions regarding that venture. But this seems a trifle. Former Goldman insiders say he is no Al Gore.

Perhaps more important, Mr. Paulson has been a staunch supporter of Mr. Bush in the upper reaches of the Goldman executive suite, not easy ground to hold according to several sources. But Mr. Paulson is a religious man of strong character who does not change his principles on the basis of polling data. Ah-ha . . . yet another connection between him and Mr. Bush.

On the policy front, Mr. Paulson could resurrect the tax-reform agenda that fell through the White House cracks last year. If broad-based reform doesn't work politically, he could take the advice of Loews CEO James Tisch and push to equalize the 35% tax rate on corporate capital gains with the 15% charge on individuals.

Mr. Paulson might also zero in on reducing the 35% corporate income tax, move toward full cash expensing for the depreciation of plant and equipment, or work in general to strike down the double tax at home and abroad on the increasingly globalized U.S. business sector. The U.S. has fallen behind other major industrial countries in terms of the level of corporate taxation. All of this would make our firms more competitive in world-wide trade and also help offset some of the unnecessary regulatory costs imposed by Sarbanes-Oxley.

At the beginning of his tenure, however, Mr. Paulson will hopefully look at the falling state of the dollar, a trajectory that has caused great angst in the stock markets and threatens higher inflation and interest rates. Statutorily, Treasury has the play on the dollar through its control of the $43 billion Exchange Stabilization Fund, which can be used to buy and sell currencies in order to send important signals to world-wide forex markets. These interventions have no permanent dollar impact. That's left to the Fed's $760 billion in government securities. The Fed uses these holdings to buy and sell in the open market and thus add or drain cash from the financial system. This is the ultimate driver on dollar value and inflation.

But Mr. Paulson can lend a helping hand to Fed chairman Ben Bernanke. Mr. Paulson could signal that the U.S. wants a harder greenback as part of its inflation-fighting arsenal, while over at the Fed the FOMC could take additional steps to drain reserves and raise its target fed funds rate.

It is worth remembering that predecessor Treasury secretaries hailing from Wall Street have opted for a hard dollar in order to promote the price stability that is so necessary for sustained economic expansion. Robert Rubin (also a Goldman alum) during the Clinton 1990s and Donald Regan (the former Merrill Lynch CEO) during the Reagan 1980s chose dollar strength over weakness in order to support durable economic growth. Mr. Regan has passed away, but Mr. Rubin is alive and well at Citibank. It wouldn't surprise me if Mr. Paulson got on the phone a few times with his old confrere to talk about a hardening of the wartime dollar -- a development that would instill economic and financial confidence and thus serve the nation's bipartisan best interest.

The Bush administration may claim otherwise, but it has exercised a policy of benign dollar neglect which now could be reaching a dangerous tipping point. The solution is a Treasury-Fed hard-dollar operation. As the new deputy president for all things financial, Mr. Paulson has a golden opportunity to do Wall Street and Main Street an enormous favor.

The Greening Of The Treasury? (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

The official flag of the U.S. Treasury has an eagle on a mint-leaf green background. It's an appropriate emblem for Henry Paulson, who is expected to be the greenest Treasury secretary ever.

Mr. Paulson is an environmentalist, not only in his private and charitable life, but as chief executive. Goldman Sachs Group has an eight-page "environmental policy framework" that declares "a healthy environment is necessary for the well being of society, our people and our business, and is the foundation for a sustainable and strong economy," and the firm walks the talk. So will that make a difference at Treasury?

Among those with big titles and ornate Washington offices, there's sometimes a temptation to equate avoiding mistakes with accomplishments. It's easy for a Treasury secretary -- whose utterances can move the dollar or embarrass the president of the United States -- to end a day of briefings, congressional testimony and tête-à-têtes with other impressively titled officials with a sigh that says, "Another good day. I didn't screw up."

Any competent Treasury secretary should be able to devise and communicate the U.S. government's stance on the dollar, swat away politically attractive but economically foolish ideas and prepare for a financial crisis, whatever it may be. That's playing defense. Another test is how well a Treasury secretary plays offense. Why leave a powerful perch on Wall Street for Alexander Hamilton's post if all you do is avoid mistakes and sign dollar bills?

Mr. Paulson is said by colleagues to be less prone to reflection and more prone to action than Robert Rubin, who also went from the top job at Goldman Sachs to Treasury. Mr. Paulson did play on the offensive line on the Dartmouth football team. He seems to think he has wrested from the White House -- and Vice President Dick Cheney -- some of the power to coordinate administration economic policy that was seized from Treasury when President Bush took office.

We probably won't know about Mr. Paulson's offense until after the November congressional elections. But given his record in using Goldman's power and money toward environmental ends, he just might use his clout to push the administration toward dealing with climate change or even -- don't mention it before the elections -- considering an energy tax.

Christie Whitman, administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency early in the Bush years, says just having a sympathetic voice at Treasury can be a big deal. "One of the biggest raps against some environmental proposals is that they're not economically sound," she says. "One of the things that his kind of advocacy can do is put a lie to that."

Fred Krupp, a Paulson fan who heads advocacy group Environmental Defense, says the best-case scenario is that Mr. Paulson "gets the administration to be for a climate and energy policy that uses the power of markets to reduce our emissions of greenhouse gases and improve national security at the same time." Mr. Krupp has in mind expanding the existing "cap and trade" system that limits emissions of sulfur dioxide and allows companies to buy and sell the right to pollute under that limit.

If the Bush administration decides it needs to raise revenue to cut a compromise with Congress that also slows spending growth, Mr. Paulson's role could be key. Paul Portney, former head of think tank Resources for the Future and now dean of the University of Arizona's management school, speculates that Mr. Paulson might be more inclined than former railroad executive John Snow to suggest that Mr. Bush consider taxing the carbon content of fuels or raising the tax on gasoline or auctioning permits for a cap-and-trade system if the alternative were boosting capital-gains or income-tax rates.

Of course, Mr. Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill, also had a greenish tinge. But he accomplished little. "O'Neill taught environmentalists that the Treasury is not the place to push those kind of policies," says Fred Smith, of the Competitive Enterprise Institute, an anti-regulation think tank.

But Mr. Paulson presumably knows of Mr. O'Neill's frustrations, and believes he has negotiated a deal that gives him more say. And times have changed. Mr. Bush recently expressed regret that his position on global warming was defined "early in my presidency when I told the world that I thought Kyoto [the global warming treaty] was a lousy deal for America." He told a questioner in March, "I guess I should have started differently when I first became president and said we will invest in new technologies that will enable us to use fossil fuels in a much wiser way."

Perhaps some day, the conversation between Mr. Paulson and his new client will turn to global warming. "If you had somebody in the Treasury who says there's a way we can put together a solution in a way that makes sense and isn't going to hamstring our economy, people are going to listen," says Ms. Whitman. Maybe even Mr. Bush.

CAPITAL EXCHANGE: Bernanke's Challenges

Here are some of the reader responses to last week's Capital column6 on challenges facing the new Fed chairman.Some of these comments have been edited. Thanks to all who wrote. You can contact me at capital@wsj.com7. * * *

Victor Kincannon writes: I think Mr. Bernanke is far more like Mr. Burns that Mr. Volcker. The Chairman seems far more inclined to look for excuses for not doing than Mr. Volcker. Mr. Volcker was the exception; the rest of them are just the norm. What's your assessment?

David Wessel responds: I think that judgment is extremely premature. Mr. Bernanke has been chairman since the end of January. He has presided over a single meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee at which rates were raised by one-quarter percentage point.

Russell Van Zandt writes: I think one key point in your column was incorrect, which could change the conclusion. The oil shortage ended before and independently of Mr. Volker's bringing interest rates under control. After nearly a decade of shortages, manufacturers moved us into an oil surplus. Oil stocks crashed in 1980 because of it.

So I don't think we can assume that all Mr. Bernanke has to do is raise rates to solve the problem. (First of all, I doubt if someone so dovish would ever have the will to do what it takes.) The Fed would need to bring the country to recession or near it to temporarily stop the commodity bubble. It would very likely come back once the economy revived because the supply problem is still there.

I think we will see that Mr. Burns is exactly right that the oil and commodity futures market are running the economy, not the Fed. Oil is still over $70 a barrel after this selloff and scare -- and will soon move to $80, $90 and $100 a barrel, stopping only when it slows the economy enough that oil profits would be reduced at the higher price. Inflation will feed through and continue increasing, and the Fed will be able to do nothing about it.

Paul DeRosa writes: You might have been a hair too hard on Mr. Burns. There's little doubt he was a flop as a central banker, but the 1974 fiasco wasn't entirely his fault. He was the victim of a massive data revision. I was a staff economist at FRBNY at the time, and I recall the data on the real economy looking surprisingly strong well into spring of 1974. All measures of the money supply, which mattered a lot more then, were headed to the moon. The data as currently measured say the economy already was in recession. Mr. Burns was trying to engineer a softer real side in hopes of restraining the price effects of the higher crude. Given the information he had, he kept tightening. My own guess is had it not been for FDIC insurance, he'd have produced a replay of 1933. As it is, he didn't miss by much. No wonder he was sour on central banking.

David Wessel responds: I wasn't judging Mr. Burns as much as quoting him judging himself.

Dwight D. Overholt writes: It is an unfortunate time for a change of Fed chairman. Mr. Bernanke will need excellent brinkmanship skills to steer through this storm.

The lure of low interest rates and accelerating housing prices fueled extremely strong consumerism in the U.S. This fed improved financial conditions throughout the world (such as India and China).

How many of those same U.S. consumers are now feeling the pain of mortgage interest rates that have risen (via ARM, options mortgages, etc.) to a point where their buying power has been compromised? Further, how many are nearing default? Several good articles in The Wall Street Journal indicate that this portion of the storm is still on the horizon.

The S&L "crisis" of the 1980s shows how normally well intentioned people can choose to ignore the signs of a problem until it becomes unmanageable. Are we entering a similar period? Are banks truly setting aside enough reserves to cover the bad loans? How accurate are their projections? Other articles advise that banks have eased lending terms in the past year to maintain a level of business. Uncertainty in these areas breeds uneasiness of a type that is not healthful for financial markets.

Perhaps not a perfect storm, but high seas are likely until the low interest rate/refinance "exuberance" aftermath works through the market.

Andy Marchus writes: On the subject of the government providing money for research in areas such as alternative energy sources, I'd like your comments on how much the government should get involved as opposed to letting private money flow to where the opportunities are. I'm an extremist on the subject of free markets and have wondered if there are any past examples where government money facilitated a new development where private money alone might not have been sufficient. Let me throw out one possibility: the Internet.

David Wessel responds: Although there are those few who would get the government entirely out of financing research, a very wide swatch of the political spectrum sees a need for government investment in research, development and education. The differences have to do with how much money, where it should go and how much the government should direct its use. The case for a significant government role is very strong -- and the Internet is one very good example. Basic research in medicine and in physics also have paid off handsomely for the society, and there is a strong case that business would have underinvested in such basic research.

Don Schwinn writes: I'm a retired engineer and a novice at understanding interest rate economics. Why not use eighth-point rate increments as the growth rate begins to slow? What is the rationale behind the quarter-point increment?

David Wessel responds: I'm aware of no technical reason that the Fed couldn't, if it chose, move the federal funds rate in eighth-point increments. Indeed, the practice of a publicly announced target for the federal funds rate (at which banks lend to each other overnight) began well into the Greenspan years. At some times in the past, the Fed's approach to monetary policy had the effect of moving the federal funds rate in much less pronounced increments. I'm not sure, though, that the difference to the economy of moving up an eighth or quarter percentage point is all that great; a lot seems to depend on what the markets expect the Fed to do with short-term rates in the future.

Bob Wade writes: Why don't you just predict from your publicly accessible and widely read forum the total collapse of the world economy, thereby helping to start the panic and the accomplishment of the worst possible doom and gloom self-fulfilling prophecy. Of course, your investments will suffer, your paycheck will become worthless, your property values will plunge, and your family will suffer, along with everyone else. Maybe you'll even be laid off as the economy plunges. Keep writing those great columns. Maybe they'll prove to be true, and just think, you will have helped make it happen.

David Wessel responds: I always thought the public -- and the readers of The Wall Street Journal -- counted on us to call it as we see it, and not to shelter them from the truth, however painful.

Reid Acknowledges Misstating Ethics Rules On Free Tickets (LAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid's spokesman acknowledged Wednesday night that Reid misstated the ethics rules governing his acceptance of free boxing tickets and has decided to refrain from taking such gifts.

The Nevada senator still believes it was "entirely permissible" for him to accept ringside seats for three professional boxing matches in 2004 and 2005 from the Nevada Athletic Commission but has decided to avoid doing so in the future, spokesman Jim Manley said.

"In light of questions that have been raised about the practice, Sen. Reid will not accept these kinds of credentials in the future in order to avoid even the faintest appearance of impropriety," Manley said.

The announcement came after the Associated Press presented Reid's office Wednesday with conclusions from ethics experts that the Senate leader misstated congressional ethics rules in trying to defend his actions.

The AP reported Monday that Reid accepted the free seats from the Nevada commission as it was trying to influence his support for legislation to create a federal boxing commission. The state agency feared the legislation would usurp its authority to regulate fights and wanted to convince Reid that there was no need for a federal body.

Reid voted to set up a federal commission, but Congress never enacted the legislation.

Fear Of Failing (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, May 31, 2006

May 31, 2006 - A good therapist, we know, can sometimes help a person who's lost his confidence or mental balance. But what do you do when an entire party needs therapy?

You'd think the Republicans would be the ones in need of professional help. This is a party burdened with a president so unpopular he barely has a base to stand on—Bush seems to be bypassing the lame-duck stage and heading straight for dead duck: a Vietnam-scale quagmire in Iraq and a post-Katrina rot of incompetence and corruption that is infecting the very foundations of the presidency and the GOP's control of Congress. Not surprisingly, the Republicans are at each others' throats over this loss of prestige and popularity. Neoconservatives and traditionalists are fighting bitterly over foreign policy. Moderates and conservatives are battling over immigration and deficits. And when the maverick John McCain declares his candidacy for 2008 sometime in the next year, the Republicans will be shrieking at each other in public over abortion and other social issues.

But at least the GOP is engaged in a war over real policy choices. It is an emotional debate, often a hysterical and ill-informed one, but it is a fight among adults who know what they believe in and who have the guts to battle for it. By contrast the Democrats, ostensibly the party poised to exploit this GOP civil war, don't seem to remember what it is like to behave as adults. They resemble nothing so much as ill-adjusted adolescents, afraid of their own shadows, much less the presidency. What are they afraid of? Themselves, essentially: their past, their own left, the populist rhetoric of their leaders (Nancy Pelosi, Harry Reid, Howard Dean, Al Gore), the left-wing loony stigma represented by "Fahrenheit 9/11" filmmaker Michael Moore (every Dem's favorite bugaboo). Above all they fear seeming and looking soft. They are all afflicted with varying degrees of megalophobia, a fear of assuming power. Even Dr. Melfi of "The Sopranos" wouldn't take this case.

This psychological disability has been long in the making, of course. When it comes to national security, it has been eating at the heart of the Democratic Party since its biggest debacle, Vietnam, which destroyed the Dems' prideful self-image formed during World War II and the cold-war containment consensus. But never has this Democratic dysfunction been so apparent as now, the moment when the Dems should be striding confidently into the limelight to seize control of the national agenda. And none are more pathetically afflicted than those who purport to be the "new" Democrats, the "strong" ones, the ones who want to "resurrect" the gloried intestinal fortitude and moral fiber of FDR, Harry Truman and JFK.

The "strong" ones are actually the most timid. They are the ones who so fear that a leftie like Nancy Pelosi will become speaker of the House, they actually question whether it would be a good idea for the Dems to take control in 2006. They are the ones who think they can outhawk Bush on Iraq and promotion of democracy around the world, but they are mainly driven by a fear of criticizing the premises of his foreign policy, which is to say, his war on terror. While nitpicking and nattering over Bush's "errors of execution," they still embrace his fundamentals. In other words, they all continue to sound like unreconstructed John Kerrys, frightened of seeming soft. When they get together, this fear is virtually all they talk about. It is a fear that reeks from the party's new draft platform for 2006, causing Leslie Gelb, the former president of the Council on Foreign Relations, to crack to liberal hawk Peter Beinert recently: "If you have to say you're tough, you're not."

The champion of this "new" breed of Dem tough guys, of course, is Hillary Clinton, who every week, it seems, finds some new way of pandering to the right in her long, stealth march to the 2008 nomination. All in an apparent effort to escape her own shadow, her supposed liberal excesses from the early '90s.

One reason for the persistence of these Democratic phobias has been the party's abysmal inability, a year and a half after the fact, to reckon with the real reason for Kerry's loss in the 2004 campaign: once again, fear. Kerry's campaign was driven by a fear of his shadow (his antiwar activism after Vietnam), of seeming too strident by attacking, even when he himself was being attacked (first by Karl Rove's "senator flip-flop" campaign, then by the Swift Boat veterans). How else can one explain the inexplicable—the spectacle of a Silver Star winner made to look wimpy by two men who avoided combat? Simple: He was terrified of speaking out. His campaign even toned down the convention speech of that most mild-mannered of presidents, Jimmy Carter.

I hold no brief in this fight, being neither Democrat nor Republican. But here is a message to those few Democrats who retain their self-confidence and sanity (I'm not sure who you are, but there must be some): Come back from the shadows. If you can look past your fears, America's entire national-security apparatus is out there making your case for you.

Talk to any responsible official or officer in the military, intelligence or diplomatic community. Most will tell you that Bush got most of the war on terror wrong (at least after the Taliban fell), that he invented a war of choice in Iraq and failed to finish the war of necessity against Al Qaeda. The toughest hombres in the country—not least some recently retired generals—are saying the "war president" has no clothes, that he has been, in effect, a disastrous war president. This is what I hear every week now as a reporter, from officials who identify themselves as Republican, Democrat or independent. It is what the facts, sadly, bear out: look at where the precipitous war in Iraq has brought us, and the new violence that is arising out of the unfinished business against the Taliban and Al Qaeda in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Yet the vast majority of Democratic leaders cannot bring themselves to say this—Hillary most prominently of all.

Sift through the wreckage of the neoconservative program that Bush adopted. Its central tenets—pre-emptive attacks on rogue regimes, unilateralist disdain for international legitimacy and institutions, the cavalier attitude that war and military solutions should be the primary, or default, approach to foreign problems—are all gone with the wind. What's left? Effectively the foreign policy of pragmatic global leadership invented by such Democrats as FDR, Truman, JFK and Scoop Jackson, and largely endorsed by Republicans such as Dwight Eisenhower, Richard Nixon and, yes, even Ronald Reagan.

To oversimplify, its tenets are: Stand up for democracy and freedom, yes, but keep the international system on your side. Make use of the United Nations whenever you can, though not necessarily bending it to your needs when possible. Create as many allies as you can. Listen. Accommodate. Be magnanimous. Above all, make sure you have more guys on your side than your adversaries have on theirs. It is the policy that Bush, chastened and weakened by Iraq, has followed on Libya and North Korea, and it is the policy he now appears to be pursuing on Iran, having agreed to talk to Tehran. And it is largely Democratic in origins and practice.

But to get to the point where they can hark back to this simple program, and confidently embrace it without protesting too much about how tough they are, Democrats must first have the courage to strip bare the GOP's failures. They must believe they're every bit as good on national security as their rivals. This courage is frankly not in evidence. Five and half years on we see the Republicans, as brazen and full of self-confidence as ever about their national-security credentials, and the Democrats, as timid and full of self-doubt as they ever have been over the same issue. Hence, the need for a good therapist, one with a very large office.

No one looks like a wimp when he or she tells the truth. And the public is crying, pleading for someone to tell the truth. The Democratic hawks seem to think that if they confront Bush over the fundamentals of his foreign policy, they will be forced to admit it was wrong to go into Iraq at the moment and in the way we did. And if they have to admit that, then they must back immediate withdrawal from Iraq. Nonsense. Most Americans now know, without being told, that American prestige is on the line in Iraq. And that any withdrawal will be slow and painful. This is now settled U.S. policy, and it will be followed by whoever the next president is, Democrat or Republican.

The country is desperate for adult leadership, for competence and authority—above all, for an honest reckoning with all that's gone wrong. And the country isn't getting it. Maybe that helps to explain the Al Gore revival under way. Here, at least, was someone who can remember what adulthood was like—what it was like to hold power. Most of his Democratic colleagues appear to have forgotten.

The Seer And The Scandals (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

In its September 2004 issue, Washington Monthly magazine invited 16 smart political observers -- a mix of Republicans, Democrats and independents -- to write short essays predicting what would happen if George Bush won a second term.

The answers, understandably enough, were all over the lot. But no one suggested that one-third of the way through his second term Bush would have suffered the political and policy reverses that he has actually experienced.

Last week was unfortunately typical for an administration that cannot seem to catch a break. The once-compliant House of Representatives, which in 2005 began its defiance with a refusal to bring Bush's signature Social Security plan to a vote, dug in its heels against the top priority on his 2006 agenda, a comprehensive immigration reform bill.

And in the latest example of administrative incompetence, following the Hurricane Katrina fiasco, the Department of Veterans Affairs was unable to explain how the confidential files of as many as 26 million veterans were stolen from the home of a department employee -- or why the loss went unreported for weeks.

Even as Bush and his most loyal international partner, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, met to celebrate the (partial) formation of a permanent government in Iraq, a wave of violence swept across Baghdad, taking the lives of two members of a CBS News television crew, among others. And details began leaking out about an alleged massacre last November of Iraqi civilians by U.S. Marines who were said to be retaliating for the death of one of their buddies in one of the countless roadside bombings.

As if to mock further the complications of superpower life, a traffic accident in Kabul, Afghanistan, was all that was needed to trigger an outburst of anti-American violence in a country we had "liberated" but now cannot find a way to leave.

This second-term swamp is a far cry from what most of the Washington Monthly experts predicted -- and from what I would have guessed had I indulged in a crystal-ball exercise. Grover Norquist, the conservative activist, said Bush and the Republicans would send the Democrats into permanent political exile. Paul Begala, a Democratic political consultant, said Bush would exact vengeance on his political enemies. Several people predicted that he would usher in a new era of good feelings, tackling global warming and avoiding divisive social issues. Wrong, wrong, wrong.

The one commentator who got it exactly right was Kevin Drum, who runs the magazine's blog. "What do we have to look forward to if George W. Bush is elected to a second term?" he asked. "One word: scandal."

History backed that forecast. Almost every reelected president in modern times has been victimized by scandal, from Eisenhower's losing his chief of staff, who resigned over the gift of a vicuña coat, to Clinton's facing impeachment.

But Drum found additional reasons that led him to conclude that Bush and the Republicans might be particularly susceptible. For one thing, he said, "both Bush and the current Republican Party leadership have already demonstrated a ruthlessness and disregard for traditional political norms." He cited the lengthy roll calls in the House of Representatives during which arms were twisted to produce favorable votes; the redistricting in Texas to gain five Republican House seats; and the hard-line secrecy imposed by the White House on executive decisions.

Second, he said, the culture of lax supervision of executive agencies by the Republican Congress encouraged misbehavior on Capitol Hill -- and made it likely the malfeasance would reach aromatic heights before it was finally detected. Look at the time it took for the Jack Abramoff-Tom DeLay network to be exposed, the number of times the House ethics committee flinched from fully exposing it -- and you see how right Drum was.

And, finally, he said, the lack of major policy initiatives would leave a vacuum in the news that would make scandal look like the most prominent feature of the political landscape. The near-impasse in Iraq, the painfully long and ultimately unproductive debates about Social Security and immigration, the impasse on energy and health care, and the unwillingness to come to grips with budget deficits -- all this background noise makes the stories of Duke Cunningham's Rolls-Royce and William Jefferson's freezer full of marked bills that much more vivid.

Drum concluded his essay by saying that 2006 would be likely to provide "the perfect breeding ground for a major scandal, and George Bush is exactly the right guy, with exactly the right personality, to step right into it."

So far, the scandal has not involved the president personally, but the stench of corruption is all around the city -- too close for comfort.

VERBATIM (WP)

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

White House press secretary Tony Snow responded to a question Tuesday by Helen Thomas, a Hearst Newspapers columnist, about published remarks made by new domestic policy adviser Karl Zinsmeister :

THOMAS: Why did the president pick a man who is so contemptible of the public servants in Washington to be his domestic adviser -- saying, "People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings"? Why would he pick such a man to be a domestic adviser?

SNOW: You meant contemptuous, as opposed to contemptible, I think.

THOMAS: Pure contempt.

SNOW: Well, I'm not sure it's pure contempt. I know Karl Zinsmeister pretty well, and he is somebody who expresses himself with a certain amount of piquancy -- you're perhaps familiar with that, aren't you, Helen? And so, as a consequence, from time to time he's going to say -- he'll have some sharp elbows.

THOMAS: If this is his attitude toward public servants --

SNOW: No, I don't think it's his attitude toward public servants -- it may have been toward the press. Just kidding. No, I -- look, if you look at the bulk of what Karl Zinsmeister has done at the American Enterprise [Institute] and elsewhere, I think you're going to find somebody who's done some pretty meaty and interesting research on a variety of topics. The reason he's being brought in is that he's --

THOMAS: Do you agree with his assessment of Washington?

SNOW: I'm not -- there's one sentence the guy wrote, and perhaps you may recall -- yes?

THOMAS: Arrogant, morally repugnant, cheating, shifty -- come on.

SNOW: That's a lot in one sentence, isn't it? He just packed it right in.

Hijacking Harry Truman (WP)

By Peter Beinart

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

No matter how polarized Washington becomes, there is still one Democrat Republicans love: Harry Truman. Last December, on this page, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice declared the Bush administration's democracy promotion efforts "consistent with the proud tradition of American foreign policy, especially such recent presidents as Harry Truman." Last weekend President Bush devoted his West Point commencement address to an extended analogy between himself and the 33rd president, invoking Truman no fewer than 17 times. Conservative commentators are fond of the analogy, too. Indeed, it is a virtual article of faith on the contemporary right that today's conservatives -- not today's liberals -- are the true heirs of the anti-totalitarian tradition with which we associate Truman's name.

The truth is rather different. Bush and Rice are correct that Truman saw tyranny as a threat to world peace and believed in resisting it, by means that included force. At West Point, Bush quoted Truman's famous declaration in his March 1947 speech proposing military aid to the besieged governments of Greece and Turkey: "It must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures."

But there are other Truman classics that Bush conveniently overlooked. For instance: "We all have to recognize, no matter how great our strength, that we must deny ourselves the license to do always as we please." Truman did not believe merely in promoting democracy and peace; he believed that doing so required powerful international institutions, which could invest American power with the credibility that the Soviets lacked.

In the years immediately after World War II, the United States encased itself in a web of such bodies -- from the United Nations and NATO to the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (now the World Trade Organization). And Truman was frank in recognizing that such institutions gave weaker countries an influence over American actions. As the historian John Lewis Gaddis has written, "It was not that the Americans lacked the capacity to force their allies into line . . . [but] what is surprising is how rarely this happened; how much effort the United States put into persuading -- quite often deferring to -- its NATO partners."

Bush, by contrast, more than any president in recent history, has sought to liberate the United States from international treaties and institutions -- from the Kyoto global warming treaty to the International Criminal Court to the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. To be sure, even Bill Clinton sometimes had trouble getting international agreements through Congress. But in the Bush administration, opposing infringements on U.S. sovereignty has become a cardinal foreign policy principle. In Bush's view, American power legitimizes itself -- we don't need to listen to other countries, because sooner or later they will realize that we were right and they were wrong. Had Bush been around in the late 1940s, he might well have accused Truman of seeking a "permission slip" before defending the United States. Indeed, some conservatives said almost exactly that at the time. It is they -- not Truman -- who are Bush's true ideological forefathers.

Truman also believed that spreading democracy required combating economic despair. He allocated between 2.5 and 5 percent of U.S. national income over four years to the Marshall Plan, in the belief that unless Europe's fragile postwar democracies improved their people's lives, they were likely to fail. Then, in his 1949 State of the Union address, he went further and proposed a Marshall Plan for the Third World. In fact, while Truman increased military spending, he and his advisers repeatedly described economic development as more important to the anti-communist cause. In 1947 his defense secretary, James Forrestal, noted that "at the present time we are keeping our military expenditures below the levels which our military leaders must in good conscience estimate as the minimum which would in themselves ensure national security. By so doing we are able to increase our expenditures to assist in the European recovery." Try to imagine Donald Rumsfeld saying that.

Indeed, while the Bush administration has boosted foreign aid over its appallingly low pre-Sept. 11, 2001, levels, such increases have been trivial compared with the massive new allotments for defense. And one of the primary reasons for mounting anti-American sentiment in Afghanistan is America's failure to fulfill our promises to help rebuild that country after we toppled the Taliban. As The Post's Barton Gellman and Dafna Linzer reported in October 2004, "The president and his most influential advisers, many officials said, do not see those [economic] factors -- or U.S. policy overseas -- as primary contributors to the terrorism threat."

Again, there is a Cold War precedent for this view. But it lies in the arguments of conservatives such as Barry Goldwater, who ridiculed claims that Third World poverty aided communism's appeal. Harry Truman, by contrast, believed in fighting totalitarianism fiercely, but with more than just guns, and through international institutions that made U.S. power legitimate in the world. George W. Bush should remember that the next time he takes Truman's name in vain.

A Beautiful Sunset (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

Ronald Reagan used to quip that the closest thing to immortality in this life is a government program. We'd add one modern caveat, which is that under Beltway budget rules tax cuts automatically expire after five or 10 years, but spending programs and tax increases live forever.

The latter would change, however, if a group of House Republicans led by Texan Jeb Henserling and Mike Pence of Indiana succeed in pushing new rules to sunset out-of-date federal programs. Under their proposal that has been promised a vote this summer, Congress would have to reauthorize agency budgets every five years, or they would die. The legislation would also create a sunset commission to recommend program terminations, and Congress would vote up or down on the package. This procedure is modeled after the successful military base closing commissions.

Their new budget scrutiny would mean some taboo questions would suddenly get asked in Washington. To wit:

· Should the U.S. spend $300 million a year on bilingual education, when research shows that foreign language classes stunt English learning by immigrant children?

· Do we really need 15 different agencies to fund job training?

· Why give Amtrak nearly $1 billion a year in taxpayer handouts, when its financial performance deteriorates every year and as its share of the transportation market declines?

· Should farmers with incomes of more than $1 million a year be eligible for taxpayer subsidies?

In the private sector, worker productivity growth in 2005 hit its highest level in 50 years. What a contrast with government, where agency performance audits by the U.S. Government Accountability Office (GAO) have found enormous waste and financial mismanagement in every operation from the Pentagon to Medicare. (Here's just one outrage GAO uncovered: One in six foodstamp dollars goes to an ineligible recipient.) The private sector operates under Joseph Schumpeter's concept of "creative destruction." Mr. Henserling quips that in Congress "we get a lot of creation, but never destruction."

DOJ_NMG_0031071

In Washington, "fiscal discipline" has become a code phrase for raising taxes, never for rolling back the $2.7 trillion annual federal budget. Yet a new analysis by Brian Riedl of the Heritage Foundation indicates that balancing the federal budget is possible within a few years with even modest spending restraint. Thanks to the surge in federal tax revenues in the past 18 months, if Congress were simply to hold federal spending to the rate of inflation over the next six years, the budget would be balanced without a penny of new taxes. Meanwhile, sunsetting useless agencies would mean that high priority services could be fully funded.

It will be instructive to see how many Democrats and Northeastern Republicans -- who like to pose as deficit hawks -- favor deficit reduction if that means sunsetting programs that have outlived their usefulness. Our guess is the number will be very close to zero -- which is the main reason Congress will spend $300 billion more than it raises in taxes this year.

Fed Minutes Show Concern About Inflation (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Facing both higher-than-expected inflation and the possibility of slower growth, Federal Reserve officials at a May 10 meeting were unsure how many more interest-rate increases, if any, will be needed, according to minutes released Wednesday.

Underscoring the uncertainty, the central bank's Federal Open Market Committee debated a series of options at the meeting, from standing pat to raising the target for short-term rates by half a percentage point. The Fed ultimately voted unanimously to boost its target by a quarter-point to 5%. That was the 16th such increase since mid-2004, when rates stood at a low 1%.

“Given the risks to growth and inflation, Committee members were uncertain about how much, if any, further tightening would be needed after today's action,” the minutes said.

Fed officials noted several times that core inflation — which excludes food and energy prices — had been stronger than expected. Core inflation has been running slightly higher than 2% in recent months, above the Fed's 1%-2% preferred range.

Adding to inflation concerns were surging energy and commodity prices; a falling dollar, which makes imports more expensive; and rising inflation expectations.

But Fed officials also saw potential for slower growth, including less-robust consumer spending and a cooling housing market. With “modest further policy action,” including the May 10 rate increase, the economy should moderate gradually with core inflation remaining near recent levels, the minutes said.

Several economists called the minutes more hawkish than anticipated, especially after Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke in late April suggested the central bank might have to pause its rate campaign at some point to get a better reading on economic conditions.

“I don't know how you go from mentioning a pause and now a couple weeks later mention a (half-percentage point) move and not expect the market to be confused,” says Rich Yamarone of Argus Research.

Mickey Levy, chief economist at Bank of America, says he expects the Fed to raise rates by a quarter-point at its June 28-29 meeting, ultimately pushing rates to 5.75% by the end of the year.

The minutes also show Bernanke appointed a panel to examine better ways to communicate policy, led by Fed Governor Donald Kohn. Financial markets have been jumpy recently, partly because of uncertainty as the central bank reaches a turning point in policy.

New York Fed President Timothy Geithner in a Wednesday speech cited a number of reasons, from economic developments to data limitations, for uncertainty in central bank policy, adding that a central bank “cannot provide more assurance about the likely future course of policy than it actually has.”

Geithner also said the situation in the past two years, where the Fed was able to easily telegraph policy to the markets, was the exception, not the norm.

Fed Kept Options Open On Rates (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

Federal Reserve officials were so concerned at their last meeting about rising inflation that they considered raising interest rates more aggressively than they had in six years.

DOJ_NMG_0031072

The U.S. economy has grown briskly this year, despite signs of cooling in the housing market. Payrolls and wages have risen. Energy and other raw-materials prices have climbed. The dollar has weakened. And consumers say they expect prices to keep rising faster.

"In view of the risk that the outlook for inflation could worsen," Fed policymakers agreed to lift their benchmark short-term interest rate to 5 percent from 4.75 percent at their May 10 meeting, for the 16th consecutive quarter-percentage-point increase in nearly two years, according to minutes of the session released yesterday.

But Fed officials also considered whether to bump the rate up by a half percentage point, to 5.25 percent, or to leave it unchanged, the minutes said in an unusually explicit description of the options considered. A half-percentage-point increase would have been the biggest since the Fed ended its last period of credit tightening with a similar-size increase in May 2000.

Members of the Federal Open Market Committee, the central bank's top policymaking group, "were uncertain about how much, if any, further tightening would be needed" after the May 10 increase, the minutes of the meeting showed . The group issued a statement that day leaving the door open to more increases in the future.

The Fed's uncertainty, compounded by reports of higher inflation, has roiled financial markets in recent weeks. The Dow Jones industrial average hit a six-year high May 10 and has been choppy since. Major international stock indicators have also fallen, reflecting anxiety over how high global interest rates may rise and how much economic growth may slow. Hedge funds and other big investors have pulled back from riskier global investments, fund managers said.

The Dow and other major U.S. stock indicators fell sharply yesterday after the Fed minutes were released at 2 p.m., as their hawkish tone led many traders and analysts to conclude that more Fed increases were likely. Stocks rallied to close the day with small gains, as many investors applauded the Fed's concern about inflation.

"This is good for stocks for them to sound more hawkish," said James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist for Wells Capital Management, who attributed much of the markets' recent jumpiness to inflation worries.

Global markets will remain volatile and the big traders will probably retreat further from risky investment strategies as long as the outlook remains clouded for inflation, interest rates and economic growth, analysts and fund managers predicted.

"You've got a Fed that's not sure what they're going to do," said Larry Kantor, managing director of Barclays Capital Inc. The minutes, he said, are "not going to calm anyone down or reduce market volatility."

The minutes' implication that interest rates are likely to keep rising contrasted with recent comments by Fed officials, including Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, said Richard Yamarone, director of research at Argus Research Corp. "This is another in a series of confusing messages from the Bernanke Fed."

Bernanke told Congress in late April that he and his colleagues might pause after 15 consecutive interest rate increases. Such a pause would be based on the Fed's forecast that the economy will slow this year as higher interest rates cause the housing market to cool, prompting consumers to ease up on spending and tamping down inflation pressures. Some Fed officials have worried about raising interest rates too high, or "overshooting," and triggering a sharper economic downturn.

The economy grew at a rapid 5.3 percent annual rate in the first three months of the year, and many analysts forecast it to slow to a pace closer to 3 percent for the rest of the year. Several Fed officials believe an annual growth rate of 3 to 3.5 percent would be "sustainable" over the long term without fanning inflation.

Fed policymakers noted at the May meeting that the housing market had lost steam. Sales have fallen from their peaks last year, inventories of unsold homes are rising, and price appreciation is slowing. The Mortgage Bankers Association reported yesterday that mortgage applications fell last week to a level 22.4 percent lower than the corresponding week last year.

But FOMC members also noted that their desired slowdown had not arrived. Instead, exports were rising. Business spending on plants and equipment was robust.

The economy "had been growing quite strongly, and whether economic growth would moderate to a sustainable pace was not yet clear," said the minutes, which summarize the discussion without identifying participants by name.

Moreover, the officials agreed "inflation pressures appeared to be somewhat greater than the committee had anticipated" at its previous meeting in March. Fed officials "expressed some concern about recent price developments."

And if the Fed officials worried about overshooting at the May meeting, there was no mention of such concerns in the minutes -- in contrast to the previous meeting.

"Not one inflation gauge is trending [down] in a way that would support a pause," said Yamarone, who predicted that the Fed will raise its benchmark rate to at least 5.5 percent this summer. "They're all trending higher, and that has to be addressed by the Fed."

Fed Grows Uncertain Over Rates As Inflation Concerns Multiply (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031073

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials discussed leaving interest rates unchanged in May or raising them half a percentage point before settling on a quarter-point boost, evidence of their growing uncertainty over what rate action to take, the minutes from their deliberations show.

The minutes from the May 10 meeting of the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee, released Wednesday after the usual three-week lag, also show officials increasingly concerned about inflation and inflation expectations.

They also disclosed that Chairman Ben Bernanke had appointed a subcommittee on communications to be led by governor Donald Kohn and including Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis President Gary Stern, and San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen.

Officials discussed actions ranging from leaving rates "unchanged at this meeting to increasing the federal-funds rate 50 basis points," but all agreed a 25-basis-point move "was appropriate today to keep inflation from rising and promote sustainable economic expansion," the minutes said. (There are 100 basis points in a percentage point.)

The committee's vote to push the Fed's short-term interest-rate target up a quarter point -- to 5% -- was the 16th consecutive meeting with such an increase and was widely anticipated in markets. Nonetheless, it was the first time since the Fed began to raise rates in June 2004 that, according to minutes, anything other than a quarter-point increase was discussed, other than soon after Hurricane Katrina last summer, when one member preferred no rate increase. Future meetings also are likely to feature divergent opinions and, perhaps, dissenting votes on the rate action. That would reflect the different weights officials put on their concerns about rising inflation and slowing economic growth.

Officials "were uncertain about how much, if any, further tightening would be needed." Excluding food and energy prices, "consumer inflation had lately been a little higher than expected," and fresh increases in energy prices might be "reflected to a greater degree" in other costs "in coming months," the minutes said. In addition, consumer surveys and the behavior of inflation-indexed Treasury bonds suggested the public also was expecting higher inflation.

Indeed, officials debated whether they could continue to call such expectations "contained" in their postmeeting statement. They ultimately did, judging that the "pickup in longer-term expectations, while worrisome, was relatively small."

On the other hand, officials saw "downside risks to economic activity," in particular a bigger-than-expected slowing in housing as long-term rates rose. They predicted "growth in activity would moderate" and "core inflation would stay close" to recent levels.

Data released since the May 10 meeting show inflation has remained worrisome, but housing construction and consumer spending have softened, suggesting the economy is slowing as Fed officials expected. Nonetheless, after release of the minutes Wednesday, futures markets boosted the probability to 72% from 58% that the Fed will raise its short-term rate target to 5.25% on June 29.

The minutes shed little light on what Mr. Kohn's subcommittee on communications will tackle. Mr. Bernanke is known to favor releasing more information on the Fed's goals and decision-making, such as a numerical inflation objective, more frequent forecasts and possibly longer, less-formulaic statements. Similar committees in the past have overhauled the structure of the Fed's statements from time to time, but no formula has yet reconciled the Fed's conflicting goals of transparency and simplicity.

John Engler (CSM)

By David T. Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

Manufacturing is not glamorous.

When I mentioned at a family gathering that the Monitor was hosting a breakfast for the head of the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM), the response was: why?

But while it lacks the sizzle of the software, music, or movie industries, the manufacturing sector remains a major economic force in the US. According to a recent speech by NAM president John Engler, manufacturing generates about $1.4 trillion, or 12 percent of our gross domestic product. Manufacturers fund nearly two-thirds of US research and development, account for three-fourths of our nation's exports, and despite recent employment woes, still provide more than 20 million high-paying jobs.

So it is worth listening to Mr. Engler on the challenges facing a key force in the economy.

Before moving to Washington to head the NAM, Mr. Engler was the governor of Michigan for three terms. He was something of a political child prodigy, elected at age 23 to the Michigan State House of Representatives. Here are excerpts from his remarks at Wednesday's breakfast: On the outlook for the US manufacturing sector:

"We are still the possessors of a substantial manufacturing sector. The demise of the manufacturing economy, the obituaries for that are a bit premature. 2005 was a record [year for] output in US manufacturing history, accomplished with fewer people, reflecting the incredible productivity that has been driving manufacturing.... It is a growth rate that makes us the envy of virtually all of old Europe. [The outlook is for] more modest growth this year than last, but still positive, with threats as a result of external factors [that are] hard for individual manufacturers to control." On Treasury Secretary designate Henry Paulson's opportunities:

"I think one of the things that is interesting about Secretary Paulson, which could be a huge advantage for him, [is that] he probably has been to China ... more than 70 times. He may have been to China more than ... the entire US Senate. So there is going to be an ability on his part hopefully ... to craft a China policy and a China relationship that can be more of a win-win. We obviously share the opinion of groups like the International Monetary Fund that there is an imbalance in terms of the under-valuation of the Chinese currency. We also worry a lot about the fact that there are significant subsidies allowed Chinese enterprises that are not enjoyed by US companies and that makes it hard to compete." On the lack of a US energy policy:

"It is pretty central to economic policy. I think America lacks an energy strategy and from a manufacturing perspective, where we use a third of the electricity generated in America, it is simply unacceptable and represents a threat to a strong manufacturing economy in America." On the outlook for the US automobile industry:

"It is to the point now where they simply, fundamentally, have got to be fixed. And that means they are going to get smaller in order to get better." On Congressional inaction on key national problems:

"I think there has probably never been less connection between the money people donate and the results they get than there is today, regardless of party. I think to the extent there is frustration, it is the seeming inability of Congress to find any time when it is able to do something that is in the interests of the country ... regardless of whether someone benefits more than somebody else or he or she wins.... Today the motivation so often seems to be that, 'I can't do this because if we did it and it worked, X would get credit for it. And I would rather have nothing happen than to have X get credit.' In that environment, how do you ever do anything? We are taking on, in a very tough global environment, countries that are focused on doing everything they can and whatever it takes to sort of capture investment and growth."

Stocks Enter June On Solid Gains (WSJ)

By Karen Talley

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

As stocks ended the month with a solid gain, shares of NRG Energy, ADC Telecommunications and ATI Technologies moved on deals, both in the works and contemplated.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 73.88 points, or 0.67%, to 11168.31, after losing 184.18 on Tuesday. For May, the Dow industrials lost 1.7%, the biggest monthly decline since June 2005 and first monthly drop so far this year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 14.14, or 0.65%, to 2178.88. For the month, the Nasdaq fell 6.2%. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 10.25, or 0.81%, to 1270.09. For the month, the S&P 500 declined 3.1%.

Stocks started out well as the price of oil fell and ended up building on those gains in a bit of a delayed reaction to the midafternoon release of minutes from the Federal Reserve's most recent meeting. "The minutes contained something for everyone," said Phil Dow, director of equity strategy at RBC Dain Rauscher. "Looking at them you could make an equally strong case for either a pause or a hike."

NRG Energy leapt $6.74, or 16%, to $49.75, the biggest percentage rise on the Big Board. Mirant said it made an unsolicited offer last month to acquire the fellow power generator for $7.85 billion, but in a rejection letter sent May 23, NRG called the cash-and-stock offer "the wrong deal at the wrong time." Mirant shed 37 cents, or 1.5%, to 24.88.

ADC plunged 4.46, or 20%, to 17.92 and Andrew added 34 cents, or 3.5%, to 10.12, both on Nasdaq. ADC agreed to acquire the Westchester, Ill., concern, merging ADC's wireline business with Andrew's wireless-infrastructure assets into a company with combined revenue of $3.3 billion.

ATI (Nasdaq) jumped 1.36, or 9%, to 16.51. RBC Capital Markets said Advanced Micro Devices could soon announce a strategic "tie-up" between AMD and the graphics chip maker or an outright acquisition of ATI. Advanced Micro rose 41 cents, or 1.4%, to 30.89.

Expedia (Nasdaq) advanced 36 cents, or 2.6%, to 14.21. Credit Suisse said near-term downside is limited for the online travel agency, and so it upgraded its rating on the stock to "neutral" from "underperform."

Nasdaq-traded Altera rose 55 cents, or 2.9%, to 19.56. The maker of chips used in products such as Internet routers and flat-panel televisions said it still sees second-quarter sales growing 7%-10 % sequentially.

Costco Wholesale (Nasdaq) lost 63 cents, or 1.2%, to 52.93. The warehouse-club retailer said its fiscal third-quarter profit rose 12% on a solid sales increase, but the results fell slightly short of Wall Street's expectations amid a higher tax rate and thin margins on gasoline sales.

Medicare Drug-Cap Savings May Be Offset By Hospital Visits (WSJ)

By John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

Capping Medicare drug benefits results in more patient visits to emergency rooms and hospitals, offsetting savings from lower spending on prescription medications, researchers say.

The study, published Thursday in the New England Journal of Medicine, gives ammunition to critics of the new Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit, which includes payment restrictions.

Researchers at health-maintenance organization Kaiser Permanente in Oakland, Calif.; the University of California, San Francisco; and Harvard University examined the cost and clinical outcomes of 199,179 Kaiser beneficiaries in Northern California who were enrolled in a program called Medicare+ Choice in 2003.

Under that program, annual drug benefits were capped at $1,000. The study compared 157,275 Kaiser beneficiaries with caps to 41,904 who had unlimited benefits because of supplemental coverage from their employers.

The study, which received funding from federal agencies and the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation, found that a cap on drug benefits lowered pharmacy costs by 31%. But total medical costs, including drugs, were roughly the same.

Researchers said that was largely because patients with drug caps had a 9% higher rate of emergency-room visits, a 13% higher rate of nonelective hospitalizations and a 22% higher death rate.

The study found subscribers with capped drug costs were less likely to take drugs to lower blood pressure and cholesterol and to control diabetes -- chronic conditions for which medication can offer cost-effective drugs to prevent costly health problems later.

For example, the study found, 14.6% of those enrolled in plans without caps failed to take their blood-pressure medication as prescribed by their doctor, while 18.1% neglected to do so in plans with restrictions.

Researchers noted that the cap in the older Medicare plan differs from the terms of Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit. The benefit took effect Jan. 1, and more than 37 million senior citizens enrolled in the plan by the initial May deadline. Under the standard Part D plan, those who enroll pay a $250 deductible, after which they pay 25% of the next $2,000 in costs, or $500. Then, in what critics have called the "doughnut hole," seniors must pay 100% of drug costs for the next $2,850. After hitting $3,600 out of pocket, they pay 5% of drug costs above that level. Various private plans can offer richer coverage with different terms for monthly premiums that now range from less than $2 to about $40.

Kenneth E. Thorpe, a professor of health policy at Emory University, who wrote an editorial about the study in the journal, said the research shows cost saving through coverage caps is especially wrongheaded for treating chronic diseases. In terms of Medicare Part D, "we may very well be penny-wise and pound-foolish here," he said in an interview.

But Peter Ashkenaz, a Medicare spokesman, said Part D doesn't completely cut off coverage after $1,000 and is a vast improvement for most seniors, who previously had "no coverage whatsoever" for prescription drugs under the standard Medicare plan.

Low Payments By U.S. Raise Medical Bills Billions A Year (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Employers and consumers are paying billions of dollars more a year for medical care to compensate for imbalances in the nation's health care system resulting from tight Medicare and Medicaid budgets, according to Blue Cross officials and independent actuaries.

A new study commissioned by Premera Blue Cross, based in Seattle, has found a rapid acceleration in higher costs to private payers in Washington State, for example, as hospitals and doctors grapple with constraints in the federal health insurance programs.

The study found that in 2004, the most recent year for which full data are available, hospitals in Washington State charged an additional $738 million — or 14.3 percent of their revenue — to private payers to make up for Medicare and Medicaid underpayments. Similarly, doctors shifted $620 million, or 12 percent, said John Pickering, an actuary at Milliman Inc., a consulting and actuarial firm that conducted the study.

A similar Milliman study in California for 2004 said that health plans and consumers paid an additional $4.5 billion for hospital care in that state to compensate for Medicaid and Medicare constraints. Milliman's California study, commissioned by Blue Shield of California, did not include physicians' charges.

Will Fox, a Milliman actuary, said California hospitals had been hit particularly hard by Medicare payment policies in the last few years, "and there is no reason to think this has let up."

Other research has come to similar conclusions across the country. Unpaid hospital bills, largely for the uninsured, are costing about $45 billion nationally a year and adding about 8.5 percent to the cost of health insurance for those who do pay, said Kenneth E. Thorpe, a health care economist at Emory University.

Employers said the rising cost trends were, in turn, adding to the growing numbers of people without insurance. And when those people check into hospitals, they generate even higher costs for those employers and consumers who pay insurance premiums.

"This is a serious national problem, and it is only going to get much worse," said Helen Darling, president of the National Business Group on Health, a research and trade group for large employers. "There are more uninsured, the hospitals are inefficient, and every year, Medicare and Medicaid hold down on increases to cover rising medical costs," she said.

Rich Maturi, a senior vice president of Premera, said the report would show "employers and policy makers that they needed to address an unsustainable trend in the growth of cost-shifting." Business leaders, health plans and groups representing hospitals and doctors plan to meet in July to review the report and make policy recommendations.

Although many state budgets are overwhelmed by rising Medicaid costs, health care reforms intended to reduce the ranks of the uninsured that were recently enacted in Massachusetts and Vermont include more state money for Medicaid. Blue Cross Blue Shield of Massachusetts and Partners Healthcare, the largest hospital group in Boston, jointly supported the Medicaid increases.

"That was a real-world example of hospitals and insurers seeing that the had common interests," said Paul Ginsberg, a health economist who is president of the Center for Studying Health Systems Change, a nonprofit research group in Washington.

Hospitals across the country lost money on Medicare patients in 2003 after at least six years of declining profit margins, according to the latest report by the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission, which advises Congress and federal officials.

Glass Artists Face Off In Court (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

SEATTLE, May 31 — As an ever-moving maestro in the world where fine art and commerce converge, Dale Chihuly is perhaps the world's most successful glass artist.

His clients include Bill Gates and Bill Clinton, and his elaborate installations of sea gardens and flower clusters show that mere sand transformed by fire can elevate a casino ceiling to the level of gallery spectacle.

DOJ_NMG_0031077

But now Mr. Chihuly is in the midst of a hard-edged legal fight in federal court here over the distinctiveness of his creations and, more fundamentally, who owns artistic expression in the glass art world.

Mr. Chihuly has sued two glass blowers, including a longtime collaborator, for copyright infringement, accusing them of imitating his signature lopsided creations, and other designs inspired by the sea.

"About 99 percent of the ocean would be wide open," Mr. Chihuly said in an interview. "Look, all I'm trying to do is to prevent somebody from copying me directly."

The glass blowers say that Mr. Chihuly is trying to control entire forms, shapes and colors and that his brand does not extend to ancient and evolving techniques derived from the natural world.

"Just because he was inspired by the sea does not mean that no one else can use the sea to make glass art," said Bryan Rubino, the former acolyte named in the suit who worked for Mr. Chihuly as a contractor or employee for 14 years. "If anything, Mother Nature should be suing Dale Chihuly."

The suit, rare in art circles, offers a sometimes unflattering glimpse at how high-powered commercial artists like Mr. Chihuly work. The two glass blowers say that he has very little to do with much of the art, and that he sometimes buys objects and puts the Chihuly name on them, a contention that Mr. Chihuly strongly denies.

He acknowledges that he has not blown glass for 27 years, dating from a surfing accident that cost him the full range of shoulder motion, an injury that struck three years after he had lost sight in his left eye in a traffic accident.

Still, Mr. Chihuly said, he works with sketches, faxes and through exhortation. Nothing with his name on it ever came from anyone but himself, he said.

Andrew Page, editor of Glass: The Urban Glass Art Quarterly, which is published in New York, said that Mr. Chihuly deserved a high place in the pantheon of glass artists, but that the suit could hurt his reputation by igniting countercharges and opening a window into how a celebrity artist works on a mass scale.

"I think Dale Chihuly is a pure original," Mr. Page said. "He has a tremendous sense of color and composition. And he has done a tremendous amount for the field. But this lawsuit may have been the worst thing he could have done."

A butcher's son from hardscrabble Tacoma, Mr. Chihuly, 64, operates out of a cavernous boathouse on Lake Union with a split-tree table inside that seats 200 and a lap pool with a riotous sprouting of glass objects beneath a clear floor.

The artist has 93 employees, part of a veritable fine art factory called Chihuly Inc. When celebrities like Robin Williams or Colin L. Powell visit Seattle, the boathouse is often the sole stop they want to make.

Mr. Chihuly said he had no choice but to use the courts to try to eliminate "knockoffs" by people trying to profit from his empire.

"This lawsuit is not about money," he said, puttering around the boathouse in paint-splattered shoes with a lawyer and publicity agent in tow. "It's about what is fair. There are a million forms you can make that don't look like mine."

In a 2003 copyright case involving glass art, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco, ruled against an artist who said another artist had used his design of jellyfish encased in glass. The two designs looked similar, but the court said no one could copyright nature.

"These ideas, first expressed by nature, are the common heritage of humankind, and no artist may use copyright laws to prevent others from depicting them," the court said. But the judges added that any artist might "protect the original expression he or she contributes to these ideas."

Mr. Chihuly said it was his original expression in deliberately off-centered bowls, baskets and vases, as well as sea forms and flowers that made his designs unique. His elaborate installations, often filmed and sold as DVD's, include "Chihuly Over Venice," a 40,000-pound ceiling installed in the lobby of the Bellagio casino hotel in Las Vegas, and a 48-foot-tall design at the Tower of David Museum in Jerusalem.

Karrin Klotz, a copyright lawyer and lecturer at the University of Washington School of Business, said there was precedent for Mr. Chihuly's claim, that Picasso was able to copyright a mere few lines on a pad because they were so distinct.

"I think his works are distinctive enough to be protected," Ms. Klotz said of Mr. Chihuly. "He is depicting things like flowers and sea forms that may be derived from nature, but the way he shapes them can be protected."

In court filings and at preliminary hearings where boxes of Mr. Chihuly's delicate multidimensional glass objects were presented as exhibits next to the work of Mr. Rubino, and the other artist named in the suit, Robert Kaindl, the similarities in the works are striking.

The case may turn on factors like whether a "lip wrap," a colored trim line around the edge of a design, or a certain ripple is the exclusive domain of Chihuly Inc.

Lip wraps and ripples, the glass blowers say in their counterclaim, "have been around for centuries" and are standard design elements.

DOJ_NMG_0031078

Lawyers for Mr. Chihuly agreed that glass art was 5,000 years old, but said he created his own look and revolutionized the glass art world.

"Mr. Chihuly made an abrupt departure from the notion of centered works, making instead glass sculptures that appear to be collapsing, frozen in time," the lawyers wrote in a complaint in the fall.

One question unanswered by the suit is why Mr. Rubino and Mr. Chihuly would turn on each other so bitterly. By all accounts, they worked closely for nearly 20 years on Mr. Chihuly's biggest projects, a relationship not unlike partnerships through the ages between masters and the craftsmen who carry out their work.

In court filings, lawyers for the glass artists wrote that Mr. Chihuly would "often ask Mr. Rubino to come up with something for Dale Chihuly to review and purchase for Chihuly Inc."

"Chihuly is not the source of inspiration for a substantial number of glass artwork carrying the Chihuly mark," they wrote.

In an interview, Mr. Rubino said he did not understand why Mr. Chihuly went after him and said the suit could ruin him. He said it could prevent him from making the most basic of glass objects that are lopsided by gravity when pulled from an oven.

"I'm a technician," Mr. Rubino said. "I can make anything out of glass, and I can spin it any way."

For his part, Mr. Chihuly called Mr. Rubino a "gaffer," a term for a glassblower who labors around a furnace at the instruction of an artist. Asked to assess Mr. Rubino, Mr. Chihuly said, "He was an excellent craftsman" with little vision of his own.

"You think I would ever let Rubino decide what something looks like?" Mr. Chihuly asked.

Mr. Rubino's lawyer, Scott Wakefield, said Mr. Chihuly was in essence seeking a monopoly over a huge field of art.

"If the first guy who painted Madonna and Child had tried to copyright it," Mr. Wakefield said, "half of the Louvre would be empty."

Bush Pitches In To Help Ehrlich (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

BALTIMORE -- President Bush hopped over to Baltimore yesterday to raise money for the Maryland Republican Party, telling a high-paying crowd of several hundred to help re-elect Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and also send Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele to the U.S. Senate, although the latter was conspicuously absent.

"In our line of work there's a lot of big talkers, and sometimes you find a doer -- somebody who knows how to set an agenda and lead people to accomplish that agenda," Mr. Bush said. "Bob Ehrlich is a doer, he's a great leader, and he needs to be re-elected governor of the state of Maryland."

Mr. Bush stood on a stage in a ballroom at the BWI Marriott just feet away from Mr. Ehrlich, but the president also had brief kind words for Mr. Steele, the other major Republican statewide candidate on the ballot in November, even though Mr. Steele was not there.

"By the way, when you're getting him in as governor, make sure you put Michael Steele into the United States Senate," Mr. Bush said, in one of just two references to the Senate candidate in his speech.

Mr. Steele is one of the most senior black Republican officeholders in the nation and is one of the party's high-profile candidates in November. He has not been shy about disagreeing with Mr. Bush publicly in recent weeks, saying in particular that Mr. Bush mishandled the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Steele was in Las Vegas at another engagement yesterday, Republicans at yesterday's Maryland event said. But they dismissed talk of a rift, saying the two have campaigned together before. In December, Mr. Bush drew about 600 guests and netted about $500,000 at a Steele fundraiser at the Baltimore Ravens' M&T Bank Stadium.

The president praised Mr. Ehrlich for being "an education governor" who fought for charter schools and accountability, said he worked to clean up the Chesapeake Bay, and controlled spending and increased jobs. He said Mr. Ehrlich also deserves to be re-elected because he blocked a huge tax increase that would have happened had a Democrat won in 2002.

"I tell you what would have happened -- the legislature would have raised $7.5 billion in tax increases had you not had this man as the governor of the state of Maryland," he said.

Mr. Ehrlich will face one of two strong Democratic challengers -- Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan or Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley -- in his bid for a second term.

"This is about a competitive two-party state," Mr. Ehrlich said before introducing Mr. Bush.

Mr. Bush is stepping up his campaign schedule in the run-up to November, knowing that control of Congress -- and therefore his ability to pursue his agenda in the last two years of his presidency -- is on the line.

The Maryland Senate race could figure prominently in the battle for control of Congress. Democrats would need to net six seats to gain control of the upper chamber, and a defeat in a Democrat-held seat in Maryland could doom Democrats' chances.

DOJ_NMG_0031079

Mr. Steele has distanced himself from Mr. Bush in other ways. According to columnist Robert Novak earlier this week, Mr. Steele "could not find anything favorable to say about the president" during an event at Prince George's Community College. Mr. Novak also said that Mr. Steele "was even tougher on Bush in talking to me: 'In the eyes of blacks, [Hurricane] Katrina was a 9/11 event. You didn't fly over 9/11. You got on the ground in the rubble. You should have been on the ground for Katrina.' "

Some of the Republicans in attendance last night said they were surprised by Mr. Steele's absence, but said there was no rift and he would benefit anyway from the event, which raised funds for Maryland Victory 2006, a get-out-the-vote operation that specifically targets state legislative races and Mr. Ehrlich's campaign, but which will benefit Mr. Steele as well.

Organizers wouldn't say how much tickets were or how much they took in, though they said it was the most successful event ever for the state party. Early reports had the event netting around $1 million. Couples who attended the VIP reception beforehand and had a photo taken with the president paid $10,000 a couple.

Several hundred people attended the main speaking event and heard Mr. Bush refer repeatedly to Mr. Ehrlich's record in specific detail.

The money raised goes to Maryland Victory 2006, a get-out-the-vote operation that specifically targets state legislative races and Mr. Ehrlich's campaign but which will benefit Mr. Steele as well.

Mr. Bush is still a giant draw for Republican candidates, and the White House says he is getting more requests than he can fulfill, but some incumbent lawmakers are choosing not to attend events with him.

Rep. Curt Weldon, Pennsylvania Republican, skipped a similar event last week for U.S. House Republicans from the Philadelphia area. Mr. Weldon told the Wall Street Journal that Mr. Bush is doing poorly in his state and said, "I've got to win this by myself."

For yesterday's event, Mr. Bush showed he had more than a passing familiarity with Mr. Ehrlich's campaign and accomplishments during his first term. The president touted the governor's record on the Chesapeake Bay and charter schools, and spoke in depth about Mr. Ehrlich's performance on tax cuts and the state budget.

He also said Mr. Ehrlich showed he can manage finances by cutting his own executive office by 7 percent.

Mr. Bush continued to sound themes popular with conservatives such as his pledge to veto the emergency spending bill for the war on terror and hurricane relief if Congress spends more than the president's target.

But Mr. Bush didn't mention another hot-button issue -- immigration, which divides his party deeply.

Steele Absent From Bush GOP Fundraiser (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

President Bush shuttled into Maryland last night to help the state Republican Party raise more than $1 million for a number of high-profile 2006 races, but only one of the state's two marquee Republican candidates joined him.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. stood on a riser shoulder to shoulder with the president, but the party's leading candidate for an open U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, was absent. Steele had a scheduling conflict, campaign spokesman Doug Heye said.

In a speech to 300 Ehrlich loyalists, Bush focused on what he said were the high points of the governor's first term, including initiatives to promote charter schools and the health of the Chesapeake Bay.

"I like Bob Ehrlich because he's not afraid to take on problems," Bush said. "Bob Ehrlich is a problem solver."

As they waited for the president to speak in a hotel ballroom near Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport, several Republicans in the crowd said they were not concerned about Bush's poll numbers in Maryland. His approval rating in the state has dipped below 30 percent, according to a recent poll.

Democrats were eager to promote Bush's appearance, figuring it wouldn't help Ehrlich politically.

"We encourage him to come back every day and spend more and more time with Governor Ehrlich," a grinning Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley said at a news event yesterday morning. O'Malley and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan are the two Democrats seeking to unseat Ehrlich this fall.

Democratic Party officials also were quick to spotlight Steele's decision to miss the event. Steele was in Nevada to attend a fundraiser in his honor, his campaign aides said.

Analysts disagreed over whether Steele was sending a message. The lieutenant governor has not been shy about appearing close to the president, having taken part in numerous events with Bush's close aides and relatives and a fundraiser headlined by Bush.

Jennifer Duffy, managing editor of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, said it is one thing for a candidate to pass on an event with the president if he has a clear conflict, such as a pending vote on Capitol Hill. "It's a lot harder to explain that you didn't attend an event with the president because you were going to an event hosted by a senator from another state," Duffy said. "I think you have to assume there is some element of him distancing himself not only from the president, but from the party."

In Maryland, any Republican running statewide will have to reach across the aisle for votes. The state's registered Democrats outnumber Republicans by nearly two to one.

Steele's candidacy, in particular, has been designed to draw support from black voters who may be disaffected Democrats but still disapprove of Bush in overwhelming numbers. One internal Democratic Party poll recently put Bush's support from black voters in Maryland at 8 percent.

Ehrlich aides said that for the governor, there was no question about whether he would attend last night's event.

"There was no ambivalence on the governor's part," said Shareese DeLeaver, a campaign spokeswoman. "We're onboard."

Ehrlich's political opponents said they didn't see that the governor had a choice. Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller (D-Calvert) recalled that in 1998, when then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening (D) canceled a fundraiser with President Bill Clinton, the decisions wound up looking petty and disloyal.

"I personally think Ehrlich's decision as a party leader is the right decision," Miller said. "But he is going to have to acknowledge that he's aligned with the president."

Silver Spring developer and political commentator Blair Lee, who is quick to praise Ehrlich, said not showing up would also be at odds with the governor's personal style. "He's a jock," Lee said. "It's part of the jock code. You don't turn your back on your teammates."

Whether it will hurt Ehrlich to be associated closely with the president is an open question.

When Jerry W. Kilgore (R) was running for governor in Virginia last year, some viewed the president's declining popularity, particularly in Northern Virginia, as a factor in Kilgore's loss.

Kilgore struggled visibly over how to handle appearances with Bush. Just weeks before the election, he declined to accompany Bush to an event in Norfolk, but the two appeared together on the eve on the election to try to turn out the Republican base.

Bush Helps Raise $1M For Md. Republicans (AP-Y2)

AP2, May 31, 2006

President Bush helped raise $1 million Wednesday to boost the effort to give a second term in the Maryland governor's office to a Republican for the first time in half a century.

Maryland's GOP governor, Robert Ehrlich, faces a difficult re-election battle in November. The first Republican elected governor of this traditionally Democratic state in 38 years, he has two potentially strong Democratic challengers: Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and Doug Duncan, county executive of Maryland's most populous county.

"Some people talk a good game," Bush said of Ehrlich before well-heeled supporters at a cocktail reception at an airport hotel. "This man has delivered."

The event raised $1 million for the state GOP.

Notably absent was Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the Republican seeking the state's open U.S. Senate seat. With several Democrats vying to run against him, Republicans see the race as a good chance to pick off a Senate seat now held by Democrats. Five-term Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes (news, bio, voting record) is retiring.

Steele's campaign said he was in Las Vegas on Wednesday for a fundraiser that had been on his calendar for months.

As donors waited for Bush to speak, Ehrlich said the event and others like it are crucial to Maryland Republicans' hopes to turn the Democratic stronghold into a two-party state.

"It's about realignment," he said.

Clinton Opens State Campaign With Salvos At White House (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

BUFFALO, May 31 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton formally opened her Senate re-election campaign on Wednesday with a call to "take our country back" from the current Republican leadership, cataloging what she called the Bush administration's failures in a marquee appearance at the state Democratic convention that signaled how she might approach a presidential campaign.

Mrs. Clinton, virtually unchallenged within the party for her seat, accepted the nomination by first showing an 18-minute biographical film contending that as a senator, she has converted former skeptics into supporters. But in remarks that followed,

DOJ_NMG_0031081

Mrs. Clinton, who aides say is still deciding whether to run for president in 2008, quickly broadened her message into an argument for new leadership at the national level.

"I believe that we need a fundamentally new direction," Mrs. Clinton told several hundred convention delegates, who unanimously chose her as the party's Senate candidate.

"We are better than what is happening in America today," Mrs. Clinton continued.

She added that events like Hurricane Katrina's aftermath "show what happens when our leaders are not paying attention, when they're not making decisions based on the facts on the ground, when they just think they can get away with saying, 'You're doing a heck of a job.' " Her allusion was to President Bush's assessment of Michael D. Brown, who was the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency at the time of the hurricane..

Mrs. Clinton mentioned the war in Iraq — a contentious undercurrent throughout the Democratic gathering — just once. Rather than defend her decision to vote for authorizing the war, as she sometimes has in the past, Mrs. Clinton emphasized the need to rely on Iraqi security forces so American troops can come home.

Her comments came as the convention passed a resolution urging a troop withdrawal at the earliest practical date and as an antiwar activist, Jonathan Tasini, said he would seek the 15,000 signatures needed to enter a primary against Mrs. Clinton in September.

Heading into this election, Mrs. Clinton faces a divided Republican Party, whose delegates — holding their own convention Wednesday on Long Island — split their support between two candidates to challenge Mrs. Clinton, paving the way for a potentially bruising primary.

Mrs. Clinton's convention appearance, while predictable in political terms, held important symbolic meaning: Her advisers hope that a strong showing in New York, particularly in Republican upstate areas, will convince Democrats nationwide that she holds bipartisan appeal. In many ways her re-election campaign will be about beating expectations, or at least surpassing the 55 percent of the electorate she won in 2000.

That much was reflected in the biographical film that opened the event: Produced by the longtime Clinton media adviser Mandy Grunwald, it wove a narrative of Mrs. Clinton's short political life, starting with President Bush's prediction in July 2000 that her Republican opponent would win.

From there, it told of a larger-than-life senator (her husband, former President Bill Clinton, is among those interviewed) who has nonetheless paid attention to small, human tasks (like comforting an amazed Sept. 11 survivor in her hospital bed) and diligently worked across the aisle to get things done (another testimonial is from Maj. Gen. Thomas P. Maguire, the former adjutant general of New York and an ally of Gov. George E. Pataki, a Republican).

Still, it was Mrs. Clinton's speech after the film that captured her current political thinking and was sure to be interpreted in the context of speculation that she will run for president in the next campaign.

Iraq has been a vexing issue for Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats who voted for what has become an increasingly unpopular war. In her speech, Mrs. Clinton attacked the Bush administration for its "wrongheaded, short-sighted foreign policies" and made a pointed comment on the president's handling of the war.

"Stand with me as we push the Bush administration to take responsibility for the mistakes and misjudgments that they have made around the world," she said. "And stand with me as we put pressure on both the administration and the new Iraqi government to get behind a real plan for the Iraqis to assume a growing responsibility for their own security and safety, so that we can begin to bring our troops home."

Mr. Tasini, a former union official who acknowledged that his real purpose at the convention was to spur a debate on Iraq rather than to defeat Mrs. Clinton, said he was unsatisfied by her remarks about the war. "I don't think that's dramatically different than the administration's position," he said.

At times, Mrs. Clinton sounded determined to distinguish her views more forcefully. She repeated "I believe" at least a half-dozen times. "I believe in the chance for every person to pursue his or her dreams," she said. "I believe in the dignity of work that is fairly compensated."

At another point, she said: "I believe in a government that makes decisions based on facts — and, sadly, that seems to be an unusual idea in Washington these days."

Later, she repeated "Stand with me," or "Stand against" or "Stand up for" over and over. It was a rhetorical device that seemed destined for the campaign trail and was, her aides said, reminiscent of language she used in 2000.

She drew strong, if not passionate, applause from a crowd that chanted "Hil-la-ry" when she arrived. Her husband sat up front, watching her with a smile. When she pointed him out, praising him as an inspiration and a mentor, a friend and a partner, the audience cheered and rose for a standing ovation. Mr. Clinton joined her onstage for an embrace at the end, before the obligatory balloon drop that signaled a campaign under way. (Their daughter, Chelsea, had hoped to attend but was kept away by work, a Clinton official said.)

DOJ_NMG_0031082

Dressed in an electric-blue pants suit, Mrs. Clinton stood out against the backdrop of the other New York Democrats nominated during the convention, some of whom seemed aware they were in the shadow of her celebrity. Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi joked during his uncontested nomination that he was "one of the opening acts"; Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, alongside Mrs. Clinton as she was mobbed by supporters after a breakfast, eventually wandered away from the preoccupied crowd.

Only Mr. Clinton could keep up: Even after Mrs. Clinton had fled the hotel ballroom, he lingered in a throng of reporters to answer questions, mostly about his wife. When aides tried to end the session, he kept talking, until finally, perhaps realizing he was the only politician left in the room, he turned to go.

Clinton Kicks Off Re-election Bid In N.Y. (AP-Y2)

By Marc Humbert

AP2, May 31, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, unanimously endorsed at her party's convention for a second term, repeatedly bashed the Bush administration Wednesday as she told cheering Democrats that the country needs "a fundamentally new direction."

Republican delegates, meanwhile, split their votes between two challengers poised for a bitter primary fight.

Clinton, kicking off her re-election bid while continuing to avoid talk of a 2008 presidential run, said that for the Bush administration "it is more important to say `mission accomplished' than actually accomplishing the mission."

"With hard work, we will take our country back," Clinton told the more than 400 delegates to the Democratic state convention who made her their official designee for the party's Senate nomination.

Former President Clinton was in the audience but didn't speak. He got a standing ovation when the former first lady singled him out as "an inspiration, a mentor, a partner." They hugged briefly when he joined her on stage following her speech, which was preceded by an 18-minute video praising her work in the Senate.

Clinton and Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who is campaigning to replace outgoing GOP Gov. George Pataki, are polling well ahead of their competition.

At the Republican convention on Long Island, delegates chose former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer as their official Senate nominee.

"We have the issues on our side. We are Republicans," Spencer said. "They (Democrats) do not have the issues on their side."

Spencer won 63 percent of the weighted delegate vote, but Kathleen Troia "KT" McFarland, a former Reagan-era Pentagon official, was able to secure 36.5 percent of the vote — enough to guarantee her a spot on the Sept. 12 primary ballot.

Clinton faces a possible Democratic primary in September from anti-Iraq-war activist Jonathan Tasini.

He would have won an automatic spot on the primary ballot with 25 percent of the convention vote, but delegates did not even place his name in nomination. He'll need signatures from at least 15,000 Democrats to force a primary.

Hillary Clinton Kicks Off US Senate Re-election Campaign (AFP-Y2)

AFP, May 31, 2006

Former first lady Hillary Clinton, viewed by many as the Democrats' best prospect for reclaiming the White House in 2008, kicked off her campaign for a second term in the US Senate.

At an event in the economically depressed city of Buffalo in northern New York, the former first lady said she was "honored" to accept the nomination for the November 2006 election.

While she trumpeted her accomplishments as a legislator at the end of her first six-year term, Clinton also took swipes at the Republican administration that she has criticized for undoing much of what her husband, former president Bill Clinton, achieved in eight years in the White House.

"We all need to stand up and demand new leadership that will once again put our country back on the right track," said the former first lady said, who is considered an early front-runner for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

"I believe that we need a fundamentally new direction, and we need to work toward solutions that help us meet our 21st-century challenges of expanding our economy, defending our security and preserving our values," she said.

"Stand with me against the wrong-headed, short-sighted foreign policies of this administration. Let's start building alliances instead of alienation around the world. Let's win back the respect that the people of the world should have for our country," the US lawmaker said.

Clinton has denied that she is seeking to use her Senate re-election bid as a dress rehearsal for the White House race.

Still, she is seen by many political observers as the only credible Democratic candidate with a big enough war chest and sufficient star power to win the US presidential race.

However, Clinton also is seen as a divisive figures who would have to overcome strong Republican opposition to win election to the top US political office.

Hillary Accepts Call To Run Again (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton officially started her re-election campaign yesterday, accepting the Democratic nomination for her New York seat with a promise of fighting for energy independence and fair wages while avoiding questions on her front-runner status if she chooses to seek the presidency in 2008.

"I know you took a chance on me back in 2000, and I have worked every day to earn your trust," the former first lady told the crowd at the New York Democratic convention in Buffalo.

Mrs. Clinton, 58, leads other possible Democratic presidential candidates by double digits, and many political insiders think she will capture her party's nomination easily. But she keeps the focus on the fall, talking about local issues to help boost the state Democratic ticket and acting as a national leader helping to win back the party's congressional majority.

Her acceptance speech included hints of her higher ambitions, however, as the senator asked New Yorkers to "stand with me" as she works to create well-paying jobs and to fund research for alternative energy. She also touched on economic and foreign policy and said: "We all need to stand up and demand new leadership that will once again put our country back on the right track."

Taking jabs at the "uncompromising" and "wrongheaded" Bush administration and Republicans who control Congress, the senator said the president is fiscally irresponsible, and called the response to Hurricane Katrina a "disgrace." She did not, however, mention some of the hot-button issues before Congress, including the recent immigration bill or an upcoming vote to define marriage as the union of a man and woman.

She touted her recently announced energy plan that, among other things, requires oil companies put a share of their profits toward alternative energy. She touched upon the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that struck New York just months after she had been sworn in, and praised the "united" spirit in the aftermath.

Mrs. Clinton asked convention participants to "stand for our troops" by making sure they have the body armor and other equipment needed for combat. The senator, who voted for the Iraq war, said Democrats must pressure the Bush administration and the Iraqi government to assume responsibility for their own safety, "so that we can begin to bring our troops home."

Anti-war candidate Jonathan Tasini plans a petition drive to get on the September ballot to challenge Mrs. Clinton for the nomination.

Mr. Tasini called Mrs. Clinton a "mediocre" lawmaker and sharply criticized her support for the war, saying her comments on bringing the troops home "had no meaning at all."

Still, he knows he is embarking on a very difficult campaign.

"I'm facing someone who has 99 percent name recognition and $25 million in the bank," he said.

Mrs. Clinton most likely will be the candidate to face former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer, a Republican, in November. Despite the competition, she is expected to cruise to re-election without spending much of her $20 million in campaign funding. She can use all of that money, up to date as of March 31, for a presidential bid, should she decide to pursue moving back to the White House in two years.

Pataki Courts Friends, Supporters In Iowa (AP-Y2)

By Mike Glover

AP2, May 31, 2006

New York Gov. George Pataki strolled through a teeming farmers market in Iowa, chewing on a giant radish and pressing the flesh with a few thousand people he'd like to be his closest friends.

"I grew up on a farm, so you learned to eat everything raw," said the Republican, a potential presidential candidate in 2008.

"I know you, I'm a transplanted New Yorker," gushed Isabel Osius. "I guess I don't have to ask why you're here."

Within the hour, Pataki had donned dark robes and was delivering the commencement speech to medical graduates at Des Moines University, the multitasking required for a White House hopeful 19 months before Iowa caucus-goers vote.

Pataki seems like an unlikely sell in Iowa — a Northeast moderate who backs abortion and gay rights and gun control — but the three-term governor has focused on the handshaking-backslapping-local fundraising required to win over voters in a less populated, rural state.

"He's a good retail politician," said former Iowa Republican Chairman Michael Mahaffey. "Part of the reason he connects is he comes from an area that is more like Iowa than you think. There's a lot of New York that is not like New York City."

DOJ_NMG_0031084

Pataki has been to Iowa four times since the National Governors Association meeting last summer.

"I love grassroots politics," Pataki said. "I still remember what it was like to run for mayor of Peekskill." That was his first political job.

His recent Memorial Day weekend swing through Iowa was a prime example. On Friday, Pataki stopped in five small towns raising money for local state lawmakers and county political operations, as well as establishing ties to local activists.

"He has definitely been a player," said Tim Albrecht, a GOP legislative staffer working on the midterm elections where Republicans are clinging to a 51-49 margin in the Iowa House. "He has been helpful in that regard and we expect him to continue. He's doing all the right things."

During his swings, Pataki has paid close attention to the political details. Republican Jeff Lamberti, the president of the state Senate, is trying to oust Democratic Rep. Leonard Boswell (news, bio, voting record) in central Iowa's 3rd District.

Meeting with Pataki recently, Lamberti asked him if he'd mind doing a fundraiser to help his congressional campaign.

"He said sure," chuckled Lamberti. "But he said 'People in Iowa know they can see me for free so my ability to raise money here is limited. Why don't we do a fundraiser for you in New York?'"

The event is scheduled for next month.

Pataki does not have the obvious links to the state's influential social and religious conservatives, then again there's already plenty of competition for that group among other GOP hopefuls.

Many conservatives are quietly watching and waiting to assess Pataki, whom they admit to not knowing very well.

"We'll sit down with him at some point and we'll ask him the questions," said Steve Scheffler, head of the Iowa Christian Alliance. "Then we'll go from there."

Sounding a warning, Scheffler said social and religious conservative are a large enough force that candidates can't expect their vote to be diluted by being spread among several candidates.

"He certainly is going to have to get a chunk out of this constituency if he's going to do well," Scheffler said.

Pataki's aggressive early campaigning could pay off in a wide open primary with no early front-runner, Mahaffey said.

"We have a tendency in the Republican Party to anoint candidates," Mahaffey said. "There is no anointed candidate this time."

Hillary's Challengers (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, May 31, 2006

May 31, 2006 - Maybe Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut has no chance to win the presidency. Or maybe he does. In any case, the mere fact that he called me the other day to remind me that he is running tells me something: that most of the Democratic Party's savviest veterans—elected officials in their Capitol Hill suites, Hollywood machers tooling along the Santa Monica Freeway in their Priuses, the New York soft-money crowd eating their egg-white omelets at the Regency in Manhattan—are convinced that Hillary Can't Win.

We are in the earliest, weirdly neurotic and theoretical phase of the '08 race, when insiders (and would-be candidates) in both political parties try to assess whether the putative, on-paper front runners really can do the job. But the fever is more intense on the Democratic side.

There are plenty of Republican insiders who don't like Sen. John McCain for one reason or another, but I don't hear many say that McCain can't beat whomever the Dems put up against him.

Among Democrats, however, the opposite equation holds true: no one doubts Hillary Clinton can win the nomination; not many think she can beat the GOP's candidate, especially if it is McCain.

Among the ardent Democrats I've talked with in recent days who insist on this are: a megamillionaire entrepreneur from Boston, an academic from Harvard, a show-biz big wig from New York, an industrial-union leader from Washington and—though he doesn't say it in so many words, Dodd.

The Buzz Factor

When he did a count on May 7, Charlie Cook of the Cook Political Report listed 10 Democrats as possible challengers to Clinton—former vice president Al Gore among them. Dodd makes it 11. He told me that he would spend between now and the end of the year doing the first and most indispensable thing that any would-be contender needs to do: seeing if he can raise money.

In presidential politics there are a series of concentric elections until the final one (in the Supreme Court.…). Money comes just after—and in conjunction with—the creation of buzz.

Can Dodd create any?

DOJ_NMG_0031085

Unless you live in Connecticut, or followed the insider mechanics of the 1996 Clinton re-election race (when Dodd served an unhappy year as party chairman) you probably have no idea who he is. Let me tell you, briefly.

At 62, with snowy white hair, Dodd is a lifer in politics and government, an insider's insider—very highly regarded within the visible and invisible club of the Senate. He retains a boyish enthusiasm for the old-school arts of bipartisan legislating and serious debate. The guy tends to know what he is talking about.

The Dodd DNA

Politics is a family business. In a way—though he doesn't say so—Dodd's career is about redeeming the Dodd family name in that business. His late father was a senator. A world away—in 1967—Thomas Dodd of Connecticut was censured by the Senate. Three years later, he ran as an independent and lost. His son managed the campaign.

Chris Dodd was elected to the House in 1974—the "post-Watergate" year that swept in dozens of reform-minded Democrats. (Bill Clinton was trying to be one of them down in Arkansas, but didn't make it.) Dodd was elected to the Senate in 1980.

"Legislative accomplishments" don't translate well into a presidential run—one reason why senators rarely move on to the White House—but Dodd has more than most. Perhaps the best known is the Family and Medical Leave Act, landmark social legislation of the Clinton years.

Dodd is a mix of unassuming and worldly, the product of Providence College (a font of prominent Irish Democrats) and the Peace Corps, which took him to the Dominican Republic. He speaks fluent Spanish, is a moderate on defense and pretty much of a social liberal.

There was a time, after a divorce, when Dodd seemed an affable but somewhat lost soul: a man of obvious talent destined for something, but no one was sure quite what. But he remarried a few years ago and is now the proud dad of two little girls, whose ages he still measures in quarter years and months.

He knows the litany of why he can't win: he's a senator, an insider, has no money, is from the Northeast (liberal New England, no less). He's the product of, and thrives in a pre-Internet world where deals are done and votes are won in person, face to face, handshake to handshake, across party lines. Definitely old school.

But Dodd's argument is that, in an uncertain world, and one divided by Red and Blue, voters are ready for someone who can make politics work by bridging gaps, talking turkey and doing deals. "I think I've demonstrated an ability to bring people together," he said. "People are yearning for a sense of confidence in the country's future," he said. "Bringing people together is the way to do it."

And though he doesn't say so, the subtext is clear: I can do something that Hillary can't.

Contract With Pennsylvania (WSJ)

By Mike Folmer

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

LEBANON, Pa. -- The Republican primary of 2006 in this state has been called a "political massacre," an "earthquake" and "payback." It has been discussed in media outlets across the country and across the political spectrum. Now, more than two weeks have elapsed since May 16, and pundits, editorial writers and political analysts are still trying to figure out what led to the defeat of 16 incumbent state legislators -- including Pennsylvania's top two state Senate Republicans -- at the hands of underfunded, and in several cases -- including mine -- unknown challengers.

Many, including some of those incumbents who lost, are crediting (or blaming) the huge pay raise of July 2005, which approved increases of up to 54% for elected officials and was passed under the cover of darkness by a Republican-controlled Legislature at the behest of a liberal Democratic governor, Ed Rendell. Some take a more philosophical approach, attributing the dramatic political shift to a general disdain for Harrisburg; others think it was due to a need for the people to take back control of the government from ineffective politicians.

My personal experiences working the campaign trail this past spring made it apparent to me that the political upheaval was due to a coalescing of two fundamental perspectives held by the rank-and-file: Government needed to be reformed; and the state Republican Party needed to be reformed, too.

Conservatives had long been chafing at the fact that an ostensibly conservative Legislature had linked arms with Mr. Rendell to raise income taxes, push up state spending to record levels, and expand both corporate- and social-welfare spending without any apparent means of accountability -- while a comprehensive property tax reform package continued to stall in the Legislature.

These people at the grassroots no longer viewed the state Legislature as a servant of the people but as an exclusive club for political insiders. They fumed as the legislators voted to increase their own pensions by 50%, in addition to excessive daily allowances just to show up for work, and at the practice of allowing members to take expensive junkets to resort locations.

It was as if the Republican Party leadership in the state capitol had forgotten everything they'd been taught by Ronald Reagan -- that the core values of the Republican Party were lower taxes, less spending and limited government.

Then came the notorious pay raise, and the camel's back was broken.

The pay raise particularly stung Republicans, for it was their political party that was in charge of the Legislature when this blatant violation of the state Constitution (and common sense) was rammed through. These Republicans, I came to understand, felt the time had come to clean their own house.

A critical part of such housecleaning requires viable candidates who are willing and able to challenge incumbent legislators, and who inspire passionate support among the voters. Conservative Republicans are not stupid; if they don't like the choices presented, they will stay home.

Rank-and-file conservatives do not gravitate toward candidates simply because they are not "the other guy." While the pay raise energized voters and gave them a reason to consider other options, it was the duty of the challengers to explain why they were better choices than the incumbents. It is my conviction that Republican voters were just as desirous of a positive vision that they could embrace -- a vision that demanded accountability and reform at the state level -- as they were to remove those incumbents who had failed to uphold the traditional ideals of their party.

And that is why "The Promise to Pennsylvania" was so important. The Promise -- drafted by my campaign and that of three other candidates -- codified the elemental Republican principles of lower taxes and less government and sketched out how these principles should be applied at the state level. For all intents and purposes, it was a Contract With America -- for Pennsylvania.

The Promise gave Republican voters an opportunity to re-evaluate exactly what it was they believed in. Did they want to continue down the path of higher taxes and growing government, or did they want to see real tax reform and constraints on spending?

For the many Republican reformers who won their respective primaries, the Promise holds the key for eventual victory in the fall. It is a standard around which other Republicans can rally, clearly outlining an agenda for the next legislative session and defining the critical, core issues for the party.

It is also my conviction that while the leadership of the Republican Party is still trying to figure out how it will deal with the fallout from May 16, it is imperative that the GOP come together in time for the Nov. 7 election. There are critical races to win -- most notably Rick Santorum's fight to beat back state treasurer Bob Casey Jr. and keep his U.S. Senate seat, and Lynn Swann's campaign to upend Ed Rendell and become Pennsylvania's first black governor.

I was a reluctant candidate. Family and friends urged me to consider public office, but it was only after much thought and consideration and prayer that I agreed. One factor that appealed greatly to me was the vision the Founders had of a citizen-legislature -- of a body consisting of ordinary folks who would fulfill their civic duty for a period of time and then step aside to allow others to do theirs. We've gotten away from that; but public service is not something reserved only for the rich or popular or well-connected. (I was outspent nearly 20 to 1 in my primary campaign against the state Senate majority leader.)

But the most important factor was that ideas matter. I have confidence that the Pennsylvania Republican Party can move forward victoriously not only this coming fall but in future elections. Yet in order to do so, it is imperative that we do not forget the principles that made the Republican Party great.

In many ways, then, the Pennsylvania situation mirrors that of the country as a whole.

Mr. Folmer, a tire salesman, is a Republican candidate for the Pennsylvania Senate.

Texas Governor Signs Property Tax Cuts (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, signed legislation cutting property taxes by almost $16 billion over the next two years and granting public school teachers a $2,000 raise. The legislation was passed in a special session to bring the Texas public school system into compliance with a State Supreme Court order. The one-third reduction in property tax revenue would be offset by a new, higher levy on business, a $1 per-pack increase in cigarette taxes and a portion of the state's $8 billion treasury surplus. The legislation also provides increased per-pupil aid to school districts and bonuses for teachers whose students demonstrate improvement.

Bush Bows To Pressure And Offers Iran Talks (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

The Bush administration bowed to pressure on Wednesday and said it was ready to join European allies in talks with Iran – on condition that Tehran first suspended its nuclear fuel programme.

DOJ_NMG_0031087

Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, revealed the policy change before leaving for Vienna for talks on Thursday with Russia and China – which have resisted proposed sanctions against Iran – as well as France, Germany and the UK. She said: "It's time to know whether Iran is serious about negotiation or not."

Iran offered no immediate official response. Tehran previously signalled its willingness to talk directly to the US while insisting that it would not stop enriching uranium. Iran's government denies that it has a secret nuclear weapons programme.

Diplomats said the Vienna talks would seek to agree a package of incentives to put to Iran, as well as an "understanding" of punitive consequences should it refuse to comply.

She stressed that Iran must first "fully and verifiably suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities" before the US would join the talks. The threat of military action remained on the table, she said.

The Bush administration has come under intense pressure from Congress, prominent Republicans and European allies to open a dialogue with Iran. The reversal is the latest sign that Washington is ready to adopt a more pragmatic approach to preserve a broad international front.

President George W. Bush said the US would take a "leadership position" in seeking a diplomatic outcome. The price of oil fell by nearly $2 a barrel on the news.

A senior administration official said the US believed it had the support of both China and Russia to seek UN sanctions should Iran choose not to negotiate, or negotiate in poor faith. "We would return to the Security Council and get a resolution, and Condi will finalise the agreements [in Vienna] on a list of sanctions that would be part of that resolution," he said.

The US stressed that Iran must "fully and verifiably suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities" before the US would join talks. The threat of military action remained, Ms Rice said.

The US offer carried added significance since Washington proposed discussing the whole range of its differences with Iran, including the issue of Iraq and Tehran's support of "terrorist" groups. Ms Rice denied that the US was seeking a "grand bargain" with Tehran that would lead to diplomatic relations.

Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, said: "This important statement by the US administration reinforces our hope that out of the current discussions we will be able to establish a new and co-operative relationship with Iran."

The US broke off direct talks with Iran three years ago, when Washington accused Tehran of allowing al-Qaeda operatives on its territory to plan attacks in Saudi Arabia.

Neoconservatives in the US reacted with dismay, seeing the move as a betrayal of Mr Bush's "freedom agenda".

"It is a terrible idea," commented Danielle Pletka of the American Enterprise Institute. "It incentivises everyone in the world to blackmail the US." The US and UK appear to have backed down under pressure from China, which wanted incentives put to Iran before moving to a United Nations Security Council resolution.

European diplomats urged Iran against a knee-jerk reaction. "Their instinct would be to reject out of hand but that would be a mistake" a senior official said.

Bush's Realization On Iran: No Good Choice Left Except Talks (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 31 — After 27 years in which the United States has refused substantive talks with Iran, President Bush reversed course on Wednesday because it was made clear to him — by his allies, by the Russians, by the Chinese, and eventually by some of his advisers — that he no longer had a choice.

During the past month, according to European officials and some current and former members of the Bush administration, it became obvious to Mr. Bush that he could not hope to hold together a fractious coalition of nations to enforce sanctions — or consider military strikes on Iranian nuclear sites — unless he first showed a willingness to engage Iran's leadership directly over its nuclear program and exhaust every nonmilitary option.

Few of his aides expect that Iran's leaders will meet Mr. Bush's main condition: that Iran first re-suspend all of its nuclear activities, including shutting down every centrifuge that could add to its small stockpile of enriched uranium. Administration officials characterized their offer as a test of whether the Iranians want engagement with the West more than they want the option to build a nuclear bomb some day.

And while the Europeans and the Japanese said they were elated by Mr. Bush's turnaround, some participants in the drawn-out nuclear drama questioned whether this was an offer intended to fail, devised to show the extent of Iran's intransigence.

Either way, after five years of behind-the-scenes battling within the administration, Mr. Bush finally came to a crossroads at which both sides in the debate over Iran — engagers and isolaters, and some with a foot in each camp — saw an advantage in, as one senior aide said, "seeing if they are serious."

DOJ_NMG_0031088

Mr. Bush, according to one participant in those debates, told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice several months ago that he needed "a third option," a way to get beyond either a nuclear Iran or an American military action.

Ms. Rice spent a long weekend in early May drafting a proposal that included a timetable for diplomatic choreography through the summer.

"Nobody wants to get to that kind of crisis situation — whether it is us or the next administration — where you either accept an Iranian weapon or you are forced to do something drastic," said the participant, who declined to speak on the record about internal White House deliberations.

The idea of engagement is hardly new. When Colin L. Powell was secretary of state, several members of his senior staff argued vociferously that the United States needed to test Iran's willingness to deal with the United States — especially in the aftermath of Sept. 11.

There was strong opposition from the White House, particularly from Vice President Dick Cheney, according to several former officials.

"Cheney was dead set against it," said one former official who sat in many of those meetings. "At its heart, this was an argument about whether you could isolate the Iranians enough to force some kind of regime change." But three officials who were involved in the most recent iteration of that debate said Mr. Cheney and others stepped aside — perhaps because they read Mr. Bush's body language, or perhaps because they believed Iran would scuttle the effort by insisting that the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty gives it the right to develop nuclear fuel. The United States insists that Iran gave up that right by deceiving inspectors for 18 years.

In the end, said one former official who has kept close tabs on the debate, "it came down to convincing Cheney and others that if we are going to confront Iran, we first have to check off the box" of trying talks.

Mr. Bush offered a more positive-sounding account: "I thought it was important for the United States to take the lead, along with our partners, and that's what you're seeing. You're seeing robust diplomacy."

As part of the diplomatic timetable, Ms. Rice will be in Vienna on Thursday to endorse an international offer to Iran that includes several plums. Among them will be the dialogue with Washington that Iran has periodically sought, a lifting of many long-standing economic sanctions, and even light water reactors for nuclear power with Russia and the West controlling access to the fuel.

Yet skepticism abounds. "It's true that the conditions are significantly different than they were four or five years ago, but candidly they are not as favorable now for the United States," said Richard Haass, who as the head of the State Department's policy planning operation during Mr. Bush's first term was a major advocate of engagement with Iran.

First, the new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinijad, "has vowed that the country will never back down on enriching uranium.

"Oil's at $70 a barrel instead of $20, said Mr. Haass, now the president of the Council on Foreign Relations. "And we are bogged down in Iraq," where the United States is vulnerable to Iranian efforts to worsen the violence and arm the insurgents.

But the internal debates in the White House included vigorous discussion of the risks associated with any effort to negotiate with foes suspected of seeking nuclear weapons. And in this, Mr. Bush already has bitter experience.

In its dealings with North Korea, which Mr. Bush branded a member of the "axis of evil" along with Iran and Iraq, the administration also decided a few years ago to try limited engagement, locked arm-in-arm with neighboring nations.

But North Korea has kept making weapons fuel, and the allies have not stayed united: China and South Korea continue to aid the North. The Iranians have doubtless noticed.

The question now is whether there is any middle ground between Mr. Bush's demand that Iran give up everything, and Iran's insistence that it will give up nothing. Without breaking that logjam, the American-Iranian dialogue may never begin.

Shift In U.S. Stance Shows Power Of Seven-Letter Word (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The Bush administration's decision to consider sitting down with the Iranian government underscores a central truth of diplomacy today: Nuclear weapons buy leverage.

For six years, President Bush and his aides have dismissed the idea of talking with Iran about its nuclear programs, and until last year gave little support to European efforts to restrain Iranian nuclear activity. Attempts by former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami, a moderate, to foster a dialogue were rejected, and even back-channel moves failed to gain traction.

Now, in perhaps the biggest foreign policy shift of his presidency, Bush has approved the idea of sitting down at the table with the Iranian government -- one headed by a former student radical who denies the Holocaust. Attached to the U.S. offer was a stern condition: a verified suspension of Iran's nuclear enrichment operations. But the offer overturned a long-standing taboo, and it came from an administration stocked with officials who have made little secret of their desire to overthrow the government in Tehran.

The administration made this move at a moment of weakness. The president's public opinion ratings are among the lowest ever recorded for a modern president, and oil prices have reached record levels, in part because of the confrontation with Iran. The high price of oil, in turn, has enriched the Iranian treasury.

Iran recently announced it had learned how to achieve a key aspect of enriching uranium -- sooner than expected -- raising the stakes in the confrontation. Even so, the lingering fallout from the administration's decision to attack Iraq has made it increasingly difficult to win the support for sanctions on Iran from critical nations such as Russia and China.

A key factor in Bush's decision yesterday is the influence of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who announced the offer in a televised news conference. Since becoming secretary of state last year, Rice has worked assiduously to make certain that the United States does not maneuver itself into becoming the world's enemy No. 1, as it did on the Iraq war.

When Rice made her first trip overseas as secretary last year, to Europe, she had expected to hear a lot of concern about Iraq. Instead, she later said, she was surprised to learn that the confrontation over Iran's nuclear program was a bigger concern -- and that the United States was considered the problem.

She very quickly won Bush's approval for a public shift in policy: active support of the European negotiating track. The support included withdrawing the U.S. objection to Iran's application to the World Trade Organization and allowing Iran the potential to purchase civilian aviation spare parts.

At the time, Rice insisted that the decision to support the Europeans did not mean the Americans would join the talks. (Lower-level U.S. officials on occasion have talked to Iranian counterparts about Afghanistan and Iraq.)

"We've made very clear that we have a lot of other problems with the Iranians," Rice said when she announced the decision in March 2005. "We've also made very clear that we don't intend to do anything to legitimize the Iranian regime. And so what we're looking at here is helping the Europeans in their diplomacy, not shifting policy toward Iran."

But the Iranians walked away from those talks, and the administration slowly found itself drawn into a different stance as the diplomacy unfolded. Rice needed to win over the Russians and Chinese -- and keep the Europeans in line -- so she quietly dropped the objections to the Iranian desire for nuclear power. Previously, the administration had insisted Iran had no need for nuclear power because of its vast oil and gas reserves. But to placate other nations, U.S. officials retreated from that insistence.

"The Iranian people believe they have a right to civil nuclear energy," Rice said yesterday. "We acknowledge that right."

Over the past two months Bush and Rice, along with Vice President Cheney and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, have considered the question of whether the time was right for the United States to sit at the talks. Once Bush received assurances earlier this week from leaders of China, Russia and other nations that if this offer were rejected they would accept a harder line against Iran, U.S. officials decided to go forward with the plan.

Rice said yesterday that she advocated this decision in part because of echoes of the concerns that she heard on her first trip -- that the United States was not serious about resolving this issue with diplomacy.

Conservatives in the administration have chafed at the shifts, suggesting it shows weakness on the part of the United States because Iran apparently has been able to make significant progress in nuclear energy -- with little apparent consequence.

Rice made this new move just as it appeared the European effort was on the verge of collapsing through division and lack of leadership. The Germans, eager to strike a deal with Iran, have been the most adamant that the United States needed to join the talks.

"If this is what it takes to get Russia and China to join in sanctions, so be it," one administration skeptic said. "But I am most concerned that we will end up renegotiating with ourselves again."

U.S. Agrees To Talks With Iran If It Suspends Uranium Enrichment (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, May 31, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United States will join negotiations with arch-foe Iran if it immediately suspends uranium-enrichment work, which could be used for nuclear weapons, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Wednesday in a dramatic turn in policy.

The shift is aimed at testing Iran's willingness to embrace a diplomatic resolution to the crisis over its nuclear program and Russian and Chinese readiness to support punitive sanctions if the Islamic regime balks.

The Bush administration previously had refused pleas from Britain, France and Germany to participate in talks with Iran, which President Bush in 2002 included in an "axis of evil," along with Iraq and North Korea.

Rice told a briefing that "as soon as Iran fully and verifiably suspends its enrichment and reprocessing activities," the United States will join the three European countries, known as the EU-3, in direct talks with Iran on the future of its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0031090

The offer is part of a package of proposals to Iran that Rice and her European, Russian and Chinese counterparts hope to finalize Thursday in Vienna, Austria.

"The Iranian regime must persuasively demonstrate that it has permanently abandoned its quest for nuclear weapons," Rice said. She also said the United States acknowledged that Iran had a right to civilian nuclear energy.

There was no immediate official response from Tehran, where Rice's message was transmitted by the Swiss, who act as intermediaries between the United States and Iran, which have no diplomatic relations.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, called his Iranian counterpart, Javad Zarif, shortly before Rice spoke to tell him about her announcement. Bolton's spokesman, Richard Grenell, said the two men had never talked before.

Iranian officials have floated conditional offers of talks with Washington in recent weeks.

Some senior members of Bush's national security team, including Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, are thought to oppose any talks with Iran and to favor taking steps to undermine or overthrow the Tehran regime.

But the White House has been under pressure for months from Europe, lawmakers of both parties and former top diplomats from Republican and Democratic administrations to drop its refusal to talk to Iran.

European diplomats argued privately that negotiations with Iran on ending what European and American officials believe is a covert nuclear-weapons program would never succeed without direct U.S. involvement.

"My decision today says that the United States is going to take a leadership position in solving this issue," Bush said after Rice's announcement.

Iran says its enrichment program is strictly to produce low-enriched uranium for civilian power reactors, not highly enriched uranium for weapons.

The American offer appeared to contain a second significant concession: dropping a previous demand that Iran permanently abandon all enrichment work because it concealed its program from U.N. inspectors for 18 years.

A U.S. official who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue said it could take Iran up to eight years to meet all the conditions set for ensuring that it wasn't pursuing nuclear weapons and to win acceptance of its right to resume producing low-enriched uranium.

"If they can prove to the satisfaction of . . . the international community and the IAEA (the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency) that they are not developing nuclear weapons, we can imagine Iran resuming pursuit of the (nuclear reactor) fuel cycle," he said.

Rice said the United States, Britain, Germany and France had agreed on the "essential elements" of the package to be discussed in Vienna.

They want a suspension of Iran's uranium-enrichment program and full disclosure of key details of the program, including purchases of weapons-related know-how from an international smuggling ring. Tehran also would have to allow the IAEA to resume snap inspections of its nuclear facilities.

If it agreed, it would be offered economic and political rewards, including sales of advanced light-water power reactors to meet its growing energy needs and access to a five-year supply of low-enriched uranium fuel overseen by the IAEA, U.S. and European officials have said.

If Tehran rejects the demands, sanctions would include restrictions on new foreign investment in Iran and a ban on sales of civilian technology that the country could use in its nuclear and ballistic-missile programs, U.S. and European officials have said.

Rice's announcement was widely welcomed in Europe and Asia. Israel also endorsed it.

A senior administration official, who briefed reporters on condition of anonymity, said Bush had approved the change in tactics Wednesday morning after receiving assurances from world leaders that they'd back sanctions if the outreach failed.

The official said the shift was made because of recent overtures from Iran signaling a willingness to negotiate, a desire to build support for sanctions as a fallback and concerns that delaying action would only make it harder to roll back Iran's nuclear program.

Samuel R. Berger, who was national security adviser in the Clinton administration and who advocated talks with Iran, said they were necessary to test whether a diplomatic solution was possible, they'd help get backing for tough measures if those proved necessary and that they'd show the Iranian people that it was their government that stood between them and the outside world.

Russia is resisting a proposed arms-sale embargo on Iran, the U.S. official said. Russia, Iran's main foreign arms supplier, has agreed to sell 29 sophisticated Tor-M1 antiaircraft missile units in a deal worth $800 million.

In Congress, lawmakers generally supported the administration's decision.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said he cautiously endorsed the new discussion. "All options must be on the table if they fail to respond to the administration's overture," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031091

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., urged Bush to broaden the discussion beyond Iran's nuclear program. "We should be willing to talk about all the issues that divide us: the nuclear program, terrorism, Iraq, Afghanistan, Israeli-Palestinian peace, sanctions and security," he said.

U.S. Offers To Talk To Iran (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

The United States offered yesterday to participate in multilateral talks with Iran on its nuclear program if it suspends uranium enrichment, a policy shift that could result in Washington's first direct contact with Tehran in 27 years.

In Tehran, the official Iranian news agency called the U.S. offer "a propaganda move." Iran accepts only proposals and conditions in the nation's interest, the agency said, and "halting enrichment definitely doesn't meet such interests."

The Bush administration ruled out establishing diplomatic relations with Iran at any time soon, saying the proposal was meant only to "enhance" the prospect of peacefully resolving the nuclear dispute.

"We are not talking here about what some have characterized as a grand bargain," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters. "We are not in a position to talk about full diplomatic relations with a state with which we have so many fundamental differences."

The United States broke ties with Iran after the 1979 Islamic Revolution and has blacklisted the regime in Tehran as a state sponsor of terrorism.

The U.S. offer comes as the United States and its European Union partners Britain, France and Germany -- also known as the EU-3 --complete work on a package of carrots and sticks intended to entice Iran to give up its nuclear ambitions.

"To underscore our commitment to a diplomatic solution and to enhance the prospects for success, as soon as Iran fully and verifiably suspends its enrichment and reprocessing activities, the United States will come to the table with our EU-3 colleagues and meet with Iran's representatives," Miss Rice said.

The administration dropped its long-standing refusal to talks with Iran --which it repeated as recently as last week --under increasing pressure from Republican members of Congress, former government officials and European allies.

In the end, Miss Rice, who had been saying that talks with Iran are not necessary because it knows what it needs to do, came to the conclusion that negotiations without the United States would not be effective, officials said.

"There have been those who have said, 'Well, if only the negotiations had the potential for the United States to be a part of them, perhaps then Iran would respond.' So now we have a pretty clear path," the secretary said.

The Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA) said, "Given the insistence by Iranian authorities on continuing uranium enrichment, Rice's comments can be considered a propaganda move."

At the United Nations, Russia and China's U.N. ambassadors praised the U.S. offer of direct talks but Beijing's envoy urged Washington not to put any conditions on its proposal.

Chinese U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya also urged the Western powers drafting a package of incentives and disincentives to entice Iran into suspending its nuclear program to include security guarantees for Tehran in the package, a "carrot" the United States opposes.

Mr. Wang said Tehran must be allowed to keep pursuing enrichment research, in hopes of eventually producing electric power. So far, the United States as well as Britain, France and Germany have flatly opposed letting Iran pursue enrichment research on its soil.

Both Mr. Wang and Russian U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said it was too soon to speculate on how the U.S. policy shift would affect deliberations on Iran in the U.N. Security Council.

In Tokyo, Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso expressed support for the U.S. offer to conditionally join direct multilateral talks with Iran.

"Since it is essential for the international society as a whole to address the Iranian nuclear issue in a resolute manner, Japan is determined to continue playing a fair role in close consultation with the parties concerned," he said.

President Bush, warning Iran bluntly that it "won't have" a nuclear weapon, described the weeks-long effort of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council to agree on a package as "robust diplomacy."

"I thought it was important for the United States to take the lead, along with our partners," he said in reference to yesterday's announcement. "I believe this problem can be solved diplomatically, and I'm going to give it every effort to do so."

Miss Rice, however, refused to rule out the military option in dealing with Iran even temporarily, as the Europeans have done. U.S. officials said she was aware that some members of the administration still oppose the decision to talk to Tehran.

"We're also prepared if Iran doesn't change course," a senior State Department official said. "This will set us up better for getting strong sanctions and building a broader-based coalition against Iran to take effective action in the future."

He also noted that the administration is working to implement additional "defensive measures" against Iran, such as missile defenses in Europe, anti-arms-proliferation activities and a series of financial actions.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana welcomed Miss Rice's statement, saying "Direct U.S. participation would be the strongest and most positive signal of our common wish to reach an agreement with Iran."

U.S. officials also said they were reasonably optimistic that Russia and China finally will drop their objections to including sanctions in the package of benefits and penalties when the foreign ministers of the veto-wielding Security Council members and Germany meet today in Vienna, Austria.

Miss Rice, who flew to Vienna last night, declined to discuss the package before the meeting. But senior U.S. officials said Washington has agreed not to invoke the entire Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter in a future Security Council resolution on Iran to accommodate Moscow and Beijing.

For weeks, the United States has been calling for a Chapter 7 resolution, which would declare Iran a threat to international peace and stability and automatically trigger the option of using force to deal with that threat.

The compromise to be discussed today refers only to certain articles from Chapter 7 that are not linked with the use of force, the senior officials said.

Iran Calls U.S. Talks Offer "Propaganda" (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, May 31, 2006

The United States said Wednesday it would join in face-to-face talks with Iran over its disputed nuclear program if Tehran first agreed to put challenged atomic activities on hold, a shift in tactics meant to offer the Iranians a last chance to avoid punishing sanctions.

Iran dismissed the offer as "a propaganda move."

Before leaving for meetings in Europe on Iran, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that while the U.S. was willing to join talks between European nations and Iran, it was also helping to prepare a package of sanctions that Tehran could face should it decline the new offer.

"We're prepared to go either way," she said

At the White House, President Bush said, "I believe that it's important that we solve this issue diplomatically, and my decision today says that the United States is going to take a leadership position in solving this issue."

The overture to join stalled European talks came after mounting pressure on the U.S. from European allies.

The administration is convinced Russia and China would support sanctions or other harsh measures if new talks fail to persuade Iran to abandon nuclear efforts that the West fears could lead to a bomb, said a senior administration official. The official briefed reporters on condition of anonymity because the secretary was continuing talks with other countries.

Rice will be working to reaffirm such support on Thursday.

The Iranian news agency said Iran accepts only proposals and conditions that are in the nation's interest. "Halting enrichment definitely doesn't meet such interests," IRNA said.

The United States has had no diplomatic ties with Iran and few contacts at all with its government since Islamic radicals took over the U.S. Embassy in 1979 and held diplomats for more than a year.

Rice will meet with foreign ministers from the other permanent U.N. Security Council members on Thursday in Vienna to finalize a package of economic incentives and threats to be presented to Tehran. That package would be on the table in any new talks involving the United States.

The Bush administration had until now refused to talk directly to the Iranians about their nuclear program, although there have been sporadic contacts among relatively low-level officials on other subjects. The U.S. has long rejected direct contacts because it says Tehran supports terrorism and because it wants to avoid appearing to legitimize the regime.

The offer to talk should strip Iran and some U.S. allies of the argument that the hardline U.S. stance was an obstacle, or that Washington was not willing to try every means to resolve the impasse peacefully, U.S. officials said.

"This is the last excuse, in some sense," Rice said.

She said the United States was not offering full diplomatic relations with Iran and would not swear off ever using military action to stop what the U.S. contends is a rogue program to build a nuclear weapon.

"This is not a grand bargain," Rice said. "What we're talking about here is an effort to enhance the chances for a successful negotiated solution to the Iranian nuclear problem."

The administration has given arms-length support to European efforts to bargain with Iran, but also has been the prime mover for sanctions or other tough United Nations action. Russia and China, Iran's commercial allies on the council, have so far blocked that path.

DOJ_NMG_0031093

Rice would not directly answer questions about whether those nations are committed to tough measures if the U.S. overture doesn't work.

She spoke of "tactical differences" and said, "I think you can be sure that our friends and our partners understand the importance of the step and the importance that the Iranians must now see of making a choice and making that choice clearly."

In New York, the U.N. ambassadors from China and Russia said the U.S. announcement showed it is more serious about finding a diplomatic solution to the dispute. Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya added that Washington's offer to talk to Iran should be unconditional.

In Brussels, Belgium, European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana welcomed the U.S. words. "Direct U.S. participation would be the strongest and most positive signal of our common wish to reach an agreement with Iran," he said.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said, "The European side's goal is to present a serious and substantial offer of cooperation, which demonstrates to Iran the benefits that would flow from compliance ... rather than the further isolation which would result from their failure to do so."

The U.S. offer is conditioned on Iran suspending its enrichment of uranium and related activities and allowing inspections to prove it. European nations and the Security Council have demanded the same thing, but Iran has refused to comply.

Iran did suspend enrichment activities while talks were active with the Europeans last year but resumed and stepped up the program this spring.

Uranium enrichment can led either to a bomb or to nuclear power production, and Iran has so far insisted that it won't take any deal that involves giving up that technology.

If Iran agreed to suspend disputed activities in order to talk with the United States, it could still insist on resuming them later, which U.S. officials say would be a deal-breaker.

At that point, the United States and its allies would be expected to move for tough U.N. action, possibly including economic or other sanctions.

U.S. Reverses Stand On Talks With Iranians (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration reversed course Wednesday and announced a willingness to take part in direct talks with Iran over its nuclear program, but only if Tehran agreed to suspend its uranium enrichment activities.

Iran called the offer "a propaganda move," and many U.S. and allied officials acknowledged that it may reject the central U.S. precondition for talks. But if Tehran spurns the offer, American officials hope that would draw leading world powers together in agreeing to impose painful economic sanctions on the Islamic Republic.

"Iran now faces a clear choice," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Washington. "This is the last excuse."

The United States has long resisted pressure to directly negotiate with Iran. Rice said the U.S. initiative would "give new energy" to a European-led effort to develop a package of incentives and possible penalties to induce Iran to halt disputed nuclear activities. The American proposal would also require Iran to allow the resumption of surprise visits to its nuclear facilities by U.N. nuclear inspectors.

It remained unclear going into a meeting of foreign ministers today in Vienna whether Russia and China would agree to the proposal, which offers both sticks and carrots.

Though the countries involved are unlikely to take the drastic step of trying to block Tehran's oil exports, they could still do enough damage to Iran's economy to force a rethinking of the nuclear program by the fundamentalist leadership, U.S. and allied diplomats say. Tehran is under strong pressure to provide more jobs and a better standard of living for its population.

Rice said that although ongoing talks in Vienna among the world powers had made "substantial progress … some outstanding issues remain."

America's allies and many U.S. foreign policy experts have been urging President Bush and his administration to take part in talks, arguing that unless Washington showed a willingness to engage, it could not convince other countries that the time had come to impose penalties on Iran.

The shift in the U.S. position comes less than a month after Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad sent a surprise letter to Bush, apparently the first direct communication between the two nations' leaders since Iranian militants took Americans hostage at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran more than a quarter of a century ago. The letter included a long series of grievances and demands but was followed by calls from foreign policy experts and even some Republicans on Capitol Hill for direct talks.

The administration has resisted such talks on the grounds they would lend a legitimacy to the Tehran regime, which the United States has condemned for actions dating to the 1979 Islamic Revolution. In reversing that stance, U.S. officials equated their participation in multinational talks on Iran with what the administration has done in the case of North Korea's nuclear program.

Iranian officials contend that their uranium enrichment program is intended only for legal civilian nuclear power facilities that would generate electricity. But the United States and Europeans fear Tehran's goal is to develop a nuclear weapons capability. Britain, France and Germany negotiated with Iran for two years over the disputed program, but talks broke off when Tehran resumed enrichment.

Rice said the proposed talks with Iran would be focused tightly on the nuclear issue, and would not be aimed at reaching a "grand bargain" to resolve all differences between the two countries. Nevertheless, some U.S. officials and foreign diplomats said the new approach had been advanced by Rice to Bush in the face of resistance from more hawkish members of the administration.

Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said that Bush on Tuesday had called the leaders of France, Germany and Russia to discuss the proposal and that "they all signed off."

He said the United States and its allies were "finalizing both a series of inducements and punishments."

"Everybody is very close," Snow said, pointing to "a climate for action."

Bush personally addressed the policy shift in comments at the White House.

"Our message to the Iranians is that, one, you won't have a weapon, and two, that you must verifiably suspend any programs, at which point we will come to the negotiating table to work on a way forward."

Rice said that if Iran did not budge, the United States would move to "increase the pressure," either through the United Nations Security Council, "or, if necessary, with like-minded states outside of the Security Council."

Ahmadinejad has spoken scornfully of the incentive package being developed in Vienna. But Iranian officials have also intermittently signaled an interest in drawing the United States into negotiations, partly in hopes that Tehran could exact a U.S. commitment to drop efforts to undermine the regime.

The White House has heard calls to negotiate from a wide variety of sources, including European officials. But some administration members, including Vice President Dick Cheney, have resisted, fearing that talks could only give the Iranian leadership more stature and more time to advance a weapons program.

The United States' overture to Iran offers an opening for negotiations but comes with so many strings attached that little may happen in the short term, diplomats and experts say.

Under the agreement, the U.S. would enter into direct talks only if the Iranians first agreed to suspend entirely their uranium enrichment program, which Tehran restarted in early April.

The U.S. proposal also says that if Iran fails to comply with the demand to suspend enrichment, the permanent Security Council members will move ahead with a resolution that can lead to sanctions. The incentive package would be offered simultaneously with the tabling of the resolution.

These demands would be hard to swallow for Iran and Russia. Iran has said it will not reenter negotiations if there are conditions attached, such as a mandatory suspension. And the Russians have said they oppose any Security Council measure that can lead to sanctions.

Despite the two countries' public statements, the U.S. offer is considered likely to push all parties to reassess their positions. And diplomats and experts around the world applauded the move as the only hope for a negotiated settlement that could result in the Iranians halting their enrichment efforts.

"They've crossed the threshold, they've said they will talk directly to the Iranians…. There are conditions that make it unlikely that it will happen quickly, but it's part of a process," said a senior envoy in Vienna, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with diplomatic protocol.

"Two weeks ago, it was way down the road that they might consider talking. Now, it's if certain conditions are met. We'll allow diplomacy to take its course, and if the U.S. is engaged, they are engaged, it will be qualitatively different."

International Atomic Energy Agency director-general Mohamed ElBaradei, who has quietly encouraged face-to-face talks, welcomed the move, saying in a statement that he "strongly encourages Iran to create the conditions necessary for the resumption of these talks, with U.S. participation, with a view to achieving a comprehensive settlement that is acceptable to both the international community and Iran."

European diplomats and experts reacted enthusiastically to the American move, even if it may not lead to a quick resolution.

"The Iranians have been demanding direct discussions with the U.S. so it would give much more credibility to the Europeans if they have the Americans sitting at the same table," said a European diplomat.

Gary Samore, who served as a top nonproliferation advisor to President Clinton, said any talks would probably be preceded by a U.S. initiative to work out the details of the negotiations. For instance, the Iranians would probably offer to suspend a portion of their enrichment effort, tempting other nations to accept those terms as a way to at least slow the Iranian effort, he said.

Patrick Clawson, a longtime Iran watcher at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said he was not surprised that the administration would make this offer to join direct talks once it had worked out an agreement with other countries on penalties.

"The U.S. position for some time has been if we can agree on the stick, we'll come with the carrot," he said. "That's what this is."

Clawson and Samore both said they doubted the Iranians would accept the offer. But their refusal, Clawson said, could make it easier for the United States to enlist like-minded countries to impose sanctions.

U.S. Is Now Ready To Meet Iranians On Nuclear Plan (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 31 — The Bush administration said Wednesday that the United States would join Europeans in talks with Iran over its nuclear program, but only if Tehran first suspended its uranium activities, which are thought to be a cover for developing nuclear arms.

The declaration, by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, was a shift away from decades of refusal to hold broad, direct talks with Iran. But Iran has long said it would not agree to preconditions, and the administration's offer appeared to be aimed as much at placating American allies as at wooing Iran.

Ms. Rice announced the shift on the eve of talks in Vienna with European, Russian and Chinese envoys aimed at resuscitating a faltering American-led effort to forge a common front against Iran's nuclear program. The American goal is to present Iran with a package of economic and political benefits if it ends its uranium activities, and a threat of sanctions if it does not.

The shift followed a searching, two-month debate and an accelerating campaign by European leaders to get President Bush to make a dramatic gesture to energize the stalled European-led nuclear talks with Iran, American officials said.

Skepticism from Vice President Dick Cheney and others who have opposed concessions to Iran was overcome, the officials said, when it was realized that refusal to move toward the European view would mean that the administration would be blamed for failing to do its utmost to defuse the crisis, making it harder to rally world opinion against Iran. [News analysis, Page A8.]

Still, American and European officials said, Russian and Chinese support for the package was not yet guaranteed.

"The United States is willing to exert strong leadership to give diplomacy its very best chance to succeed," Ms. Rice said before leaving for Vienna. She added that "the United States will come to the table" with its European partners "and meet with Iran's representative" if Iran met the stated conditions.

It was not clear whether the American offer would prompt any change in Iran's longstanding opposition to preconditions. An official Iranian news agency initially labeled it a "propaganda move."

Ms. Rice said the American shift, however qualified, removed "the last excuse" for Iran to refuse to cooperate. President Bush later described the new approach as one that put the United States into "a leadership position in solving this issue."

"Our message to the Iranians is that, one, you won't have a weapon, and two, that you must verifiably suspend any programs, at which point we will come to the negotiating table to work on a way forward," Mr. Bush said at the White House.

The United States conveyed its readiness to meet through the Swiss Embassy in Tehran, and in a call to Iran's United Nations ambassador, Javad Zarif, by the American ambassador, John R. Bolton, offering Mr. Zarif an advance copy of Ms. Rice's announcement.

Outside of Iran, Ms. Rice's announcement brought nearly universal praise, especially in Europe, though Russia and China seemed guarded about the conditions the United States attached to its offer.

A senior State Department official, who was not authorized to speak for attribution, said President Bush had briefed President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia on the details. "We have a little bit more negotiating to do," the official said. "We just have to make sure that everybody's on board. We think the Russians will be."

The administration has not entirely frozen Iran out of contact in recent years, despite Mr. Bush's labeling it, along with Iraq and North Korea, part of an "axis of evil" in his State of the Union Message in early 2002.

The United States had contact with Iranian officials during the war in Afghanistan and the early stages of the war with Iraq. Iraq and Afghanistan are neighbors of Iran, and Iran has long wielded influence over their internal affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0031096

American talks with Iran were cut off in mid-2003 after the United States charged Iran with involvement in the bombing of civilians in Saudi Arabia. But there were talks at the end of that year and the beginning of 2004 to speed American relief to Iran after the earthquake in Bam.

In addition, last year Ms. Rice announced that the American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, would be authorized to talk with Iranian officials about the situation in Iraq, including infiltration of insurgents and aid to Shiite militias. But these talks have not taken place.

With Washington's new position now public, the European, Russian, Chinese and American negotiators are to focus on details of the incentives and threats of punishment. The United States has quietly made one significant concession to the Russians on this score, by allowing language that would remove any threat of force from the document being discussed.

In addition, the United States has agreed to a Russian and Chinese demand to require that even if the Security Council threatens sanctions, the sanctions would not be imposed without another Council vote.

What all these face-saving arrangements leave unstated, however, is that the United States appears determined to enlist other countries to impose economic penalties, like a crackdown on bank activity in Iran, if the Council fails to act in the face of further Iranian defiance.

Getting worldwide support for a tough policy toward Iran has been hard because Iran, which moved last summer to resume uranium enrichment, is technically correct in saying that this activity, defined by Iran as peaceful in nature, is allowed under the nuclear nonproliferation treaty that it signed.

The West maintains that because Iran has concealed many of its activities from the International Atomic Energy Agency, it has forfeited its right to enrich uranium.

A package of incentives is to be presented Thursday in Vienna, if American plans are fulfilled.

The threat of sanctions, as envisioned by the United States, Britain and France, is to take the form of a commitment to a resolution to be adopted by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which implies penalties if Iran refuses to suspend its enrichment of uranium. Russia and China are opposed to invoking Chapter VII but may relent if they are persuaded by American assurances that sanctions would not be adopted without another vote of the Council.

North Korea Project Halted

A project to build two nuclear power plants for North Korea in exchange for its agreement to allow United Nations inspections of atomic sites was formally ended yesterday by the United States, Japan, South Korea and European Union. The contractor, the Korean Peninsula Energy Development Organization, was formed in 1995 to build two light-water reactors, from which it is difficult to extract weapons-grade plutonium, but the Bush administration never fully supported it.

U.S. Offer Of Iran Talks Seen As Change Of Course (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration, signaling a willingness Wednesday to open direct talks with Iran over its nuclear program, is embracing a sharp change of course that reflects a more pragmatic approach to one of the world's most intractable conflicts and may ease upward pressure on international oil prices.

The administration's overture comes with the same demand of Iran that the U.S. and its European allies have made from the start: the Iranians must first abandon their enrichment of nuclear material, which the West views as evidence of a determination to build an atomic bomb.

But until now, the U.S. has gone out of its way to avoid direct talks with Iran over a program that Iran maintains is designed only for civilian nuclear power. The U.S. has insisted so adamantly that Europeans handle all talks that Greg Schulte, the American ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency, once took evasive action as he encountered the Iranian representative in a hallway in Vienna.

"Once I almost found myself in the same elevator with him, but I found another elevator," said Schulte, adding that Iran wants to paint the conflict as a dispute between the U.S. and Iran. "This is not the U.S. against Iran. This is Iran against the world."

But that may have changed with the administration's offer to add the "weight" of the U.S. to European-led negotiations with Iran. President Bush pledged Wednesday to negotiate "a way forward," but only if Tehran would abandon its suspected development of nuclear weaponry.

The administration also held out a promise of greater economic cooperation with Iran, a country with which the U.S. has not had diplomatic relations since 1980, when ties were severed during Iran's detention of 52 American hostages for 444 days.

The official Iranian news agency quickly dismissed the new U.S. initiative as "a propaganda move." Iran also has rejected previous demands that it halt enrichment.

Before Iran's reaction, oil prices declined on the news of the offer. Iran is estimated to have as much as 9 percent of the world's known oil reserves, second only to Saudi Arabia, and about 15 percent of natural gas reserves.

The change in course is a signal that pragmatists within the Bush administration may be gaining sway over hard-liners who have refused direct relations with Iran. Bush's action is also a measure of the increasing alarm with which Israel and other nations view Iran's procurement of the technology needed to develop weapons-grade uranium.

"My decision today says that the United States is going to take a leadership position in solving this issue," Bush said. "And our message to the Iranians is that, one, you won't have a weapon, and two, that you must verifiably suspend any programs, at which point we will come to the negotiating table to work on a way forward."

Bush, who repeatedly has maintained that the U.S. will not eliminate the option of military action against Iran, also insisted that he is committed to a diplomatic solution.

"You're seeing robust diplomacy," Bush said. "I believe this problem can be solved diplomatically, and I'm going to give it every effort to do so."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she had informed Iran of the administration's offer, using the Swiss government as an intermediary. The invitation, she added, came with a non-negotiable requirement: "As soon as Iran fully and verifiably suspends its enrichment and reprocessing activities, the United States will come to the table with our [European Union] colleagues and meet with Iran's representative."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had made an overture of his own, with a rambling letter to Bush earlier this year, the first communication from Tehran to the U.S. in three decades. Bush dismissed that just last week as "like 16 or 17 single-spaced typed pages" that "didn't address the issue of whether or not they're going to continue to press for a nuclear weapon."

George Perkovich, director for non-proliferation at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, called the U.S. move a "careful and constructive response."

He added, "Almost everyone in the world recognized that something like this move was necessary because the Iranians were winning the international diplomacy. The only people who didn't seem to recognize that this was necessary were in the White House. Now they seem to have recognized reality. They had no other feasible options."

Saeed Laylaz, an analyst in Tehran, said the Iranians had been awaiting a response to their letter. "I'm not immediately optimistic," Laylaz said of Bush's reply. "It doesn't mean negotiations will start tomorrow morning ... but I believe this is the beginning of a trend."

Noting that "both countries know they should find a diplomatic solution," Laylaz said, "The United States knows that military confrontation is too dangerous and too costly. And Iran knows any continued confrontation will be harmful to its own interests."

Until now, the U.S. had left this diplomacy to a troika of Europeans, the so-called "EU-3" of Great Britain, Germany and France. Four years ago, in his State of the Union address, Bush identified Iran, Iraq and North Korea as "an axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world." But since failed diplomacy with Iraq gave way to a costly U.S.-led invasion, the U.S. has found itself taking part in "six-party" talks with North Korea and is now ready to speak with Iran.

Part of the challenge facing the U.S. has been the reluctance of either China or Russia to support sanctions against Iran since the question of Iran's nuclear program has been referred to the United Nations Security Council.

Rice, asked if the U.S. overture makes it more feasible that Russia and China might support the U.S., said the American reluctance to join negotiations had been "the last excuse, in some sense."

Rice held out hope to Iran of a "beneficial relationship of increased contacts in education and cultural exchange, in sports and travel, in trade and in investment." She warned, though, that "the nuclear issue … is not the only obstacle standing in the way of improved relations." Iran, she said, must also stop sponsoring terrorism in Iraq and other nations.

While many experts have estimated that Iran is five to 10 years away from acquiring the technology needed for bomb-making, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert publicly has suggested that Iran could be ready within a year. The Iranian program is of particular interest to Israel because Ahmadinejad has called for the destruction of the Jewish state. The Israelis, in meetings at the White House last week, had encouraged the U.S. to engage in negotiations, one expert said.

The IAEA, which in February reported Iran to the Security Council, plans another meeting June 12 to assess "what if any progress has been made," Schulte said. Bush plans to travel to Vienna, headquarters for the IAEA, to meet European Union leaders later this month.

While Ahmadinejad maintains that his country is interested only in civilian nuclear power generation, many U.S. experts express doubt, in part because Iran possesses great reserves of oil that it could use for energy. Iran's pursuit of enrichment "makes no sense at this point ... and in our judgment is really a guise, is really a cover for a military program," Schulte said.

In Shift, U.S. Offers To Talk To Iran, Aiming To Bolster Allies' Cohesion (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Neil King Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0031098

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration launched a new, more urgent multilateral strategy to rein in Iran's nuclear program by offering to participate in European-led negotiations currently under way with Tehran, after years of pointedly shunning the regime.

The abrupt shift, announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday, is a nod to European allies' desire to offer carrots as well as sticks to steer Iran away from its efforts to produce weapons-grade uranium. The offer to join talks was conditioned on Tehran's pledging explicitly to rule out any plans for nuclear-weapons development.

U.S. officials hope the gambit will win more support from allies for sanctions if Tehran spurns the outreach, as early indications suggest it might.

While the move drew a cool response from the Iranians, the reaction in other quarters was highly favorable. The European Union portrayed the announcement as a "most positive signal," and White House aides said even Russia and China -- long resistant to punishing Iran -- now seem willing to go along with sanctions under certain circumstances. And oil markets reacted with a hint of optimism. (See related article.1)

Ms. Rice said the U.S. might ultimately be willing to work outside the United Nations to impose sanctions if the new American approach fails to change other nations' stances. And while U.S. officials are eager to stress that Washington is exhausting every diplomatic option in dealing with Iran, the U.S. experience in Iraq has all but forced the administration to try a more cooperative approach: This time, Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice are working with allies and through diplomatic channels. They have pulled out the diplomatic stops in recent days to nail down agreement on a firm U.N. resolution.

The president on Tuesday telephoned the leaders of three of the top countries involved -- Vladimir Putin of Russia, Angela Merkel of Germany and Jacques Chirac of France -- and is hoping to speak with Chinese President Hu Jintao soon. Ms. Rice late yesterday flew to Vienna for talks with the foreign ministers of Germany, Russia, France, Britain and China -- the last four of which, along with the U.S., are the permanent members of the U.N. Security Council. The administration also has been consulting with friendly nations in the Persian Gulf, and Mr. Bush as recently as Tuesday talked at length about the Iranian problem with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"We now have an opportunity to either check their movement toward further sophistication of their nuclear program by negotiation, to which we would be a party, or to check it by greater pressure on the Iranians through sanctions and other measures through the Security Council and, if necessary, with like-minded states outside of the Security Council," Ms. Rice told reporters yesterday.

The fight with Iran centers around fears that Tehran is busy working to develop nuclear weapons, while the Iranian government says it is merely enriching uranium to fuel a civilian nuclear program. To ensure that Iran doesn't acquire nuclear weapons, the U.S. and others want to stop the domestic enrichment program and supply Iran with fuel from the outside, a proposal that Iran has rejected.

After hours of official silence in Tehran, the official Iranian news agency dismissed the U.S. offer to participate in European-led talks as a "propaganda move," though some moderate officials within Iran's government have called for direct talks with Washington. Last month, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad sent a rambling 18-page letter to Mr. Bush, though it made only a passing reference to Iran's nuclear program.

But the U.S. announcement drew immediate praise in Europe, where top officials have pushed the U.S. for months to join on-and-off talks that until now have been led by Britain, France and Germany. It also drew cheers from financial markets, as crude oil futures fell 74 cents a barrel in New York trading. One factor behind the recent jump in oil prices has been fear of a confrontation between the U.S. and Iran, the world's fourth-largest oil producer.

While it remains unclear if Tehran will take up the offer, the U.S. move does seem to have hardened support for applying more pressure on Iran. Russian and Chinese diplomats praised the move. And at the White House, a senior administration official said that Russia and China had agreed to back a tough U.N. resolution if Iran rebuffs the U.S. offer. The official also said the proposal's timing was meant to gauge the sincerity of Iran's recent overtures to the U.S. -- which continued with back-channel contacts after Mr. Ahmadinejad's letter -- so the world could see Iran's true intentions.

While the U.S. has generally shunned open contact with Iran since Islamic radicals took hostages at the U.S. embassy in 1979, the Bush White House, more than any of the previous four administrations, had firmly rejected any suggestion that it engage in high-level talks with Iran. In remarks yesterday after Ms. Rice's announcement, Mr. Bush said he decided to alter his stance to show "that the United States is going to take a leadership position in solving this issue" diplomatically.

In a similar turnaround, the administration at first refused to have any contact with North Korea but later agreed to join in six-party talks to try to end Pyongyang's nuclear program, though those negotiations have made little progress.

In the Vienna meetings today, the ministers hope to complete agreement on a comprehensive set of both potential sanctions and economic incentives for Iran. Ms. Rice said these incentives, coupled with Washington's new willingness to engage Tehran directly, offer Iran a clear alternative in its bid to reintegrate with the international community while still developing a peaceful nuclear-energy program.

"Today, the Iranian regime can decide on one of two paths, one of two fundamentally different futures for its people and for its relationship with the international community," Ms. Rice said. She said the U.S. offer to join the European talks would remove "the last excuse" that Iran and others have cited for the lack of diplomatic progress.

In advance of any formal agreement -- in or outside the U.N. -- on sanctions, the U.S. Treasury Department and other government agencies have already been stepping up efforts to curtail Iranian access to the international banking system if Tehran doesn't suspend its nuclear program. In recent months, UBS AG of Switzerland and ABN Amro Holding NV of the Netherlands both announced they were severing their financial ties. Both financial institutions have been subjects of U.S. Justice Department inquiries into whether they violated sanctions laws regarding Iran.

Diplomats involved in the Iran negotiations said these moves could be part of stepped-up action against Iran that will increase in the coming months, regardless of events at the U.N. "I think you're only seeing the early stages of this sort of financial pressure," a European diplomat said.

Ms. Rice personally called for an interagency plan to pressure Iran's financial system should the country not comply with international demands, say U.S. officials. The plan would include targeting companies and personalities known to be involved in the nuclear program, these officials say. And it has been aided by growing concerns among financial institutions about the costs of doing business with Iran.

U.S. officials have also been seeking to cobble a united front among Middle East countries to pressure Iran. All are Sunni Muslim-majority countries that are skeptical of both Iran's nuclear intentions and its moves to expand its influence in the region.

In recent weeks, State Department and Pentagon officials have met with leaders from nine Arab nations to try to develop greater security cooperation. Some of the discussions have focused on counterproliferation and counterterrorism issues, U.S. officials say. But they have also directly sought to strengthen these countries' military hardware, particularly anti-missile defenses.

"The intent is to show that no one in the Gulf community can find that it can be bullied or pressured by Iran's behavior," said John Hillen, the assistant secretary of state for political-military affairs. He added that the Bush administration is seeking to stress to Middle Eastern states that Washington isn't reducing its commitment to securing the region.

U.S. officials are particularly seeking to build a stronger security presence in the Middle East through the Gulf Cooperation Council, a regional body comprising Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates. All have healthy bilateral relationships with Washington, U.S. diplomats say, but the hope is that they can begin cooperating better among themselves on everything from maritime security to protecting the region's energy supplies.

They see the GCC as a buttress against Iran's influence in countries such as Syria, Lebanon and Iraq.

The U.S. outreach to Iran is already being attacked by conservative analysts in Washington and Iranian exile groups. They say the Iranian president will view Mr. Bush's overture as a sign of weakness and that it is unlikely to generate any concessions from Tehran. They also believe Iran's theocratic government will simply use diplomacy with the U.S. to further its nuclear ambitions.

Talks will "buy more time as Ahmadinejad is rapidly proceeding with Iran's nuclear-weapons program," said Alireza Jafarzadeh, a Washington analyst affiliated with the National Council of Resistance of Iran, one of the large Iranian exile opposition groups.

U.S. Willing To Talk With Iran On Nuclear Program (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a significant policy shift, the Bush administration offered Wednesday to take part in talks with Iran about its nuclear program if Tehran suspends efforts to make nuclear fuel.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the offer removes Iran's “last excuse” for not stopping its nuclear program. “It's time to know whether Iran is serious about negotiations,” she said.

IRNA, Iran's official news agency, quickly dismissed the offer as “a propaganda move,” according to the Associated Press. The statement said Iran had no intention of halting uranium enrichment.

The initial rejection still leaves room for diplomacy, Iran experts said.

“I suspect they'll negotiate over negotiations,” said Ray Takeyh of the Council on Foreign Relations.

IRNA is government-controlled, but the Bush administration said it was awaiting official reaction from Iran's leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0031100

"I hope this is not a real reaction from Iran," U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton said in an interview on Fox News. "I think it's important that they take a very careful look at what Secretary Rice laid out today because it really is their last chance, in many respects."

Tehran also is waiting to examine a package of incentives and possible punishments being assembled by the United States, European countries, Russia and China.

The talks would be the first acknowledged high-level negotiations between the two countries since 1980, when the United States broke diplomatic relations during the Iran hostage crisis at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

The Bush administration's offer was the latest in a flurry of diplomatic activity over recent months designed to halt Iran's nuclear program.

The White House suggested recently that it might agree to talks with Iran if Tehran suspended its nuclear program. Rice's statement Wednesday was the first official offer and followed urging from Europeans.

France, Germany and Britain welcomed the U.S. offer.

The overture could help the White House win over Russia and China, which are reluctant to support sanctions and are urging more diplomacy.

The offer also strengthens the U.S. position if Iran refuses to suspend its nuclear program. It allows the United States to argue that it made every diplomatic effort before resorting to sanctions or war.

In contrast to the U.S. stance on Iraq, when the United States acted with limited international support, President Bush said Wednesday that "there must be a united international front … to prevent the Iranians from developing a nuclear weapon."

Bush told reporters that his administration was prepared to take the "leadership position" in efforts to end Iran's nuclear program.

The Bush administration says Iran is trying to build a nuclear weapon. Tehran insists its program is for peaceful purposes.

U.S. To Join Talks With Iran If Uranium Enrichment Stops (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

The Bush administration offered for the first time yesterday to join European talks with Iran over its nuclear program, but only if the Iranian government suspends efforts to enrich uranium and reprocess spent nuclear fuel, which the administration calls part of a covert attempt to make bombs.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the U.S. policy shift at a State Department news conference, warning that if the Iranian government chooses not to negotiate and to continue pursuing its nuclear ambitions, "it will incur only great costs."

"We urge Iran to make this choice for peace, to abandon its ambition for nuclear weapons," Rice said. Refusing to do so, she added, "will lead to international isolation and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions."

A senior administration official said there is substantial agreement from Russia and China -- two nations that have resisted sanctions against Iran -- on an escalating series of U.N. penalties that would be imposed if Iran does not comply. He said negotiators are expected to finalize a package that includes potential sanctions for noncompliance, as well as benefits if Iran accepts a deal being crafted by several nations during a meeting in Vienna today. Rice left for the meeting shortly after her announcement.

The Bush administration previously refused to engage in direct talks with Iran on its nuclear program, preferring to let three European Union nations -- Britain, France and Germany, known as the E.U.-3 -- conduct negotiations. But Germany lately has increasingly urged Washington to deal with Tehran directly, as have a growing roster of foreign policy experts and at least two U.S. senators.

"I thought it was important for the United States to take the lead, along with our partners, and that's what you're seeing," President Bush told reporters. "You're seeing robust diplomacy. I believe this problem can be solved diplomatically, and I'm going to give it every effort to do so."

John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, called Javad Zarif, Iran's U.N. ambassador, before Rice's announcement to inform him of the administration's willingness to engage in direct talks. Meanwhile, Rice's remarks also were given to the Swiss ambassador to the United States for transmission to Iran.

Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency seemed to dismiss the offer, saying that the country accepts only proposals that are in its interest, the Associated Press reported. "Halting enrichment definitely doesn't meet such interests," IRNA said. Iranian officials have long insisted that their nuclear program is limited to peaceful purposes.

In extending the offer to enter the nuclear talks, Rice made it clear that the United States would not contemplate restoring diplomatic relations with Iran, which were severed during the 1979 hostage crisis, until the regime made changes, including renouncing its support of terrorist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0031101

Senior Chinese and Russian officials welcomed the U.S. offer of direct talks, saying it showed an increased willingness to pursue diplomatic means to resolve the budding nuclear crisis. Still, Wang Guangya, China's U.N. ambassador, said the United States should provide Iran with security assurances and drop its demand that Iran cease uranium enrichment before such talks could begin.

"I think it in a way proves that the U.S. is more serious about the negotiations than about other options, but I do hope that this offer could be less conditional," Wang told reporters.

Wang said China may be prepared to take a tougher line with Iran if the United States and Europe offer more "attractive carrots" to the Iranians, including security assurances, and a pledge to allow Tehran to pursue a peaceful nuclear energy program, including a small research-and-development project on uranium enrichment.

The United States and key European allies oppose such a project, saying it would provide Tehran with the technical know-how to enrich uranium for a nuclear weapon. Estimates vary, but some experts think Iran could master the expertise needed to produce a nuclear weapon by the end of the year, though U.S. intelligence agencies estimate it would take Tehran a decade to build a bomb.

The shift in U.S. policy came after mounting calls for a dialogue with Iran from senior foreign policy experts and lawmakers, notably former secretaries of state Henry A. Kissinger and Madeleine K. Albright and Sens. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.).

The pressure increased in early May when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad wrote a rambling 18-page letter that was dismissed by Bush but seen in much of the world as an invitation for talks with the United States. The letter was followed by back-channel communications making it clear that the Iranians were seeking direct talks.

Administration officials, meanwhile, said they began seriously discussing a plan to enter negotiations with Iran two months ago. Rice, on her way to New York in early May for what turned out to be a contentious meeting on the Iran issue, sketched an outline of a plan on a piece of paper, a senior State Department official said.

Later, a small group -- including officials from the State Department, the White House and the Defense Department -- was assembled to flesh out her ideas. Bush discussed them with British Prime Minister Tony Blair during his visit to Washington last week, and Bush followed that up with phone calls to the leaders of France, Germany and Russia on Tuesday to ensure that they were on board. Rice, meanwhile, discussed the idea with her Chinese counterpart, Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing, before Bush gave final approval to the offer.

Rice and other Bush administration officials said the offer of direct negotiations would eliminate the argument that the U.S. refusal to deal directly with Iran on the nuclear issue was the impediment to resolving the impasse.

"This is the last excuse in some sense," she said. "There have been those who have said, 'Well, if only the negotiations had the potential for the United States to be a part of them, perhaps then Iran would respond.' So now we have a pretty clear path."

Oil Falls Amid U.S. Offer Of Iran Talks (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

Oil prices ended moderately lower yesterday after a selloff on hopes of a diplomatic solution to the Iran nuclear standoff.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a major policy shift, said Washington was ready to join multinational talks with Tehran if Iran suspends all disputed nuclear activities.

The nearby July crude contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange settled 74 cents lower at $71.29 a barrel after falling as low as $70.05.

In the past, Iran has offered to suspend its controversial nuclear-enrichment program to find a way out of the crisis, and the surprise U.S. diplomatic overture triggered a knee-jerk selloff in oil futures.

At a news conference yesterday, Ms. Rice said the U.S. was prepared to join a united international front in an attempt to persuade Iran to abandon any ambitions it may have of building nuclear weapons.

"It is an opportunity for the world to clarify Iran's intentions, and it is an opportunity for Iran to make its intentions clear," she said.

While there was no immediate official reaction from the Iranian government, the Islamic Republic's official news agency dismissed the overture as a U.S. "propaganda initiative."

Asserting that Ms. Rice has broached the subject, the Islamic Republic News Agency wrote: "Of course, the Islamic Republic of Iran will only accept proposals and conditions that take into account the interests of the people and the nation [of Iran]. Suspending enrichment absolutely will not safeguard these interests."

DOJ_NMG_0031102

The unofficial dismissal "called the whole thing into question" and led traders to buy back previously sold positions late in the session, said Tom Bentz, an analyst at BNP Paribas Futures in New York. "To be honest, why anyone believed that the Iranians would respond positively is the question."

Bill O'Grady, an analyst at A.G. Edwards in St. Louis, said if Iran formally rejects the U.S. offer of talks, oil prices could climb to new highs.

"Then the odds of something happening start to accelerate," Mr. O'Grady said. On the other hand, Iranian acceptance would mean more losses for oil, with crude prices potentially dropping into the mid- to low-$60s, he added.

In other commodity markets:

CBOT: The Chicago Board of Trade will raise fees for trade-clearing and certain other transactions, moves that will increase the average amount of revenue generated for each contract traded at the exchange. Effective July 1, the fee for clearing all trades will be six cents a contract, up from five cents. CBOT, a unit of CBOT Holdings Inc., will raise fees for so-called off-exchange transactions and for electronic trading of agricultural products.

COPPER: Futures on the Comex division of the Nymex fell on month-end long liquidation and general weakness in commodities. July copper fell five cents to $3.624 a pound.

Oil Prices Cool Off After U.S. Softens Stance On Iran (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Oil prices fell for the first time in a week Wednesday as gasoline prices continued to decline.

Oil prices fell 74 cents, or 1%, to $71.29 a barrel in trading in New York after the Bush administration said it would participate in talks with Iran about its nuclear ambitions if the country halts its effort to produce nuclear fuel.

Worries about a potential showdown between Iran and other nations about Iran's nuclear program have bolstered oil prices for weeks. Although the USA does not import oil from Iran, OPEC's second-largest producer, there is concern that should sanctions be imposed on that country, there would be less oil on the world market.

The decline in oil prices following the White House's announcement reinforces the idea that the lofty prices, which recently hit a record high, are not supported by basic supply and demand fundamentals, says Rakesh Shankar, senior economist at Moody's Economy.com.

“We see at least $5 to $6 in pure speculative premium,” Shankar says. “It's a house of cards that any breath of wind will tumble.”

Although the decline Wednesday was the first in a week, prices earlier in the session were down by as much as $2 a barrel.

The fact that investors erased some of those losses suggests they question if Iran will follow through, Alaron Trading analyst Phil Flynn says.

“People are skeptical that these talks are actually going to happen,” Flynn says.

He predicts oil prices will continue to rise to a new record of $78 a barrel by midsummer, based on strong global demand and on concerns during hurricane season about the potential impact on U.S. energy supplies.

“Oil prices are going to stay strong and go up,” Flynn says.

Oil is a key element in a number of industries and accounts for half of the cost of gasoline at the pump.

The U.S. average price for a gallon of gasoline fell for the second-consecutive week this week, the Energy Department said Wednesday.

The nationwide average price was $2.87 Monday, down 3 cents from a week ago, but still up 77 cents from a year ago. Prices recently peaked at $2.95 a gallon May 15, according to the government's weekly report.

Prices remained above $3 a gallon in several cities, such as Los Angeles, New York, San Francisco and Seattle, this week.

Large drops in prices at the pump are unlikely, says Fred Rozell, retail pricing director at Oil Price Information Service, which tracks gasoline prices. That's because the memory of the reduction in gasoline supplies and the quick run-up in prices to record levels following last year's hurricanes is too fresh. Weather forecasters have predicted another active hurricane season, which begins today.

“There's still that fear,” Rozell says. “Any time the wind picks up and threatens to blow anywhere near the refining sector, prices are going to go nuts.”

Iranian Hard-liners In Fix As U.S. Offers To Join Talks (WT)

By David R. Sands

DOJ_NMG_0031103

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

Iranian hard-liners, led by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, faced a dilemma of their own after yesterday's announcement by the Bush administration that it was ready to join talks over Iran's suspected nuclear programs.

The U.S. policy shift "will be seen as a victory for the tough line of the government," said A. William Samii, an Iranian political analyst for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, "but it's a tricky question of how best to respond."

Ordinary Iranians are increasingly weary of the confrontation with the West over the nuclear programs, Mr. Samii said, but have been told repeatedly by the country's conservative Islamic leaders that developing a nuclear capability is a matter of national honor and security.

If Washington's presence in the talks produces a deal to suspend or terminate Iran's nuclear programs, "there will be a lot of questions for the Iranian government," Mr. Samii said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, briefing reporters yesterday, said bluntly that one motivation behind the U.S. decision was to test Tehran's sincerity.

"It's time to know whether Iran is serious about negotiations or not," she said.

Iranian nuclear negotiators, backed by supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, have rejected in recent months any suggestion that they suspend uranium enrichment while the talks proceed. Mr. Bush and Miss Rice said such a suspension was a precondition for U.S. participation in the talks.

In the first official reaction to the U.S. offer, Iran's state-run news service called the proposal a "propaganda move."

"It's evident that the Islamic Republic of Iran only accepts proposals and conditions that meet the interests of the nation and the country," the Islamic Republic News Agency said last night. "Halting enrichment definitely does not meet such interests."

But Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council and an Iranian foreign policy scholar at Johns Hopkins University's Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, cautioned, "You should never take Iran's first reaction too seriously."

Mr. Parsi praised the U.S. move but said the demand for a halt to uranium enrichment could tempt Tehran to put forward its own preconditions for talks.

However, the prospect of active U.S. participation in the talks could widen the differences within the Iranian regime over negotiating tactics and strategy, he added.

"When there was no credible offer on the table, the international pressure only united the different factions in the government," he said. "That could change now."

The uranium enrichment program remains a sensitive topic in Tehran. The Supreme National Security Council, the top security agency, has forbidden debate on the subject in the national press.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, a little-known figure before his surprise election in mid-2005, has carved out a major role in foreign policy in part by strongly backing the nuclear program. Ayatollah Khamenei, still the final arbiter of policy in Iran's fractured political system, has backed the president's uncompromising stand.

The supreme leader said earlier this week that "any retreat" on the nuclear issue would be a "100 percent loss."

But other prominent figures, including former President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and former top security aide Hassan Rowhani, have publicly expressed doubts about the regime's hard line in talks with France, Britain and Germany.

Iran insists its nuclear programs are for peaceful civilian use and says it has a right to such programs under international treaties.

Mr. Ahmadinejad and his allies have grown bolder in recent days, Iranian analysts say, reflecting what they say are increasing troubles Washington faces on other fronts.

Foreign Minister Manuchehr Mottaki, on a visit to Malaysia this week, said the United States could not afford to "create a new crisis" in the region because of the difficult situations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Jaw-Jaw Before War-War? (WSJ)

By Robert D. Blackwill

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

The Bush administration's announcement that it will join the EU-3 negotiations with Iran -- if Tehran suspends, verifiably, its enrichment and reprocessing activities -- will be seen as good news by many. With this new initiative, the American-led attempt to stop diplomatically Iran's nuclear weapons program will likely last for at least several more months. Perhaps Iran will eventually accede, either because of the threat or imposition of sanctions against it, or in the face of the united will of the international community.

We may hope the outcome is peaceful. But how probable is it? Vegas might give 3-1 odds against -- or longer. The Europeans have tried for two years to find a compromise with Tehran, without progress. Despite nearly unanimous condemnation by the international community, the regime appears determined to acquire nuclear weapons capability, and to replace the U.S. as the dominant power in the Persian Gulf area.

The essential problem here is not administration policy, the shape of the table, or who is sitting around it. Iran's nuclear policies are causing this crisis and Tehran has been left in no doubt about how to end it -- stop trying to create a nuclear arsenal. Nevertheless, if negotiations with Tehran fail, the case against using U.S. military force to set back Iran's nuclear weapons program is impressive.

Iran would retaliate strongly in Iraq, in Afghanistan and perhaps against the U.S. homeland. The effect in the Muslim world could be volcanic. Terror against America would increase. Islam could be further radicalized. Oil prices would skyrocket with damaging effects on the international economy, even if Iran did not interrupt its supply. The people of Iran would probably fall in behind the mullahs.

Global public opinion would further shift against the U.S. The Bush administration's resulting prolonged fixation on Iran could facilitate the rise of Chinese power and give North Korea more room to maneuver. Moreover, how accurate would U.S. intelligence and targeting information be? For what period would an air campaign have to last to be effective? If Iran subsequently began rebuilding its nuclear infrastructure, how long would it be before the U.S. might have to attack again?

For many, these arguments rule out military force. Former National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski has argued that, "if undertaken without the sanction of the U.N. Security Council either alone by the U.S. or in complicity with Israel, it would stamp the perpetrator(s) as an international outlaw(s)." Since it is difficult to imagine any circumstance in which the Security Council would endorse U.S. military action against Iran, this would seem to take the military option off the table for the likes of Mr. Brzezinski.

If diplomacy does not succeed, he suggests a policy of deterrence, which, he explains, "has worked in U.S.-Soviet relations, in U.S.-Chinese relations, and in Indo-Pak relations." But deterrence in the situations he mentions was focused on avoiding nuclear use. It did not prevent Pakistan from conducting more than a decade of cross-border terrorism in the course of which 40,000 innocent Indians were murdered. Would nuclear deterrence weaken Iran's ambition to become the hegemonic state in the Persian Gulf region? Would it end Iran's state support for international terrorist organizations? Would it lessen this Iranian regime's oft-repeated objective to eradicate Israel?

In fact, it would likely be the U.S. that would be deterred once Tehran acquired nuclear weapons capability and threatened U.S. national interests. Many argued a decade ago against military action against North Korea's nuclear facilities. Negotiate, they insisted. The PDRK presently produces probably several nuclear weapons a year. Who's sorry now? Henry Kissinger reminds us that bureaucrats and experts instinctively favor delay, equivocation, negotiation and the status quo, "because short of an unambiguous catastrophe the status quo has the advantage of familiarity and it is never possible to prove that another course would yield superior results."

The use of American military force against Iran's nuclear infrastructure would obviously carry great risk. But acquiescing in an Iranian nuclear weapons capability would be deeply dangerous for the U.S. and likeminded democracies for decades to come. It would be regarded by the entire world, friend and foe alike, as a strategic defeat for the U.S., and produce a major shift toward Iran in the balance of power in the Greater Middle East.

Iran would be emboldened to further endanger American vital national interests world-wide. Terrorist organizations everywhere would be given a major lift, some through direct support from Tehran. Israel's very existence would be called into question. And the nonproliferation regime could be dramatically, perhaps fatally, undermined. If Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and other Muslim states followed the Iranian nuclear example, for how long could a nuclear war in be avoided in this violent part of the world? John McCain sums it up: "In the end, there is only one thing worse than military action, and that is a nuclear-armed Iran."

Given the extraordinary stakes involved, ignoring the military option and hoping that we will somehow be rescued by sanctions, new negotiating mechanisms, or the Iranian mullahs is a serious mistake. We should instead follow Nehru's advice: "Risks and deadlocks when they occur at least have this advantage, that they force us to think." The distinguished French strategist Thérèse Delpech has been doing precisely that and warns, "The Iranian nuclear programme is progressing more rapidly than anticipated . . . and Tehran shows it has learned from Pyongyang that brinksmanship brings rewards." We may not have years to debate these historic policy choices. We should do so now before the gathering storm with Iran arrives with full force.

Rice Makes The Right Move On Iran (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0031105

The Los Angeles Times, June 1, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH HAS MADE A U-TURN on Iran — and not a moment too soon. Just as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was about to get on a plane to Vienna for talks on Iran, she announced a courageous and historic about-face that offers hope of ending the hostility that has marked U.S. relations with Iran since 1979.

That said, the chances of negotiating a verifiable, permanent end to Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program are slim. Iran's anti-Semitic, nationalistic president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, appears determined to produce nuclear weapons. But even if negotiations founder or fail, Bush's overture to Iran is as shrewd as it is welcome. Blame will rightly fall on Tehran if it fails to seize this opportunity.

Tehran's blustery initial response, dismissing the offer for talks as U.S. "propaganda," only shows how completely Bush's gambit caught the Iranians off guard. Several aspects of Wednesday's announcement indicate that the administration has done some serious thinking, and rethinking, on Iran.

First, despite Iran's history of mendacity with its nuclear program, Rice made a point Wednesday to acknowledge — twice — Iran's right to a civilian nuclear energy program. It was a necessary concession to Iran's pride in its program and to the fact that the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty allows for it.

Second, in a concession to both Iran and Europe, Rice said the U.S. would "actively support" greater European economic cooperation with Iran. This reverses decades of U.S. attempts to wreak economic pain on Iran. It also offers hope that China and Russia, which have strong economic ties to Iran and have opposed U.S. efforts to exert pressure on Iran at the U.N., may be more likely to support U.S. efforts.

Third, Rice demanded as a condition for talks that Iran "fully and verifiably suspends its enrichment and reprocessing activities."

That may sound tough, but it's actually a face-saving gesture. Tehran can agree to a temporary suspension — as it has previously done during negotiations with the Europeans — without backing off its position that it will resume enrichment any time it pleases. And the White House can tell the Iran bashers in Congress that its willingness to negotiate has had tangible rewards.

More broadly, Bush's move indicates a late-blooming maturity in foreign relations. A president frequently chided for refusing to admit error has not only changed his mind, he has reexamined one of the core principles of his foreign policy. Even before his inauguration, Bush's most senior advisors were adamant that the way to deal with "rogue regimes" was to freeze them out. And Iran was famously included in the "axis of evil" that Bush identified in 2002.

Iran is no less dangerous today than it was four years ago. And its near-immediate dismissal of this overture is not encouraging. Yet Rice arrives in Vienna not only with a new proposal but a new approach. That change may be the more important one and, in the end, the more consequential.

A Smart Approach To Iran (WP)

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

THE BUSH administration's offer yesterday to join negotiations with Iran was well tailored. By stating its readiness to join the European governments that have been negotiating with Tehran for several years, the administration may have defused an issue that was impeding its effort to win support for U.N. sanctions against Iran. Its concession was merely to acknowledge the reality that any enduring settlement of the Iranian nuclear threat will require direct U.S. participation. Yet the administration rightly insisted that Iran first suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing before any talks including the United States begin, and it linked its offer to a carrot-and-stick package of incentives and sanctions that would be presented to Iran in the coming days with the support of the Europeans and, possibly, China and Russia.

The packaging means that Iran won't achieve the symbolic breakthrough of talks with the United States -- something its regime and public deeply desire -- unless it suspends its nuclear work. If Iran rejects the offer, which will also include economic incentives, the result should be the passage of a Security Council resolution opening the way to sanctions. Crucially, European governments, and possibly Russia and China, will agree on the sanctions to be imposed even before the offer is made.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice still needs to firm up this elaborate piece of multilateral diplomacy in a meeting with the permanent Security Council members and Germany in Vienna today. There are some weak points: The Security Council resolution won't be voted on unless Iran rejects the offer, and there is no deadline for Tehran's response. Yet if Ms. Rice succeeds, Iran may well be presented with the "clear choice" she described yesterday between improved international relations and a relatively painful isolation.

That doesn't mean the Bush administration is anywhere near ending the threat from Iran. Most likely, the regime will try to dodge the choice it will be presented or reject it altogether. It will look for support to actors such as Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, who has publicly undercut the decisions of his own board and the Security Council by proposing that Iran be allowed to continue uranium reprocessing. Tehran also will count on the Bush administration's critics in Europe and Washington to decry the offer to negotiate as unworthy and to insist that the United States offer Iran unconditional bilateral negotiations on all issues.

Ms. Rice made it clear yesterday that no such "grand bargain" is on the table. Were the Bush administration to propose such a scheme, Iran would surely pocket the concession of de facto U.S. recognition while continuing to pursue its nuclear program. Fragile European support for sanctions would quickly give way to pressure on Washington to offer Tehran greater and greater concessions. If, on the other hand, Iran accepts the coming offer, it's possible that Iranian-U.S. talks could evolve into a larger discussion of security issues -- Iraq, Lebanon, global terrorism -- that would benefit both countries, though it's hard to imagine that happening under Iran's current government. For now, the administration has rightly put the focus on forcing Tehran -- not Washington -- to make a choice.

Condi's Iran Gambit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

When Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad publicly released a long, insulting letter seeking direct talks with the U.S. last month, President Bush dismissed it as unworthy of reply. But yesterday Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice delivered the real U.S. answer: Yes.

In a surprising policy reversal, Ms. Rice offered to negotiate directly with Iran's mullahs if they first suspend all uranium enrichment and cooperate with United Nations arms inspectors. The Secretary of State seems to have convinced Mr. Bush -- over the doubts of Vice President Cheney and others -- that this was the only way to prevent the U.S. from being isolated as our European allies ran for cover and Russia resisted any U.N. sanctions. How this new U.S. concession will impress the mullahs to give in is now Ms. Rice's burden to demonstrate. Good luck.

Granted, the offer has one big virtue: ending the three-year pretense that the so-called EU-3 -- Britain, France and Germany -- had any chance of ending Iran's nuclear ambitions. Time and again the not-so-big three had threatened "consequences" if Iran continued to enrich uranium, only to back down and force more concessions -- from Washington. The mullahs always wanted to talk directly to the U.S. for the implicit recognition such talks would convey, and now they have their wish.

In theory, Condi's gambit could help to expose Iran's real intentions should it refuse to negotiate seriously. In theory, too, a determined U.S. could use the direct talks to insist that Tehran undertake a Libyan-like dismantling of its nuclear facilities, complete with random and intrusive inspections. But yesterday's proposal demands nothing so comprehensive, and the potential sanctions supposedly on the table are still opposed by Russia and China. The ultimate sanction of military force isn't even hinted at, much less on the table.

Given the concessions he has already won by refusing to cooperate, Mr. Ahmadinejad won't be in any hurry to oblige now. Already yesterday, Iran was pocketing the direct-talks and demanding that any negotiation be "without pre-conditions." This was entirely predictable, and you can bet this new Iranian demand will soon be echoed in Paris, Moscow and all too many precincts in Washington.

It was good to hear Presidential spokesman Tony Snow yesterday describe that enrichment pre-condition as the "foundation stone" of the new U.S. proposal. But will Ms. Rice and her main ally in this windmill tilt -- Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns -- soon be pressing Mr. Bush to make this concession too?

It's not as if Iran has met anybody even halfway on concerns about its nuclear program. The U.N. Security Council has already asked Iran to suspend uranium enrichment. But Iran's response to April's deadline was to announce it had enriched reactor grade uranium and is developing advanced centrifuges to do more -- perhaps as many as 3,000 by the end of this year.

Meanwhile, President Ahmadinejad continues to deny that the Holocaust ever happened, threatens to erase Israel from the face of the earth, taunts Mr. Bush about the coming collapse of democracy world-wide, abets the killing of Americans in Iraq, supports terror in Lebanon and elsewhere, and talks more generally about a coming conflict in which much of humanity will perish. We suppose it would serve Mr. Burns right if he has to negotiate with this zealot, except that the entire State Department seems almost as zealous in its pursuit of any kind of deal.

We'd like to think better, but one thing we didn't hear yesterday from Ms. Rice was any timeline for Iran to accept her offer. Tehran will surely attempt to delay as long as possible, giving it time to build more centrifuges and further harden its nuclear facilities. Mr. Burns could soon be talking to an Iranian Le Duc Tho about the shape of the Geneva negotiating table.

Perhaps the most dispiriting part of this new diplomacy is the signal it will send to Iran's internal opposition. The regime is wildly unpopular, but it will use this implicit U.S. recognition to show that it has earned new world respect. It will also demand that the U.S. cease its support for democrats inside the country, and voices in Europe and at State will want to do the same. We hope Mr. Bush has vetoed that kind of appeasement. We hope, too, that he'll continue to put pressure on the mullahs by interdicting Iranian terror financing, and shipping under the Proliferation Security Initiative, where warranted.

DOJ_NMG_0031107

Iran's relentless drive for a nuclear weapon is a difficult problem, and perhaps Ms. Rice is right that direct diplomacy is essential to expose Iran's real purposes. But given Iran's track record, we'd say the Secretary has walked her President out on a limb where the pressure will soon build on him to make even more concessions. If this gambit fails, she'll have succeeded mainly in giving the mullahs more time to become a terrorist nuclear power.

Though Late, Offer To Talk To Iran Will Only Benefit U.S. (USAT)

USA Today, June 1, 2006

Can Iran be persuaded to give up its race for nuclear weapons?

On Wednesday, the Bush administration took a big step to try to do just that. After more than five years of steadfastly rejecting negotiations with Iran — which calls the United States the "Great Satan" — the administration announced it would, after all, sit down at the table, along with three European allies.

There's one precondition: Iran first has to suspend its enrichment of uranium.

The administration's policy turnaround is welcome and badly needed. The question is why it took so long. Whatever happens, the offer of talks strengthens any serious U.S. efforts to halt Iran's nuclear program.

Here's why.

Every significant agreement in recent history — from Cold War weapons reductions to Libya's abandonment of its nuclear program — has involved negotiations involving the United States, the world's superpower.

Talks with Iran, if they occur, might just succeed. That's a long shot, of course, but it would be the best outcome.

The more likely outcome is that Iran either spurns talks or that talks fail. Initial reactions from Tehran on Wednesday were indeed negative; the official Iranian news agency called the U.S. offer "a propaganda move."

If the Iranians refuse to negotiate, the Bush administration will be in a stronger position to orchestrate tough punitive measures, beginning with sanctions. It could not be accused, as it was over Iraq, of not exhausting diplomatic options.

The dangers Iran poses to the United States and the world cannot be overstated. It is a fundamentalist Middle Eastern country that sponsors terrorism. Its volatile president says he wants to destroy Israel.

Iran insists that its nuclear program is for generating power, but it has a history of deceit and hiding nuclear activities from United Nations inspectors. It has toyed with other nations that have tried negotiations.

Why would Iran even consider suspending its nuclear program for a vague offer of talks? Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice laid out the considerable reasons: a supervised nuclear energy program, trade and economic benefits, the possible start of a positive U.S.-Iranian relationship.

To date, the Bush administration has spurned traditional diplomacy at great cost. In the Persian Gulf War of 1991, diplomacy persuaded allies to join in and foot most of the bill. In the current Iraq war, the go-it-alone U.S. approach has had a devastating cost in lives, money and reputation.

This apparent return to more patient diplomacy is a wise, and overdue, shift.

No More Excuses (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

For the past few months, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has seemed so pleased with himself. He's been popping up here and there spouting off about exterminating Israel with the air of a man who thinks he has the world literally over a barrel — who feels himself fully on the offensive and in control.

But that changed yesterday, when Condoleezza Rice announced her willingness to talk with Iran about nukes so long as Iran suspended its enrichment program first. As Robert Kagan of the Carnegie Endowment notes, in a swoop the U.S. has put itself back in front of events. It's taken the initiative away from Ahmadinejad and Vladimir Putin, and it's created a series of problems for Tehran.

What Rice did was set off a chain of events that could lead to a U.N. resolution on Iranian sanctions as early as July. Diplomats, book your New York hotel rooms today.

Yesterday's policy shift really began in late April, as Rice returned from a visit to Baghdad and decided it was time to bring the dispute with Iran to a head. The European Union negotiations were dissolving into disharmony and confusion. There were some indications that Iran was accelerating its nuclear program. It was clear that Iran was winning.

Rice decided to shake things up. What she had to do, to borrow the metaphor of one senior administration official, was to take the cue ball and smash it into all the other balls on the table, and so open up room for future maneuvering.

This in itself was a gutsy maneuver, for in deciding to get so active she was essentially betting her career on her ability to deal with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0031108

Quickly, President Bush and Rice agreed upon a course of action that was neither passivity nor bombing. They decided to accelerate the diplomatic process. They did this with no expectations that Iran would agree to negotiate away its nuclear program. There are no optimists in this administration about the prospects for diplomacy (though there are varying degrees of pessimism).

Instead, Bush and Rice concluded that it was necessary to exhaust diplomatic alternatives, in order to make international sanctions possible later. The U.S. had to remove everybody else's excuses for inaction.

Bush and Rice told their European and Chinese allies they would be willing to talk with Iran so long as it was in a group, so long as the Iranians suspended their enrichment program, so long as the Europeans agreed to really stick by this precondition, and so long as the Europeans, Russians and Chinese agreed in writing to a menu of sanctions to be imposed if talks never got off the ground.

Reaching agreement on all this was no easy task. And there are some who wonder if the U.S. could have persuaded the Europeans to accept even tougher sanctions. The allies have agreed that if diplomacy fails they will jointly separate Iranian banks from the world banking system, and choke off Tehran's access to reserve currencies. But there is no mention of an oil or gas embargo. Dennis Ross, the former Clinton envoy, who supports the administration's course, suggests that Iran will not fundamentally rethink its policy unless it is convinced that the U.S. is so determined to prevent Iran from getting the bomb that it is willing to impose pain on itself.

Still, the accomplishments over the past few weeks have been impressive. Bush and Rice have created a coherent policy. They have organized the Europeans, Russians and Chinese around that policy. They have put Iran on the defensive, and forced the different factions in the regime to argue about what sort of country they wish to become. (Yesterday's public blast from Tehran was anticipated and discounted.)

Even the rollout was masterful. I called experts around the world yesterday afternoon, and all of them seemed to have just gotten off the phone with a senior administration official (or two), and all were positive about what had been achieved.

It's still hard to believe the international community can really get its act together. (Have the U.S. and the Russians and the Chinese really forged an agreement on sanctions, or just fudged their differences?) But this display of competence causes me to remember that over the past several weeks this administration has done a number of things well (the nominations of Michael Hayden and Henry Paulson, to name just two). Maybe there's life in this presidency yet.

Palestinians Hit Home In Sederot (NYT)

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

JERUSALEM, May 31 — A Palestinian rocket slammed into a residential area in southern Israel early Wednesday, hitting a house about 100 yards from the home of Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz.

No one was hurt, but the rocket damaged the house in Sederot, a working-class town that is most often the target of the Palestinian fire from the northern Gaza Strip.

Mr. Peretz said he was awakened by a siren that alerts Sederot residents to incoming rockets. The Israeli military said three rockets had been fired, and the Palestinian faction Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility.

Mr. Peretz visited the damaged house and said the military would "take actions that prevent these organizations from firing toward Sederot and other communities."

Later Wednesday, the Israeli military fired artillery rounds into northern Gaza. No casualties were immediately reported.

US Envoy Urges 'Bold' Egypt Reforms (AFP)

AFP, May 31, 2006

United States ambassador to Egypt Francis J. Ricciardone urged Egypt to pursue "bold" reforms, but insisted that Washington has no interest in drastic changes that could spark chaos.

"Contrary to folklore, we do not, we do not confuse change with chaos. We do support bold but well-managed, wisely-led, purposeful change," Ricciardone told the annual meeting of the American Chamber of Commerce in Egypt.

Washington has spoken out recently against Egypt's strong arm tactics against the opposition, including the jailing of prominent opposition leader Ayman Nur and crackdowns against anti-government demonstrations.

"America supports and encourages not only the Government of Egypt, but also those independent forces and voices of opposition who champion these goals," Ricciardone said.

The US ambassador described as "very harsh" the five-year jail sentence of opposition leader Ayman Nur for fraud in what Egypt insists is a criminal not a political case.

"Even criminal cases that involve politicians, are not entirely criminal. There is a political dimension," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031109

"The man who ran for president and came in second, lost the elections by a great margin, ended up before the courts and got what appears to Americans a very harsh sentence," he said.

"I would have wished that it turned out differently."

Ayman Nur came a distant second in last year's presidential elections which saw Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak win 88 percent of the votes.

Egypt, a leading recipient of US economic and military aid, has received more than 60 billion dollars since 1979, including 34 billion dollars in foreign military financing credits to buy US material and services.

In recent weeks, Egyptian police detained hundreds of pro-reform protesters who had come out to support the judiciary in their call for independence from the executive body.

Bush Offers To Help Catch Rwanda Criminals (AP-Y2)

AP2, May 31, 2006

President Bush called the 1994 genocide of a half-million people in Rwanda "one of the most significant tragedies in modern history" and said the United States would give any help the country wanted to track down those responsible who are still at large.

In an Oval Office meeting Wednesday with President Paul Kagame of Rwanda, Bush also pledged to help repay the country for troops that it has sent to deal with another genocide — a violent conflict raging in Sudan's Darfur region that has left 180,000 people dead and an additional 2 million homeless.

Bush said the money will come from a supplemental spending bill that is being considered by Congress that also includes funding for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan and to aid Hurricane Katrina victims.

"I told the president that sometimes the Congress doesn't move as quickly as I'd like on issues, but I'm confident they'll get the supplemental passed when they come back from their Memorial Day break," Bush said.

Bush credited Kagame with trying to bring reconciliation to his country. He said Kagame offered to help with similar efforts in Iraq.

"But the way I look at the situation is that Rwanda can serve as an example for other societies that are troubled," Bush said.

"To the extent that he wants our help in finding certain perpetuators of crime, we'll be glad to do so," Bush said.

Kagame thanked Bush for U.S. support in sending troops to Darfur, combating HIV/AIDS, supporting private investments and building infrastructure.

Darfur Rebels Refuse To Sign Peace Deal (AP)

By Ali H. Zerdin

AP, June 1, 2006

A Darfur rebel group Wednesday again rejected a peace deal aimed at ending three years of fighting that has killed at least180,000 people and forced more than 2 million flee their homes in Sudan's western region.

The African Union-drafted accord was signed May 5 by the government and main Sudan Liberation Movement, but both a splinter group of the Liberation Movement and the Justice and Equality Movement have resisted international calls to accept the deal.

Khalil Ibrahim, who heads the Justice and Equality Movement, rejected the pact saying it does not provide "a fair share of resources and power" for his group.

Ibrahim spoke after meeting Slovene President Janez Drnovsek, who is seeking to mediate the crisis.

"We want a fair peace agreement," Ibrahim said.

The African Union had called on Ibrahim's group and the other faction to sign on to the deal by Wednesday.

There was no indication on what would occur if they didn't meet that deadline.

Drnovsek called on all sides to continue negotiating. Ibrahim called on the United Nations and the European Union "not to close the door for peace in Darfur."

The Justice and Equality Movement is the smallest of the chief Darfur rebel groups and is linked to Sudan's leading fundamentalist Islamic ideologue Hassan Turabi, while the other rebel groups in the predominantly Muslim region are seen as secular.

Darfur has been torn by violence since rebel groups made up of ethnic Africans rose up against the Arab-led Khartoum government in 2003. The government is accused of responding by unleashing Arab militias known as the Janjaweed who have been blamed for some of the war's worst atrocities. Khartoum denies backing the Janjaweed but has said it will try to rein them in since the deal was signed.

DOJ_NMG_0031110

Ensuring the Janjaweed respect the cease-fire is key to persuading Darfur rebels to comply with the peace deal, but there have been several Janjaweed attacks since then, U.N. officials said.

The AU's 7,200 peacekeepers in Darfur have largely been ineffective in stopping atrocities and re-establishing security, leaving tens of thousands of people in camps, with little food or water.

The Sudanese government had said the peace deal opened the way to a U.N. force for Darfur, but has moved only with reluctance to help the U.N. prepare to get peacekeepeers on the ground.

AU Deadline Passes For Holdout Rebels To Sign Darfur Peace Deal (AFP)

By Lea-Lisa Westerhoff

AFP, May 31, 2006

A midnight African Union deadline for holdout Darfur rebels to agree to a peace deal for the troubled western Sudanese region passed with no new signatories, AU officials said.

Despite intense pressure and threats of sanctions on the two rebel groups that have thus far rejected the pact and signs that dissident factions might sign on at the last minute, AU officials said no such overtures had been made.

At the same time, they said the pan-African body might be willing to accept signatures to the May 5 agreement on Thursday, considering logistical problems would-be signers may have had in meeting the May 31 deadline.

"No one has called to say they will sign but they know how to reach us," a senior AU official told AFP at the bloc's headquarters in Addis Ababa after the 2100 GMT deadline passed. "We'll see what happens (Thursday) morning and consider it."

Noureddine Mezni, a spokesman for the AU Mission in Sudan (AMIS), told AFP in Khartoum that AU commission chief Alpha Oumar Konare Konare would on Thursday "indicate the next steps to be taken."

The holdout groups have refused to sign the accord aimed at ending three years of conflict in Darfur, which has left some 300,000 people dead and 2.4 million homeless.

While the main wing of the region's Sudan Liberation Movement (SLM) did sign the AU-brokered deal, a splinter faction and the Justice and Equality Movement (JEM) have refused, saying it fails to address their concerns.

Shortly before the deadline expired, Mezni said efforts were still underway by southern Sudan ex-rebel chief, now Sudanese First Vice President, Salva Kiir to "persuade those who did not sign" the pact to do so.

A source close to the negotiations said Kiir had received a delegation led by Konare's Sudan envoy, Baba Gana Kingibe, and that he would himself soon host talks between the AU and holdout rebels in the south of the country.

On Wednesday, AU officials in Addis Ababa said a group claiming to represent a JEM splinter faction had arrived there to meet officials just hours before the deadline.

"We have been approached by a certain number of groups who are favorable to the DPA," AU Peace and Security Council commissioner Said Djinnit told reporters, referring to the Darfur Peace Agreement.

Diplomats in the Ethiopian capital said the alleged JEM dissidents were prepared to sign the deal even after a spokesman for the group said it could not agree unless substantial changes were made.

Mezni said AU officials were drawing up a new document that would allow dissident factions and commanders to escape sanctions.

"We are finalising a different document, a mechanism will be put in place to receive the signatures of groups and individuals who have chosen the path of peace," he said.

A source close to the AU said seven field commanders from Abdel Wahid Mohammed al-Nur's holdout SLM faction had arrived in Addis Ababa to join the peace process "and before that many others did the same."

Nur himself has said he will not sign unless Khartoum agrees to pay compensation and give his SLM wing a greater security role and a say in local and federal government.

Officials involved in the peace effort have warned Nur he risks becoming "irrelevant" if he does not sign, but his group's absence from the accord will likely plunge Darfur into further violence.

The SLM founder represents the Fur tribe, Darfur's largest, and has insisted on more concessions from the Sudanese government, which stands accused by Washington of perpetrating genocide in Darfur.

The SLM's other faction, led by Minni Minnawi, is the only group to have signed up to the deal.

The Abuja accord, signed on May 5, provides for a more equitable distribution of power and wealth, the disarming of the pro-government Janjaweed militias and a referendum on the future of Darfur.

Machete-wielding Youths Fight In E. Timor (AP-Y2)

By Anthony Deutsch

DOJ_NMG_0031111

AP2, May 31, 2006

Machete-wielding youths battled in East Timor's capital Wednesday amid burning and looting as more foreign troops bolstered a force struggling to stop the unrest that has destabilized the country.

More than 100,000 residents of Dili have fled their homes to escape the violence, an aid official said.

Australia, which has provided the vast bulk of the more than 2,000 international security forces trying to control the city, suggested that a semi-permanent contingent may be needed to help East Timor restore order.

After a lull in violence Tuesday, street fights broke out in several parts of the smoldering city Wednesday. Roaming bands of youths fired sling shots, threw rocks and hacked rivals with machetes.

Australian forces spent several tense hours on the main airport road trying unsuccessfully to keep the warring parties apart. Some patrols rolled past scenes of violence and arson without intervening.

Australian army medics treated a man who suffered head and back wounds after being attacked with a machete. At least eight people were hospitalized with machete wounds, and three of them were in critical condition, a hospital official said.

More than 100,000 people have fled their homes, said Kym Smithies, a spokeswoman for about 30 private aid groups operating in the country. More than 70,000 were in camps in the capital and another 30,000 had fled the city altogether, she said.

The violence is the worst in East Timor since its bloody break from Indonesia in 1999, which paved the way for full independence in 2002 after years of U.N. administration. It remains one of the world's poorest countries and is dependent on foreign aid.

The fighting was triggered by the dismissal in March of 600 soldiers from the 1,400-member army. Sporadic clashes last week between the disgruntled soldiers and government troops spiraled into open street violence in Dili, and at least 27 people have died.

Much of the antagonism on the streets is between East Timorese from the "east" — perceived to be pro-independence — and those from the "west," believed to be sympathetic to Indonesia.

Australia has 1,300 front-line troops in East Timor and several hundred military personnel supporting them.

New Zealand's contingent of almost 200 troops began arriving in force Wednesday, deploying from military cargo planes carrying packs and rifles.

More than 330 Malaysian troops are in place, and some 120 Portuguese paramilitaries are due by week's end.

President Xanana Gusmao said late Tuesday he had invoked emergency powers and taken over the government's security role to try to end a political deadlock that has contributed to the rampant lawlessness.

Foreign troops appeared to be flexing newly given powers to detain suspects, not just disarm them, and parts of the city appeared calm Wednesday.

Australian troops arrested 10 suspects in one burnt-out neighborhood. Within eyesight of the troops, houses were broken into and set ablaze.

Defense Minister Brendan Nelson suggested that an international security force might be needed to help ensure "the political, financial, legal and social reconstruction of East Timor over the near and longer term." He said Australia could lead such a force.

In Canberra, Australia's military chief, Air Chief Marshal Angus Houston, said he expected the peacekeeping mission to last at least six months.

East Timor's Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri — whom many blame for the crisis — rejected calls for his resignation.

"I will be prime minister until the next election," he told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio.

On Wednesday, 15 major aid donors — including Australia, the United States, the EU, the Asian Development Bank, International Monetary Fund and the World Bank — urged the feuding parties to stop.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said he hoped residents would heed Gusmao's appeal to turn in weapons to the peacekeepers.

"It's really sad and tragic that we have to relive this situation again in East Timor," he said.

Pope Benedict XVI also appealed for an end to the violence in the country, which is predominantly Roman Catholic.

Rebel leader Maj. Alfredo Reinado said the crisis would not end until Alkatiri — whom the rebels accuse of discrimination — is ousted.

"The prime minister should go," Reinado told The Associated Press by telephone from a rebel redoubt in the hills surrounding Dili. "Why doesn't he just leave? Do more people need to be killed?"

ETimor Violence Returns As Rebels Reject Move (AFP-Y2)

By Neil Sands

AFP, May 31, 2006

East Timor's rebel leader rejected an agreement designed to end days of violence in the tiny nation that has forced tens of thousands to flee and demanded the sacking of the embattled prime minister.

As gang violence and arson attacks again broke out across the capital Dili, Major Alfredo Reinado said Wednesday President Xanana Gusmao made a "mistake" by assuming emergency powers but not sacking Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri.

"It's not a solution. He is a criminal and should not be allow to stay as prime minister," Reinado told AFP. "That is the mistake that the president has made."

Reinado spoke from his base outside Dili, where he is holed up with nearly half the 1,400-strong military, who were sacked by Alkatiri after going on strike over alleged discrimination against troops from the west of the nation.

Battles between the renegade troops and the remains of the military spiralled last week into mob violence in the streets, with rival eastern and western gangs fighting and torching homes and shops.

The UN refugee agency said it was setting up an airlift to help about 65,000 people who have fled the fighting.

An emergency team from the office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) in Dili found that the displaced people were in critical need of food, clean water and shelter, the agency said in a statement.

The initial airlift of tents and other supplies from UNHCR stocks in the Middle East is for 30,000 people.

Another 35,000 are thought to have fled to the countryside for safety, the agency added.

As the president and prime minister squabbled over the emergency powers, some here wondered whether Gusmao -- a former guerrilla leader and national hero for leading the nation to independence -- could deliver peace again.

"The first time yes but not now," Elite Pinto told AFP when asked if the president could bring peace to the nation.

On Wednesday, gangs moved towards the airport in the late afternoon where they set fire to a roadside market.

About 30 youths, many with bandanas hiding their faces and using knives, rocks and slingshots, converged on the market near Dili's airport, urged on by a man standing on the back of a motorbike shouting: "Attack, attack."

They torched eight makeshift kiosks and two buildings -- a shop and a house, both of which appeared unoccupied at the time.

International troops arrived in about 10 armoured personnel carriers to disarm the youths and re-open the airport road.

A block of homes and shops in Becora, one of the capital's most dangerous areas, was torched before dawn. Many houses were unoccupied as frightened locals have been spending the nights in shelters.

"They were surprise attacks. When we woke up and came over here we found that our house had been burned," Carlos Soares told AFP as he picked through the remains of his home.

The commander of the international forces called in by the government to last week to quell the unrest, Australian Brigadier Mick Slater, said the situation had improved.

"Things are starting to stabilise," he told reporters.

The international military presence of 2,250 troops from Australia, Malaysia and New Zealand was boosted with the arrival of another 42 New Zealanders, bringing their contingent to full strength of 120. Some 120 Portuguese paramilitaries are due to leave Friday morning for East Timor, a bit later than scheduled to accommodate the opening hours at Dili's airport.

After two days of crisis talks in the capital, the hugely popular Gusmao on Tuesday announced 30 days of emergency rule and the sacking of the defence and interior ministers.

In a statement he said he was "implementing the necessary measures to prevent the violence and avoid further fatalities" as well as for the "rapid re-establishment of public order".

Reinado would not comment on whether the rebels were ready to surrender their weapons.

Alkatiri denied that Gusmao had full control of the military, insisting he still commanded wide support, but Foreign Minister Jose Ramos Horta appeared to contradict him.

"Any decision on security and defence matters will be made by President Gusmao in cooperation with the Australian force commander," Horta told Australian radio.

He said the government still needed "significant change" to stop the unrest and indicated a cabinet reshuffle could be expected in the next few days.

U.S., Vietnam Seal Pact, Lift WTO Obstacle (WT)

By Jeffrey Sparshott

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

The U.S. yesterday signed off on an agreement that will allow Vietnam into the World Trade Organization.

The pact removes one of the last hurdles barring the communist nation from joining the world's capitalist club.

"This truly is an historic step in the relationship between our two countries," Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia said in Ho Chi Minh City.

DOJ_NMG_0031113

The U.S. evacuated the city, then known as Saigon, in 1975 at the end of a war that cost more than 58,000 American lives. The countries have since slowly rebuilt political and economic ties, and are poised to permanently normalize trade relations.

Congress still must vote on WTO membership for Vietnam. The Bush administration hopes that will happen this summer.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, Maryland Democrat and a party leader on trade issues, said both parties are likely to have concerns about Vietnam's human rights record as well as its export of manufactured goods such as textiles.

"But there is broad support among Democrats and Republicans to support Vietnam's admission into the WTO," he said.

U.S. business groups widely favor WTO membership for Vietnam as a way to open the country's market and to ensure it plays by global trade rules. But apparel and textile manufacturers oppose the pact.

The deal lifts barriers to bilateral trade, opening opportunities for U.S. companies but also eliminating quotas that capped Vietnam's fast-growing exports of clothing and fabric to the U.S.

"This deal is a disaster for U.S. manufacturing, and the U.S. textile industry in particular," said Auggie Tantillo, executive director of the American Manufacturing Trade Action Coalition.

Mr. Bhatia dismissed textile and apparel concerns during a May 22 briefing in Washington, saying the pact included safeguards to protect the industry.

Apparel is the top U.S. import from Vietnam, valued at $2.9 billion last year -- 55 times greater than it was in 2000. Furniture, footwear, coffee and seafood -- mostly shrimp and catfish -- are other major imports. Aircraft, worth $346 million, was the major U.S. export to Vietnam. The U.S. ran a $5.4 billion trade deficit with Vietnam last year.

Congress in 2002 voted 338-91 to allow President Bush to temporarily normalize trade relations with Vietnam. Mr. Bush has since renewed that status each year.

The country is denied permanent normal trade relations under a 1974 law that links trade to freedom of emigration.

Vietnam also must settle details of its membership with a WTO committee, likely postponing formal membership to at least until the fall.

Countries aspiring to join the WTO must reach terms with each of the body's 149 members, though the biggest economies -- including the U.S. and the 25-nation European Union -- typically set the most rigorous terms.

The U.S. was the last major economy to sign off on Vietnam's accession, a capstone to normalization of relations between the countries.

Vietnam began to reform its economy in the mid-1980s and steadily repaired ties with the U.S. through the 1990s. Congress approved a bilateral trade agreement in 2001.

Bolivia President Morales Says U.S. Seeks To Kill Him (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Jeb Blount

Bloomberg, June 1, 2006

May 31 (Bloomberg) -- Bolivian President Evo Morales said the U.S. organized teams to track down and kill him, according to a note published on the Bolivian presidential Web site.

Morales, speaking at the opening of a hospital that was built with help from Cuba in the town of Escoma, Bolivia, said he recently found out about the plots against him, the state newswire ABI said in the report on the presidential Web site.

The allegations are unfounded, U.S. Embassy in La Paz said in a statement sent to journalists by E-mail. Calls to the Bolivian presidential palace requesting comment were not returned.

For Venezuela, A Treasure In Oil Sludge (NYT)

By Juan Forero

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

PUERTO LA CRUZ, Venezuela — The sludge in the glass jar on David Nelson's bookshelf here is thicker than molasses and was once thought worthless. But the Chevron Corporation, whose operations he runs in eastern Venezuela, has spent about $1 billion turning what was once called liquid coal into oil, helping transform a swath of scrub grass into a great frontier for oil production.

The region, the Orinoco Belt, is in fact so promising that President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela says it contains up to 235 billion barrels of recoverable oil; if true, the reserves would rival those of Saudi Arabia.

"We do know that the Orinoco is underdeveloped," said Mr. Nelson, 49, a geologist from California with 27 years' experience developing heavy-grade oil. "And the resources in the Middle East are at their midpoint."

This great, largely untapped treasure is pitting a leftist government aiming to use oil revenue for social programs against multinational corporations like Chevron, which were invited here a decade ago to develop the Orinoco Belt, a 54-square-mile area some 120 miles south of here.

DOJ_NMG_0031114

With demand rising, worldwide supplies threatening to decline and oil prices near record levels, the struggle in this country underscores the growing debate between governments and oil companies worldwide over profits from technologically challenging but potentially lucrative oil fields — whether in the Caspian Sea, the Arctic tundra or here in the Orinoco region.

Venezuela will be the host for an OPEC meeting on June 1, where Mr. Chávez can be expected to emphasize his country's vast potential. It clearly has a lot to gain from the Orinoco, where daily oil production has slid to 2.6 million barrels, from 3.3 million barrels five years ago. To underline the region's potential, President Chávez has asked oil companies from as far away as China and Russia to certify the size of the hefty reserves.

Saudi Arabia, still the giant among world oil suppliers and the leading force in OPEC consultations, scoffs at such boasts.

Yet, what is under the ground here in Venezuela, the Western Hemisphere's largest oil-exporting nation, has become so valuable that companies throughout the world want to drill for more, and Mr. Chávez, who regards his government as revolutionary, wants it to have a larger slice of the earnings.

In Venezuela, foreign companies including Exxon Mobil, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, BP and Total of France could lose once-favorable terms and in essence be forced to transfer up to $8 billion in value to the government, just as some opportunities elsewhere are drying up.

The big oil companies are right to be rattled. In April, Mr. Chávez's populist government took control of 32 mostly marginal oil fields across Venezuela that had been managed by foreign concerns. Then on May 16, the National Assembly raised royalties on the four heavy crude oil projects of the Orinoco to 33.3 percent, from 16.6 percent, and is planning to increase taxes to 50 percent, from 34 percent.

The government says it is preparing to capture a bigger stake in the Orinoco — turning control of projects that produce 600,000 barrels a day over to Venezuela's state oil company, Petróleos de Venezuela. Energy officials say the government could take up to 60 percent control of the so-called strategic associations, as the projects are called. No timetable has been laid out, but leaders in the National Assembly, which is controlled by Mr. Chávez's forces, say it is only a matter of time.

"With the high price of petroleum on the market, we are going to share in the excess earnings of the strategic associations," Mario Isea, president of the assembly's hydrocarbons commission, which is allied with Mr. Chávez, said in an interview. "They have gone years without paying royalties and effectively paying commercial taxes instead of petroleum taxes."

In the mid-1990's, President Rafael Caldera's government, eager to develop oil discovered in the 1930's, opened the region to foreign investment because the state oil company had neither the capital nor the technology to develop the Orinoco's semisolid sludge. Oil prices were low, world supplies easily met demand and Venezuela had on its hands a crude oil so heavy, so filled with impurities, that it was not even known as oil, but rather bitumen.

But then, given a virtual tax holiday intended to stimulate investment — the royalty rate was 1 percent — the multinationals embarked on a process of drilling and, more recently, upgrades that permit refining Orinoco crude oil into a lighter, marketable product.

In the Hamaca field, an area the size of Houston that produces oil for Chevron, ConocoPhillips and the Venezuelan state company, oil now slurps through an octopus-like system of horizontal wells that reach out as far as 8,000 feet.

The drill bits are equipped with sensors that emit seismic signals measuring what they are passing through — whether rock, sandstone, fine shale, sand or clay.

"Obviously, we'd love to find deposits with sweet light crude in shallow fields," said Mr. Nelson, who carefully explains the complex challenges his company faces. "That's not where energy resources are, so we have to adapt."

Back in a control room near his office in this Caribbean port, geologists and engineers monitor wall-size screens and make quick decisions whether the drill needs to bore ahead, or move up or down.

The idea is to have the drill moving fast, at hundreds of feet an hour, into blue-shaded patches, which signal porous material that would contain crude oil.

"Our goal is to first find sand and once we find it, stay in it," said Mike Waite, a senior geophysicist who leads the team monitoring the drilling.

Just west of here, gunk from the Orinoco is turned into oil at the Jose Industrial Complex, a virtual city of pipes, water-treatment lagoons, smokestacks, pits and storage tanks. Since the first shipment of Hamaca oil left aboard the tanker Overseas Sophie two years ago, the project has produced an average of 180,000 barrels a day.

Mr. Nelson said the project, among the most intricate in the world, is worth it, "but you have to put some elbow grease into it."

"These projects are big," he said. "They're complicated. They have a lot of moving parts. You have a lot of complicated negotiations with governments. It's not a business of instant gratification."

DOJ_NMG_0031115

All told, according to a recent Deutsche Bank report on the Orinoco projects, $17 billion has been invested, about $3.5 billion in the Hamaca project alone. Big energy companies, including some from Brazil and China, would like nothing more than free rein to ramp up investments and produce more.

Ali Moshiri, Chevron's Latin America exploration and production group chief, said in April that Venezuela needed $200 billion to develop the heavy oil reserves.

"There's a sense of urgency, not a sense of luxury," said Mr. Moshiri, who predicted that 90 percent of Venezuela's production would come from the Orinoco in the years ahead.

The government, to be sure, talks of increasing production to 5.8 million barrels a day by 2012, from 2.6 million barrels now. But Venezuela, which as a leading voice in the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries has advocated a particularly tough form of oil nationalism, wants to achieve this on its own terms.

Its energy minister, Rafael Ramírez, who is also the president of Petróleos de Venezuela, said in an interview that the deals that multinational companies signed with the government in the 1990's were "absurd," giving Venezuela little in return.

"They are beholden to their stockholders, and we are beholden to our country," Mr. Ramírez said.

Venezuelan officials contend that exploration and production in the Orinoco has become easy, even risk-free, with a barrel of oil costing less than $1 to produce, down from $2 in 1995.

Energy officials here assert that the multinationals exaggerated the technical challenges and costs, swindling the state.

They also argue that the companies have made extraordinary profits — and will continue to do so even with higher taxes and royalties.

"They have made a fortune," said Mr. Isea, the president of the hydrocarbons commission. "This remains an excellent business. I do not think anyone will leave."

Venezuelan officials say their measures are enshrined in a 2001 law that says the state oil company must have a 51 percent stake in projects; they sidestep questions about previous contracts being grandfathered in.

Mr. Ramírez and lawmakers also say that a 1945 hydrocarbons law permits the government to raise royalties when the price of oil goes up.

The foreign companies, trying to avoid controversy, do not publicly dispute the Venezuelan government's statements. But Larry Goldstein, president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation, an industry-supported analysis group in New York, said: "In Venezuela today, I don't believe contracts have meaning. And it affects the production, no matter what the Venezuelans say."

The game of oil brinkmanship continues, with Mr. Ramírez saying that the companies have few options.

"It's no secret for anyone that the big deposits, the giant ones, are finished," he said. "There are no new oil regions that compare to the Orinoco Belt."

The recent Deutsche Bank report agreed, saying that "few are likely to quickly turn their backs on reserves of the order seen in Venezuela."

"They may not like Chávez," the report added. "They may not like his regime. But they also know that he has probably done as much to support high oil prices through his rhetoric and posturing as any individual. This president is no fool. And at the end of the day, you go where the oil is."

Sudan And Angola Wait At Opec's Door (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries is considering enlarging its membership – for the first time in more than 30 years.

Oil ministers arriving in Caracas for a meeting on Thursday were awaiting the report of Nigeria, the group's current president, on invitations of membership to Sudan and Angola. The pair, who are observer members, are two of the world's fastest-growing oil producers. Angola's production is 1.25m barrels a day, having risen almost 80 per cent in the past decade. Sudan produces about 360,000 b/d.

Their membership would boost Opec's share of world oil supply from 41 per cent to 43 per cent. But the move would be likely to anger the US and China as well as almost every big international oil company.

Sudan is China's most important source of foreign oil assets and a rogue nation in US eyes. Angola is the most important new frontier for production and reserves for ExxonMobil and Chevron of the US, and Europe's BP, Total and Eni. Neither the companies, nor the Chinese want to be subject to forced output cuts, which could happen if Angola and Sudan joined Opec.

Khartoum has signalled it would like to join the group, while Luanda has been less enthusiastic. Many within Opec appear keen for the two to join, but cautioned that the process was by no means certain to end with both becoming members.

DOJ_NMG_0031116

Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, Qatar's energy minister, has backed the plan, but said he was awaiting details. "I will support Sudan's membership in Opec. Opec is an organisation for exporting countries, and Sudan is exporting a lot of oil."

Russia and Kazakhstan have in the past decade been the two oil producers thought most likely to join Opec. Neither were invited nor made a formal approach.

Lebanon Seeks Way To Disarm Palestinian Militia Groups (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

NAAMEH, Lebanon, May 28 — The radical Palestinian militiamen operating a checkpoint here south of Beirut seemed to be from another era, vestiges of the bloody civil war in the 1970's and 80's.

But two days after missiles flew from southern Lebanon into northern Israel, prompting Israeli warplanes to pound local camps in the worst cross-border fighting in years, they were also something else: a challenge to the Lebanese government.

Lebanese politicians have begun focusing attention on the Palestinian militias as a critical security issue and have vowed to disarm them.

Palestinian refugees have played various crucial roles in the tangled history of Lebanon. For instance, Palestinian raids on Israel from Lebanese bases in the 1970's drew Israeli fire and episodes of occupation. Palestinian militias took sides in Lebanon's civil war, fighting so strongly that Syria was eventually drawn in as a counterweight, for the start of nearly 30 years of occupation.

The Palestinian militias that persist in Lebanon — and run checkpoints like the one in Naameh — are mostly rogue groups like Fatah Intifada and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command. Both are based in Syria; neither is part of the Palestine Liberation Organization. They are estimated to have fewer than 500 men between them.

But Lebanese officials note that in recent confrontations with the Lebanese Army, their ranks have swelled. The officials accuse Syria of resupplying them with weaponry.

"These are Syrian groups, not Palestinian groups," said the Druse leader Walid Jumblatt, a main leader of the anti-Syrian majority in Parliament. "As long as you have uncontrolled armed groups with the pretext of liberation, Lebanon will not have stability."

In mid-May one group clashed with Lebanese Army soldiers in the Bekaa region, the third incident of its kind in a year.

"The clashes have challenged the government's ability to build a state," said Ghassan Moukheiber, a member of Parliament with the Free Patriotic Movement of Gen. Michel Aoun, which is allied to Hezbollah. "This has become a call on the Lebanese government to define its defense strategy and its policy."

Last month Lebanon's numerous factions, meeting for a national dialogue to settle political issues like the future of President Émile Lahoud and the future of the militias, unanimously agreed that the Palestinian groups should disarm and return to refugee camps. Officials pointed to Hezbollah's participation as a sign that the talk might produce results.

The government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, conscious of the destabilizing potential of the Palestinian groups, has insisted that they be disarmed through negotiations, not force, adding to skepticism that anything will happen. Lebanese groups have yet to agree on a plan for the disarming.

"We don't want to repeat the mistakes of the past," said Khalil Makkawi, a former Lebanese ambassador to the United Nations, who heads the committee negotiating with the groups to disarm.

"We know our history, and we have seen a scenario like this in 1975," he said, referring to the outbreak of the Lebanese civil war. "So we intend to do this peacefully."

Mr. Makkawi's committee began a groundbreaking dialogue with the Palestine Liberation Organization and other Palestinian groups earlier this month to improve conditions in Lebanon's sprawling refugee camps. The refugees there, who now number some 500,000, are not allowed to work in professional fields or own property.

The effort has also included the reopening of the P.L.O.'s office in Beirut after almost 30 years. But so far, Mr. Makkawi said, the effort has been hindered by the inability of the Palestinians to agree on a unified delegation that can negotiate with the government.

Ostensibly, Mr. Makkawi's effort aims to get Palestinians out of militias by opening work opportunities and improving their living conditions.

The most troubling aspect of the violence on Sunday, Mr. Makkawi and other officials say, is that no group took responsibility for the initial rocket barrage into Israel that set off the violence, raising the possibility that the attack was meant more to encourage Israeli reprisal than to strike a blow across the border.

"There are people on our soil undertaking dangerous acts and putting Lebanon in a difficult situation," Mr. Makkawi said. "You've got a really dangerous situation when you have people using Lebanese territory and you don't even know who they are."

DOJ_NMG_0031117

Early Sunday morning, a militant group fired several Katyusha rockets into northern Israel, setting off Israeli airstrikes and an afternoon of bombardments by Israeli forces and Hezbollah guerrillas. The incident was the worst bout of fighting since Israel withdrew from southern Lebanon in 2000.

The Palestinian militant group Islamic Jihad, one of whose leaders was assassinated in southern Lebanon on Friday, vigorously denied a role and dismissed as a hoax a statement of responsibility in its name faxed to news agencies. Hezbollah, which controls the southern border sections of Lebanon, insisted that it had no idea who was responsible for the rocket attack.

But Hezbollah is the primary target of the United Nations resolution on disarming militias and so may have the most to lose if that is done. Mr. Jumblatt and others have accused its leaders of dragging their feet on the issue.

"We have agreed to deal with this issue peacefully," said Ahmad Malli, a member of Hezbollah's political leadership. "But Lebanese will not be pulled into a fight for anyone."

Voters Opt For Change In S. Korea (CSM)

By Donald Kirk

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

SEOUL, SOUTH KOREA - At a crowded bus stop, a young man on an election day holiday from his university talks about why he and most people he knew opposed the party of the left-of-center President Roh Moo-hyun in Wednesday's local elections. "He does nothing," says Park Jin Han. "He talks a lot, but he has no program and no ideas."

The perception of a central government unable to deal with economic problems and weak in the face of North Korean demands lies at the crux of a reaction that guaranteed conservative victories in two-thirds of the races for provincial governorships and mayors of major cities.

For Korea, the reversion to conservatism portends the downfall of a decade of liberal leadership in the next presidential election in December 2007. While the ruling party's efforts at reconciliation with North Korea were not the paramount issue, the sense of forever making concessions to the North was a factor in the voting - and could be among the policies that change if the liberals are ousted next year.

"We are sick of their policies," says a retired economist, after voting for all six conservative candidates on the ballot in his district here. "It is not just the economy or North Korea," he adds. "They are all mingled together. It is everything."

At press time, early returns showed candidates from the Grand National Party (GNP) leading in 13 of 16 key regional posts, including races for mayor of this capital city as well as Pusan, Korea's second city and biggest port. The ruling Uri Party appeared to be leading in only one race.

The GNP leader, Park Geun-hye, helped her party score the decisive victory though not herself a candidate in Wednesday's election. She gained sympathy in the middle of the campaign after a deranged attacker who held Uri Party membership stabbed her with a box-cutter, shouting that he wanted to kill her in the name of "democracy."

Ms. Park is the daughter of President Park Chung Hee, assassinated by his intelligence chief in 1979 after 18 years in power.

Recovering from her wound, Park appeared on election day smiling confidently, clearly a leading contender for her party's presidential nomination. The other conservative contender, Lee Myung Bak, outgoing mayor of Seoul, appeared equally confident, riding a wave of popularity reflecting aggressive building and cleanup programs, notably rehabilitation of a stream running through the center of the capital.

On the issue of North Korea, the GNP favors a firmer line than the Roh government's policy of accommodating Pyongyang - a policy that has caused friction with Washington. North Korean media in recent days have blasted the conservatives, charging Washington with wanting to establish a "puppet regime" in South Korea.

"There's no reason for this government always to be at odds with the United States," says Chang Ki Tak, an office worker. "You have all these leftists in the government who want to destroy relations with Washington, and then send their children to the States."

Indeed, the election results confirm a groundswell of discontent in which Mr. Roh and his top aides are seen as weak and ineffective in ways that might escape the notice of foreigners focused either on a steadily rising gross domestic product or periodic anti-American outbursts.

"The biggest companies get rich, but small and medium enterprise is suffering," says a shopkeeper, Kim Myung Chul. "I know a lot of people are unable to make money. Some are closing down or leaving the country."

Factor in the skyrocketing price of real estate, and middle-class Koreans begin to feel almost dispossessed. Two- and three-bedroom apartments in the fashionable and convenient districts south of the Han River cost at least $2 million or $3 million apiece, leaving young professionals to commute long distances from suburbs where apartments may go for more than $1 million each.

DOJ_NMG_0031118

Exacerbating the financial crunch, thousands of recent graduates are failing to find jobs for which they have trained, creating an alliance of sorts between a disillusioned middle-class and restive youths who need to get careers on track.

"Maybe 1 in 5 graduates get work right after graduation," says Kim Hye Suu, who graduated from a leading university several years ago and earns money teaching English and translating. "Many go on to graduate school when they can't find anything or they travel abroad for a while."

India's Economic Growth Ratchets Up To 9.3% (WSJ)

By Peter Wonacott And P.R. Venkat

The Wall Street Journal, June 1, 2006

NEW DELHI -- India's economy grew 9.3% in the quarter ended March 31 from a year earlier, marking a broad display of momentum on par with China's red-hot growth.

Growth in India's fiscal fourth-quarter -- fueled by surprisingly strong farm production and vibrant consumer spending -- beat the forecasts of most analysts as well as the official estimate.

Based on the buoyant quarterly result, the government's Central Statistical Organization lifted its figure of gross-domestic-product growth in the fiscal year that ended in March to 8.4%, up from an 8.1% estimate.

India's solid recent economic performance has raised the prospect of two Asian giants expanding at double-digit rates, spinning off new jobs and buying more of what the world grows and produces.

But while both China and India are emerging as growth engines for the global economy, commodity markets are showing the strain of their newly developed bulk. Both countries have been importing large amounts of crude oil while China is buying base metals, pushing up prices for these products. The nations' fast growth is likely to mean that high commodity prices won't ease soon.

"Supply and demand conditions are already tight," says Shuchita Mehta, an economist at Standard Chartered Bank in Mumbai.

Both India and China are trying to spur galloping growth to help lift hundreds of millions of residents -- mostly in rural areas -- out of poverty. China's economy grew 9.9% last year, and is expected to expand almost as rapidly in 2006. For his nation, Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has set a goal of double-digit growth within three years.

But in trying to achieve accelerated growth, India's economy in particular faces a number of obstacles. Several industries remain relatively closed, shielding them from foreign competition -- but also fresh capital. India's dilapidated roads, seaports and airports have constricted the transport of goods, depriving needy areas of business activity and new investment.

Yesterday, Finance Minister P. Chidambaram said the Indian government would need to speed up market overhauls and the construction of infrastructure to keep up the current economic pace.

"While 8.4% is satisfactory growth, more reforms are necessary to sustain this growth," Mr. Chidambaram said after the latest economic figures were released. He added that he would be talking with the prime minister about ways to spur lagging sectors, such as mining, which grew only 0.9% in the fiscal year, down sharply from 5.8% the previous year.

India's strong economy is also prompting some worries about the country's current-account deficit. It has widened as more crude oil is imported at rising prices, wracking the country's currency, the rupee. On Wednesday, the rupee hit a two-year low against the dollar.

Mr. Chidambaram said India continues to hold huge foreign-exchange reserves and that its current account deficit was within manageable limits. Previously, he has said high oil prices will underpin inflation but won't hurt growth. The annual inflation rate is currently at about 4.3%, but India's central bank doesn't expect it to rise past 5.5% for the fiscal year that began April 1.

That relatively tame picture has prompted some government officials to play down signs the economy might be growing too fast. "I don't think there is any evidence of overheating," said Planning Commission Deputy Chairman Montek Singh Ahluwalia. "Macroeconomic indicators are in OK shape."

African Graft Stings Donors (CSM)

By Rachel Scheier

The Christian Science Monitor, June 1, 2006

KAMPALA, UGANDA - Uganda - a small, poor country still best known for its infamous former dictator, Idi Amin - isn't used to being first in much. But in the 1990s, it became the first African country to substantially bring down its AIDS rate.

It has since become a darling of international donors, especially in the health sector. So no one was surprised when, in 2003, Uganda became one of the first countries to receive a multimillion-dollar grant from the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis, and Malaria.

DOJ_NMG_0031119

But three years later, the phrase "Global Fund" has become synonymous with graft in Uganda. A government inquiry recently revealed that tens of millions of dollars of the country's Global Fund grants have gone missing, much of it plundered by high-ranking public officials. Through months of hearings, which began in September and concluded just a few weeks ago, a disgusted Ugandan public heard how monies meant for lifesaving AIDS drugs were spent on personal phone bills, lavish "Christmas packages," and fancy four-wheel drive vehicles.

Along with increasing an already high level of cynicism here, the scandal highlights the corrosive nature of corruption in Africa and demonstrates the difficulties donors face in giving recipient governments the autonomy needed to spend aid money efficiently while also making sure the funds are used appropriately.

Problems with Global Fund monies have surfaced recently in other countries as well. Kenya was warned by Fund officials in March to report the whereabouts of $10 million that was unaccounted for or see its grants yanked. Some Fund grants in Nigeria were recently suspended for mismanagement.

Aside from Uganda, graft in connection with Global Fund monies has not been substantiated in any of these countries. Still, the questions raised reflect a growing emphasis in international circles on combating corruption around the world, especially in Africa. A survey quoted by the African Development Bank last month put the cost of graft on the continent at $148 billion per year.

And as the West tries harder than ever before to end poverty in Africa - the Group of Eight industrialized countries (G-8) last year agreed to double aid to the continent to $50 billion annually - the Global Fund scandal in Uganda also calls into question the fashionable idea that all that's needed to promote development in poor countries is more money.

"In hindsight, maybe we were a bit naive," says Victor Bampoe, the Fund's portfolio manager for East Africa. "But I struggle to see how we would have done things differently."

The Global Fund, a Geneva-based public-private partnership set up in 2002, was to be a new transparent, efficient aid model that would avoid the politics and delays that have long hamstrung development efforts. The idea was that the Fund would be strictly a financing mechanism; decisions about how to spend the money would be decided by local players.

"There is increasing recognition that aid has to be more than putting a bunch of white doctors on a plane and telling them to hand out pills," says Bernard Rivers of AIDSPAN, a Global Fund watchdog group. But, he added, "There is a tension between efficiency and accountability."

The Global Fund is the largest single financing agency in the world to combat the three diseases. It has raised more than $5 billion from donor governments and private philanthropies, and funded programs in 131 countries.

By last August, Uganda had already received more than $45 million of the $201 million that was earmarked for the country over the course of two years when a whistle-blower cried foul. After ordering an outside audit, Fund officials suspended Uganda's grants, citing "serious mismanagement." They were restored several months later, after the government commissioned an inquiry. It also agreed to changes in how the money was being disbursed and overseen, starting with the dissolution of the office responsible for doling out the funds, the Project Management Unit, which one Fund official likened to "a piggy bank" for those with the right connections.

Judge James Ogoola, who headed the probe, called it "no less than an audit on our country's moral standing." He found that hundreds of millions of shillings had been spent on "sensitization workshops" and generous "hardship allowances" for everyone from secretaries on up. A number of organizations that received Fund money had no physical addresses, let alone any experience in the health field. Officials in the Ministry of Health also testified that they had "borrowed" Global Fund money to campaign for a referendum to change the constitution to allow President Yoweri Museveni to run for a third term.

Local AIDS groups were particularly outraged when it was revealed in April that some $22,000 had been taken from the Global Fund basket to pay the hospital bills of a former government minister.

"Uganda has received a lot of money for AIDS - probably more than people can imagine in Africa," says Rubaramira Ruranga, a well-known AIDS activist. Mr. Ruranga faulted donors and the Ugandan government for fostering a system that tolerates, if not encourages, corruption. "AIDS in this country has become an industry," he says.

Global Fund officials say that the Ugandan government has cooperated with Geneva to put in better oversight mechanisms, such as hiring an outside company to serve as a "caretaker management firm." They say that, in general, the Fund had tightened "checks and balances" everywhere. "This is an opportunity to dust ourselves off and move forward," says Mr. Bampoe.

Last week, a newly reelected Museveni announced that the three ministers implicated in the scandal would be dropped from his new cabinet. A spokesman said the President was "responding to the public mood." Charles Mubbale, a director of the Ugandan chapter of Transparency International, says it is unlikely the ministers will face any official censure in the end. The Daily Monitor, a local newspaper, called the entire inquiry an "elegant diversion" to placate donors.

Mr. Mubbale says a deeper problem is the pervasive cynicism among Africans that comes from often seeing graft rewarded rather than punished. "The hard-working person who doesn't steal ... they say he's stupid and lazy," says Mubbale. "It's become an attitude of, well, let's just wait our turn."

Quake Upsets The Cradle Of Indonesian Culture (NYT)

By Peter Gelling

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

KASONGAN, Indonesia, May 31 — Behind a painted sign on a sidewalk reading, "This is not an exhibition, it's a disaster," hundreds of traditional ceramic sculptures lie shattered beneath a collapsed roof.

More than half the houses, shops and galleries lining this small street here were destroyed in the earthquake on Saturday and are littered with the broken remains of their owners' livelihoods. The hundreds of artists who live in Kasongan, a village in Bantul, the district hardest hit by the quake, have survived for generations by selling the pottery they make to tourists.

The region affected by the earthquake is part of the ancient kingdom of Yogyakarta, the cradle of Javanese art and culture, making it one of the most popular tourist destinations in Indonesia.

"I'm worried I will have nothing to give to my children now," said Buang, 50, who uses only one name. He has four adult offspring, all of whom worked in the family's shop.

His youngest son, Eno, who will spend Thursday, his 22nd birthday, looking after his injured mother and grandfather, was the only relative to escape the building that was the family's house and shop before it crashed down. In a panic, he followed the faint sounds of his mother's call for help, throwing aside pieces of brick wall. When he finally reached her, her face was bleeding heavily.

"I was scared and confused," Mr. Eno said. "There was so much happening. But all I could think of was reaching my family. My family is my treasure."

Mr. Eno dug everyone out, including his father, pinned beneath a fallen doorway. His cousin, however, who lived down the street, died instantly, with seven other people from this community of a few hundred people.

The Indonesian Social Welfare Ministry said nearly 6,000 people had died in the quake, which also left more than 130,000 homeless.

Mr. Eno's family, and five others, are sleeping in a tent. His mother, Gimah, 50, lies on the floor, recovering from a blow to her head. His grandfather, whose back is injured, is carried several times a day by neighbors to a nearby health clinic for observation.

Ms. Gimah comes from a long line of ceramic artists. She made most of the family's sculptures, while her children operated the store and her husband of more than 30 years supplied the materials.

In minutes on Saturday morning, the quake reduced all the family had worked for to waste.

"We have to start all over, like so many of the families here, from the beginning," Ms. Gimah said. Mr. Eno worried that the lack of tourists would prolong their despair.

In this region, thousands of shops make and sell handicrafts, traditional batik clothing, musical instruments and ceramic sculptures, many of them exported to the United States and Europe.

Performances of ancient Javanese shadow puppetry and gamelan orchestras — Indonesian musical ensembles with wind, string and percussion instruments — are frequent in Yogyakarta. Sophisticated galleries, teeming with collectors and contemporary exhibits, line its southern streets.

In the aftermath of the earthquake, many of these contemporary artists are mobilizing relief and offering their studios as temporary shelters. Others are trying to salvage mangled paintings from ruined workshops.

The Indonesian Art Institute in Yogyakarta, where famous artists regularly lecture and foreign students, many from the United States, come to study Indonesian art, had major structural damage. And 20 of its students died in the quake.

Nindityo Adipurnomo, curator of the internationally famous Cemeti Art House in Yogyakarta, has taken into his gallery nearly 20 neighbors whose houses were flattened. During the day, he drives to Bantul to deliver food and other supplies.

He said that many studios and galleries were damaged but that artists in the Yogyakarta area were trying to continue their work.

"It is important to keep busy, for artists to keep working and to continue displaying their art, it helps us to cope with what has happened," Mr. Adipurnomo said. He has decided to go ahead with an exhibition scheduled for next week in Jakarta.

Ki Timbul Hadiprayitno, a 73-year-old master puppeteer who lost his house, most of his puppets and all of his musical instruments, agreed. He is fully booked through August and has not canceled a single show.

DOJ_NMG_0031121

Shadow puppetry is one of the oldest art forms in Indonesia. Its stories offer a glimpse into the layered philosophies of Javanese spiritualism, which includes elements of Hinduism and Islam. Many of the stories emphasize a philosophy of acceptance, known locally as pasrah.

"We can only just keep going," he said. "Bad luck, good luck, life, death, it is all God's will."

Mr. Hadiprayitno, who started performing in 1946 and regularly performed privately for Suharto, the former president, lives in Tegal Dowo, a village in Bantul that was almost leveled.

He lost three quarters of his finely detailed wooden puppets, some hundreds of years old, which depict everything from old-world kings and queens to monsters and clowns, and his two gamelan orchestras, which consist of several xylophones, hand drums, gongs and flutes.

"It is very hard for me to have lost my puppets," he said, sitting under a tarp outside his son's partly collapsed house, drawing on a crackling clove cigarette as minor aftershocks rumbled.

But he will find a way, he said, and will not postpone a coming performance in Bantul to celebrate the new harvest. The show is scheduled for Saturday — one week after the earthquake left his community in ruins.

Agency Warns Of Higher Risks Of Bird Flu (FT)

By Andrew Jack

Financial Times, June 1, 2006

Europe's disease control agency will on Thursday warn governments to accelerate their preparations for a flu pandemic in the face of an increased risk the bird flu virus could mutate into a form more dangerous to humans in the near future.

In its latest public health risk report, the European Centre for Disease Prevention and Control (ECDC) will say there are "many good reasons . . . to continue and intensify" preparations, including boosting co- operation among countries and between health, agriculture and other government departments within each nation.

Chief of these reasons is the spread of the virus since January into a broad range of birds, including migratory species that travel widely.

As a result, Europe must adjust to the likelihood of H5N1 becoming endemic in birds, warns the ECDC.

The cautiously worded document from the agency, created last year to monitor the spread of disease in the European Union, concludes: "The likelihood that [the H5N1 virus] might achieve any inherent potential in the near future may have risen."

It stresses there are no current indications that the behaviour of the flu virus in humans has changed significantly. But it says the spread this year of H5N1 into animals in Europe, the Middle East and Africa increases the likelihood of human exposure and mutation or recombination of the virus.

The report comes after the World Health Organisation said on Wednesday it saw no need to escalate its pandemic alert level, as its investigations intensified into a cluster of infections in Sumatra in Indonesia that killed seven people this month.

The WHO said there were no signs of significant genetic mutation in the virus that it has studied in four of the Sumatra victims.

It said there was no spread of H5N1 from the cluster, although it has given the antiviral drug Tamiflu as a prophylaxis to 54 people.

A further six cases confirmed elsewhere in Indonesia in recent days have brought the worldwide total of infections to 224, and deaths to 127.

"H5N1 has become far more prevalent and, if it stays in its present form, we are going to have to learn to live with it in Europe," said Angus Nicholl from the ECDC.

At a Europe-wide conference in Sweden earlier this month, the agency pledged to complete its assessment of all national preparation plans by July 2007.

It also promised to draw up indicators to assess progress, accelerate the take-up of seasonal flu vaccine, and strengthen international support to combat the virus, especially in Africa.

Avian Flu News Tracker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal Online, June 1, 2006

Wednesday, May 31, 2006

12:50 p.m.: Fifty-four uninfected members and contacts of the family hardest-hit by bird flu are under voluntary quarantine in Indonesia, and there are no signs the disease has spread since May 22, the WHO said in an update1. The quarantined people - except pregnant women and infants - are taking the antiviral drug Tamiflu as a preventive medication and they are being visited daily by public health teams who check them for symptoms, the WHO said. Seven members of the family died either of confirmed or probable infection with the H5N1 virus. An eighth infected member survived. 2

8:50 a.m.: Outbreaks of H5N1 may be underreported in Indonesia and China, and the virus could be more widespread in Africa than authorities know, said experts gathered at a Rome conference3 on the disease. Poor monitoring and lack of compensation mechanisms that encourage farmers to report animal deaths meant that authorities were not always aware of all outbreaks of the H5N1 virus, animal health experts told reporters.

6 a.m.: Dutch biotechnology company Crucell NV announced it has started a large study to test a vaccine against avian-flu virus in humans. The trial, performed in collaboration with a team based in Leicester, U.K., will oversee the vaccination of 560 healthy adult individuals, Crucell said.

2 a.m.: Bird flu killed a 15-year-old boy in Indonesia, a health official said citing local tests, as the country struggled to get a grip on a rise in cases. Indonesia averaged one human bird flu death every 2 1/2 days in May, putting it on pace to soon surpass Vietnam as the hardest-hit country. The boy, from the West Java town of Tasikmalaya, had a history of contact with poultry. He is the third recent victim from the province. Last week, a 10-year-old girl and her 18-year-old brother who lived in another village died of the disease.

Iran's Bahai Religious Minority Says It Faces Raids And Arrests (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

Members of the Bahai religious minority in Iran said this week that the government had recently intensified a campaign of arrests, raids and propaganda that was aimed at eradicating their religion in Iran, the country of its birth.

On May 19, Iranian security officials arrested 54 Bahais in the city of Shiraz who were involved in a community service project, many of them in their teens and early 20's, said diplomatic officials and Bahai officials outside of Iran.

They were not charged and all but three were released within six days, these officials said.

It was the largest mass arrest of Bahais since the 1980's, when thousands of them were imprisoned and more than 200 were executed by the new Islamic government.

The developments have alarmed human rights monitors at the United Nations, who say that since December, the government newspaper in Tehran has published more than 30 articles denigrating the Bahai faith — even accusing Bahais of sacrificing Muslim children on holy days. The arrests coincided with raids on six Bahai homes, in which notebooks, documents and computers were confiscated. More than 70 other Bahais have been arrested since January 2005 in smaller clusters, and some are still being held, the monitors said.

"We see a pattern emerging that is quite ominous," said Bani Dugal, who represents the Bahai International Community at the United Nations, where religious and some other groups have consultative status. "It's basically trying to create terror in the Bahai community, and also to win over the Iranian population to accept it."

Mohammad Mohammadi, press secretary for Iran's mission to the United Nations, said he had no information about arrests of Bahais and would not be able to respond until Monday because of an Iranian holiday this week.

The Bahais are the largest religious minority in Iran, with about 300,000 members there. There are five million worldwide. They believe that humanity is one race, that men and women are equal and that all religions and prophets are derived from the same source, God.

They have suffered successive waves of persecution in Iran since their faith was founded there in the mid-1800's by a Persian nobleman considered by the Bahais to be a messenger of God. That belief violates the Islamic teaching that God sent many prophets before Muhammad, but none afterward. The Bahai are discriminated against in some other Muslim countries, where they are far less numerous than in Iran.

Unlike Jews and Christians, who have seats in Iran's Parliament set aside for them as religious minorities, Bahais in Iran are considered "unprotected infidels," said Kit Bigelow, director for external affairs of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States. Bahais are not permitted to attend college, work for the government or practice their faith openly.

She called the recent arrests "the latest step in the implementation of a strategy on the part of the Iranian government to eliminate the Bahai community."

Asma Jahangir, the United Nations special rapporteur who monitors freedom of religion for the Commission on Human Rights, announced in March that she had just learned about a confidential letter from the chairman of the command headquarters of Iran's armed forces instructing government agencies to identify all Bahais and monitor their activities.

Ms. Jahangir said the letter was sent on Oct. 29, 2005, on the orders of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Ms. Jahangir said in a statement in March that she was concerned that "information gained as a result of such monitoring will be used as a basis for the increased persecution of, and discrimination against, members of the Bahai faith, in violation of international standards."

Mr. Mohammadi, the Iranian press secretary, said he could not confirm whether such a document existed.

DOJ_NMG_0031123

Azedah Perry, a Bahai in North Carolina, said that among the 54 arrested in May were 3 of her nieces, ages 17, 18 and 21. She spoke by telephone with her nieces after their release, and said they told her they were interrogated during their six days in prison, but tried to keep their morale up by praying and singing. She said when they were arrested, they were volunteering in a community service project at several public schools. She said they were teaching underprivileged children English, science and mathematics — not the Bahai faith — and had permission letters from the local Islamic council in their pockets.

Last year, Mrs. Perry's brother-in-law in Shiraz was taken by armed Iranian guards from his home and held for six weeks in a prison in Tehran with several other Bahai men before being released, Mrs. Perry said.

"It's hard to live in such a situation," she said. "You don't know what will happen each day. The day they attacked my sister's house, she was in her bedroom and she saw guards with guns in her backyard."

The United States Congress is considering a resolution that would condemn the Iranian government for repressing Bahais and call on President Bush to make the abuse of Bahais a significant factor in United States foreign policy.

Representative Mark Steven Kirk, an Illinois Republican who co-sponsored the resolution with Representative Tom Lantos of California, said, "My fear is that if the regime leads the country into a confrontation with the West, it will be the cover for a great human rights crime, as happened before."

Saudi Women Rise In Defense Of The Veil (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- More than 500 women packed the Saudi capital's Maimouna Center on a recent evening to attend a lecture. The women, some still in their full black wraps, filled the rows of plum-colored plastic chairs, while late arrivals sat in small clusters on the carpet and against the wall.

"Whom do we love?" asked the lecturer, a woman, seated behind a desk on a raised platform.

"God," the women answered in unison.

"Then we must obey Him."

She went on to urge the audience members to dress modestly and raise their daughters to do the same. She explained that, despite what some Saudis are now saying, it is a sin for men and women to mix. "Even if people don't see you sin, God is watching," she warned. "On Judgment Day, your own skin will testify against you."

As she took copious notes, Mashael al-Eissa dabbed at tears, overcome by the extent of her religious responsibilities.

Eissa, a fiery young Internet writer, and the lecturer, Afrah al-Humaydi, are among a group of conservative Saudi women trying to redress what they view as an erosion of traditional values in the kingdom and a dangerous shift in the status of women.

"Saudi women are the luckiest in the world and Saudi Arabia is the closest thing to an ideal and pure Islamic nation," Eissa said. "We don't want imported Western values to destroy that."

The changes that have so riled Eissa and other conservative women followed the intense scrutiny that Saudi Arabia received after the discovery that 15 of the 19 hijackers who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States were Saudis. The lack of personal liberties in the kingdom -- an absolute monarchy that imposes a strict form of Islam -- was widely held to be an underlying part of the extremist ideology the attackers shared.

Shortly afterward, strict censorship of the media was loosened and subjects that the religious establishment had placed off-limits for decades, such as the ban on women driving or working alongside men, were openly debated. Women, previously hidden, started appearing as television newscasters, and their photos became daily staples in the press.

King Abdullah, crowned in August, called for increased work opportunities for women and started including female journalists, professors and business leaders on his trips overseas.

And during regional tours last year, both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes said Saudi women needed broader political rights to make changes in their lives.

But the new atmosphere has alarmed conservative women who are suspicious of U.S. interference and warn that changes in their status could destroy the country's Islamic framework. Though no figures are available, conservative, religious women seem to constitute a sizable portion of the country's female population, belying notions that most Saudi women are unhappy with their lot and waiting to be liberated.

On the contrary, the black veil and the prohibition against women driving are embraced by many women here as a form of protection and an integral part of their religion.

Faiza al-Obaidi, a biology professor, says she thinks the attempts at Western-style female emancipation are part of a religious war being waged by the United States, "an intellectual rather than physical colonization." Sitting at the food court at the Basateen Mall in the coastal city of Jiddah one weekend, lifting her veil to take bites from a tuna sandwich, she said the West was targeting women, the core of society, as a means of eventually controlling the whole country. "They fear Islam, and we are the world's foremost Islamic nation," she said.

Obaidi shows pride in her religion and resists foreign interference, she said, by maintaining her veil, or niqab . "Just because this is closed," she said, tugging at the black material that covered her face, "doesn't mean this is," pointing to her head.

Samia Adham, a statistics professor seated beside her, also in a veil, added: "This is a choice. We choose to be ruled by Islam. We will make changes, but within our religion and in our own way."

Two young men with long hair and wearing bright T-shirts and frayed jeans entered the food court and sat at a table with a young woman. Obaidi shook her head. "You wouldn't have seen that several years ago," she said.

Many Salafi women here, who follow the school of thought that calls for a return to Islam as practiced by the prophet Muhammad and the following two generations, shatter the stereotype of women in black niqab as meek and submissive. Often well educated, articulate and sometimes downright aggressive, they include award-winning scientists, writers and college professors.

Khadija Badahdah, a university administrator who holds a doctorate in chemistry from the University of London and wears a veil, said she recently started to grant television interviews because women calling for change were dominating coverage on the airwaves and in newspapers and giving the wrong impression of Saudi women. "They are a minority but they appear to speak for all of us," she said, sitting in her comfortable home in Jiddah on a recent weekend. "This is the beginning of a cultural erosion, and if we don't fight it now, it will continue."

The Salafi women have also used lectures and Internet and newspaper campaigns to combat what they view as negative developments. Though they appear to be fighting against women's rights, they say they are actually fighting for the rights granted to women in Islam.

Humaydi, the lecturer, says she counsels women to educate themselves for at least half an hour a day about their rights under Islamic law. The problems faced by Saudi women, she said, are not because of Islam, which she calls a perfect religion that honors and values women. The fault lies in its improper implementation.

"We were given rights by Islam 1,400 years ago that women in the West only got at the beginning of the 20th century," said Humaydi, a middle-aged college professor. "Muslim women can work, and inherit, and be financially independent."

But working alongside men, taking leadership positions or removing the veil are choices that the religious women say are not open to them. This year a Gallup poll in eight predominantly Muslim countries found that only in Saudi Arabia did the majority of women not agree that women should be allowed to hold political office. Last summer, 500 women addressed a letter to Abdullah asking him to save the country from the onslaught of Westernized ideas regarding women and to maintain the ban on women driving and working with men.

Men and women should not share work spaces, Humaydi contends, because Islam says not to place oneself in an environment where adultery can occur. "People are wonderful, but the devil doesn't sit still," she said, adding that even Bill Clinton, while president, "couldn't resist him."

At Jiddah's King Fahd Medical Research Center, a small Casio recorder played Koranic verses in the background as Faten Khorshid peered through a microscope, her niqab falling past her shoulders over her long white lab coat. Khorshid, who received a government grant for cancer research, says that her conservative views have not held her back and that the niqab makes it easier for doctors to concentrate on work instead of one another. "I don't want to be the equal of a man," she added. "In many ways, I am better than him."

Clashes In Paris Suburbs Recall Riots Of Fall (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

PARIS, May 31 -- Small gangs of youths pelted riot police with rocks and set cars and garbage bins ablaze late Tuesday in a second night of unrest in the Paris suburbs, raising fears of a return of the disturbances that inflamed 300 French towns and suburbs last fall.

The violence of the last two nights -- in which youths attacked police cars, government buildings and riot police -- was sparked in part by mounting resentment toward the mayor of the northeastern Paris suburb of Montfermeil, who in recent weeks imposed a law prohibiting 15- to 18-year-olds from gathering in groups of more than three and requiring anyone under 16 to be accompanied by an adult on city streets after 8 p.m.

The French government last fall promised to improve living conditions and job opportunities in suburbs heavily populated by immigrant families and where unemployment is rampant, but little has been done and the government's main initiative -- a youth jobs bill -- ended with this spring's politically disastrous student demonstrations.

At the same time, police have said crime has increased in poor suburban neighborhoods, and frustration with the government has continued to fester.

"We have the painful sense that nothing has been fixed," Francois Hollande, leader of the opposition Socialist Party, said in an interview on France-2 Television.

At 9:30 Tuesday night, an estimated 15 young people threw rocks and projectiles at police patrolling an apartment complex area. At 11 p.m., youths tossed a makeshift explosive into a police car. The officers inside barely had time to escape before the vehicle exploded in flames.

Marauding youths set afire about a dozen private cars and torched numerous garbage bins in Montfermeil and the adjacent town of Clichy-sous-Bois, where last fall's three weeks of violence began when two teenagers were electrocuted as they tried to hide in a power substation. They believed police were chasing them.

Muhittin Altun, a third youth who survived with severe burns in that incident, was arrested Tuesday night on charges of throwing rocks at a police car. He was later released, according to French news media.

Six police officers were reported slightly injured and 13 youths were detained in Tuesday night's incidents.

In Montfermeil, a suburb of high youth unemployment and government-subsidized housing projects, young people have been growing increasingly angry at Mayor Xavier Lemoine's attempts to crack down on gang violence. Although a local court earlier this month overturned his effort to limit youth gatherings, he vowed to seek other measures.

On Monday, residents said, police roughed up a woman who protested police efforts to arrest her son, a suspect in the beating several weeks ago of a bus driver. Police ended up arresting both the mother and son, according to police.

Monday night, hooded youths hurled stones and other projectiles at Mayor Lemoine's house and at City Hall, and the police who responded were attacked with baseball bats. The clashes lasted three hours and seven police officers reportedly were injured.

French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, whose characterizations of rioters as "scum" inflamed last fall's violence, visited police officers who had responded to Monday night's incidents. "More than 100 hooligans set upon you -- masked and carrying weapons," he said. "We are confronting not a spontaneous revolt, but hooligans who have only a single purpose -- to create the most damage and injure as many people as possible."

Transportation Minister Dominique Perben, of the ruling Union for a Popular Movement party, described the incidents as a "reminder" of last year's violence.

"The question of the suburbs is a question for the entire political class," Perben told I-tele television. "We must have the courage to look things in the face."

A Flagging Commitment On AIDS (NYT)

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The AIDS epidemic turns 25 this week, and while new infections are declining in a few countries, the number of infected is still growing, especially among young women. Globally, the epidemic seems to have more energy than efforts to fight it.

This week, United Nations members are meeting in a follow-up to the successful U.N. special session in 2001, which pushed the world to take AIDS more seriously. At that time, the countries created a detailed plan for attacking the disease, with specific targets. Spending soared, from $1.6 billion in 2001 to $8.3 billion last year.

The nations now are supposed to be reporting on whether their targets are being met, and devising a plan of action for the next few years. Instead, they are watering down the original plan. Ideologues, led by Washington, are taking out commitments to key programs, and wealthy nations worried about cost are replacing concrete goals with vague statements. AIDS groups fear the world is moving backward.

The most recent draft written by the nations does maintain the 2001 target of universal access to treatment, prevention and care, and sets a spending goal of $23 billion per year by 2010. But Europe and the United States have successfully opposed including specific targets that would have provided clear, periodic measurements of whether countries were meeting goals. In terms of money, the world will fall $6 billion short of what is needed this year, and we are falling further behind each year.

The drafts also show that on issues of interest to religious conservatives, the United States and Syria are holding down one side, joined at times by the Vatican and Saudi Arabia. Washington, for example, has removed references that were in the 2001 declaration about providing clean syringes to drug users. These efforts are desperately needed in many countries, like Russia, where the epidemic is largely spread by drug injectors.

The word "condom" has also gone missing. Depressingly, nations have been debating whether they can make any reference at all to "empowering girls" or "vulnerable populations," itself a euphemism for sex workers, drug injectors and gay men.

Tellingly, the United States has insisted on taking out all references to "evidence-based prevention strategies" — strategies scientifically proven to work. Instead, Washington wants to use the phrase "evidence-informed prevention strategies." Apparently the Bush administration feels the need to make room for strategies that are not proven to work.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Fate Of Freed Detainees Complicates US Handling Of Guantanamo. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, A1, Higgins, 2.11M) reports in a front page story that after "four years in Guantanamo Bay, Abu Bakker Qassim, a former terror suspect cleared last year of having ties to al Qaeda, got word last month that he finally would be set free." He and "four fellow Muslims from China were loaded onto a U.S. military transport plane in the middle of the night, shackled to the floor and flown for 12 hours to their new home: a converted military barracks in Tirana, the capital of Albania." The case of the five Uighurs from China shows the US is "in a predicament it never expected: What should it do with Guantanamo inmates who have been found deserving of release but who face jail or execution if returned to their homelands?" Washington's "hesitation to repatriate some detainees reflects its growing unease with authoritarian states it initially enlisted as partners in the post-9/11 war on terror."

89 Detainees Now On Hunger Strikes. The AP (6/2, Selsky) reports more Guantanamo Bay detainees "have joined a hunger strike, raising the total to 89, and six of them were being force-fed, the U.S. military said Thursday." The strike, "which last weekend jumped from three participants to 75 — is now the biggest of the year at the U.S. prison on Cuba, where about 460 men are being held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban." Military officials "said the hunger strikers are an attempt to gain public sympathy to pressure the United States to release them."

German Intelligence Service Admits Knowledge Of El-Masri Rendition. The New York Times (6/2, Mekhennet, Smith, 1.19M) reports Germany's external intelligence service, the BND, "said yesterday that it knew about the American seizure and detention of a German citizen 16 months before the country was officially informed of his mistaken arrest. It was unclear whether that information had been passed on to senior officials." Germany had "previously maintained that it did not learn of the abduction of its citizen, Khaled el-Masri, until he returned to Germany in May 2004." The disclosure, "made as a parliamentary inquiry into the case reconvened in Berlin, adds to suspicions that European governments, or at least their intelligence services, have abetted the American practice of 'extraordinary rendition.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says New York Terror Funding Reflects Average Of Previous Years. Criticism of DHS' distribution of Urban Area Security Initiative grants continued yesterday, as Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff defended reduced funding for New York City and Washington, DC. Asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (6/1) why anti-terror funds for the cities are being cut, Chertoff said, "First of all…I don't think it's fair to describe them as cuts. Take New York, for example. Last year, New York got $200 million. This year, we're going to give them $124 million under this particular program. But last year was an artificially elevated number to make up from the very low grant the year before. If you average out the prior three-year grants, you're going to see this year is directly in line with what we've done over the last four years."

ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Money for the city of Washington and New York, both attacked on 9/11, is being slashed 40%. Why? Well, Homeland Security says there aren't enough national monuments or national icons in those cities to protect. Really? New York and Washington officials are furious." ABC (Thomas) added, "In New York, the loss of funding means fewer resources for protecting its massive transit system. In Washington today, officials said they'd have to curtail some programs already on the table." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "defended the funding formula as fair." Secretary Chertoff: "What is critical here is we have put over four years, over half a billion, in this one, single program into New York." Thomas: "Not everyone is unhappy. Mid-size cities like Omaha, Nebraska, are getting a boost in funding."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 10, 1:55, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "New York City officials are furious that they took a 40% cut this year in Homeland Security money intended to make big cities safer." New Yorkers were "especially galled by Homeland's finding that the city had zero national monuments or icons, even though it's home to the UN headquarters, the Statue of Liberty, and landmark bridges. Washington DC also took a 40% cut. The police chief said today the formula should be different for getting money to the two cities already attacked." And though "the Homeland Security Secretary was roughed up in the New York papers, he says today New York has received over half a billion dollars since the grants began, twice the total of any other city. And he says it's getting about the same share this year as it has on average during the past three."

An aggressive response from city and state lawmakers, as well as New York City papers, has turned much of the national media's attention towards New York's funding. Appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (6/1, Matthews), Rep. Peter King said, "I'm not begrudging other cities. Los Angeles certainly has threat (sic), Chicago, others, I'm not getting into that. But to cut New York City 40 % when every intelligence threat estimate shows that New York is at the very top, to me is absolutely indefensible. And Mike Chertoff and others at the department are changing their story by the hour. Today apparently said this was an averaging out of the first year and the second year and now the third year is an average of the first two, which makes no sense at all, especially when they were coming out with all these complicated formulas yesterday, which also added up to nothing." King added later, "There is a bureaucracy at the Department of Homeland Security which undercuts New York any number of times. I don't even know how familiar Mike Chertoff was with these final numbers. I heard people in the department saying yesterday they were running around once the storm hit trying to find ways to justify it."

On MSNBC's The Situation (6/1, Carlson), King said, "We're calling hearings on this. They have a peer-review panel which is shrouded in secrecy. We're not certain who was on that. We're not certain who came up with the formula they claim they used, and by the way, the department changed their story about five times over the last 36 hours as to why this was done. And you have then it went to an assistant secretary, perhaps an undersecretary. I don't even know if it made it to Secretary Chertoff for the final sign-off. I don't know how they came up with these numbers."

In an article appearing on at least 77 news websites, the AP (6/2, McShane) reports, "New Yorkers are seething over" the funding cuts, "and some are demanding the firing of Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff. … Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., on Thursday said President Bush 'should not come back to New York and stand with us' until his administration comes up with more money to keep New York safe." Meanwhile, "In Washington, Homeland Security Undersecretary George Foresman said his agency would review its finding that New York City has no national monuments or icons that would be at risk of terrorist attack."

NYC Funding Said To Have Been Cut Due To "Numerous Flaws" In Application. Under the headline "City Has Itself To Blame For Terror Cuts, US Says," the New York Times (6/2, Baker, Cardwell, 1.19M) reports DHS cut New York City's funding due to "numerous flaws" in its application. Though "federal officials said yesterday that the city…did a poor job of articulating its needs in its application" and "mishandled the application itself, failing to file it electronically as required and instead faxing its request to Washington," New York City and state "officials insisted that they had made no mistakes." Meanwhile, "Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg questioned yesterday whether old-fashioned pork barrel politics was at play in doling out the money in an election year."

Reports throughout the day on Fox News noted an editorial in the New York Daily News yesterday calling for the firing of Secretary Chertoff. Fox News' Special Report (6/1, Herridge) reported that Chertoff told the network he "would not be cowed by the criticism." Chertoff was shown saying, "People may not always agree with the decisions that the department makes. They may no always agree with my decisions. But they can be sure on one thing: Threatening me, insulting me and attacking me is not going to cause me to say, "Oh wow, I'm going to reconsider now and I'm going to pay more money now." Fox News (Herridge) added that DHS' funding was based on a "sophisticated risk assessment, which took into account the threat information, as well as the city's ability to prevent and respond to a terrorist attack."

NYTimes Says Peer Review Panel Was "Too Focused On Politics." Under the headline "Pork 1, Antiterrorism 0," the New York Times (6/2, 1.19M) editorializes, "If Al Qaeda is planning on following up its 2001 attacks on New York and Washington with an assault on Nebraska, the Department of Homeland Security's new urban areas security grants are brilliant. But, of course, the White House, Wall Street and densely populated urban areas are the most likely terrorist targets, and these are precisely the places the department dangerously shortchanged this week." The Times adds that DHS' anonymous peer review panels "appear to have been too focused on politics, and not enough on safety. … Mr. Bush and Mr. Chertoff owe the American people a system that recognizes the vulnerability of places like New York and Washington not just when the television cameras are rolling, but when the money is being handed out."

More Commentary. Dana Milbank, in his Washington Sketch column for the Washington Post (6/2, A2, 744K) writes that following the announcement of cuts for New York and Washington, Tracy Henke, "who is in charge of Homeland Security's grant-making, has become a target of ridicule." Milbank continues that while the cities New York and Washington lost funding, "those terrorism magnets of Kansas City and St. Louis -- both by happenstance in Henke's home state of Missouri -- received boosts in funds. Other winners: the horses of Louisville, the cattle of Omaha and five cities in Jeb Bush's Florida. Sounds dubious? Sorry, you can't see the data Henke used. Classified."

Code Red Declaration Could Contribute To DC Gridlock In Terror Attack Evacuation. The Washington Times (6/2, Seper, 90K) reports two traffic accidents in DC's Northeast yesterday that "shut down two major highways" served as "an ominous warning: What if it had been a terrorist attack?" The Times continues that "the prospect of being able to get either in or out of the city without being caught in a massive traffic jam remains in doubt," and a Code Red declaration by DHS "could contribute to the problem," possibly resulting in "an immediate lockdown of public and government facilities and restrictions on public travel." Meanwhile, Randall J. Larsen, director of the Virginia-based Institute for Homeland Security, said yesterday that in the event of a terrorist attack, "finding 'shelter in place' -- a small, interior room with no or few windows -- could be a better option" than evacuation.

Chertoff Says FEMA "Much More Prepared" For Hurricane Season. Under the headline "Chertoff: FEMA Is Hurricane-Ready," USA Today (6/2, Hall, Martin, 2.31M) reports that while Secretary Chertoff says FEMA is "much more prepared" this hurricane season than it was last year, "some disaster-response experts, members of Congress and FEMA employees are skeptical." Emergency-response officials in hurricane-prone states "say they're cautiously optimistic," and Rep. Bennie Thompson says, "There's still suspicion in the Gulf Coast region."

Paulison Says Government Is Ready For Hurricane Season. FEMA Director David Paulison was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/1) about a statement by Rep. Chris Shays that the federal government is not ready for hurricane season. Paulson said, "I don't agree with that. We are going to be ready. Are we as ready as we want to be? Do we have FEMA where we actually want it to be? The answer is probably not. This is a long-term thing that you can't fix in just a few months. We have taken all those lessons learned in Katrina, that we saw, that the Congress saw, that the IG's office saw, the GAO saw. We're taking all the reports. We've put things into several buckets. And the four primary ones is one, logistics, two, communications, situation awareness and victim registration. Those are the four big ones."

Gulf Coast Officials Warn Residents To Prepare. ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 7, 2:45, von Fremd, 8.78M) reported, "Much of the Gulf of Mexico still looks like a hurricane hit just yesterday. More than 200 people died here in Gulfport. And this year, officials are demanding that everyone in vulnerable areas take some responsibility for saving themselves." While cities "all along the Gulf Coast clean up and rebuild from last year's storms, officials worry that residents have short memories and won't heed the warning this year to stock up and get out." David Nichols, city manager: "People have got to take care of themselves. Government can only take care of them to a certain degree." Von Fremd: "Public service announcements, intended to scare people into leaving, are flooding the airways." In New Orleans, "officials say unlike last year, fleets of buses are ready to go. Today, the Army Corps of Engineers says it spent more than $800 million, to repair the levees. The Corps says they're back to pre-Katrina strength. The problem, say some engineers, is that pre-Katrina strength isn't good enough."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 6, 1:35, Shamlian, 9.87M) reported from Sabine Pass, Texas, where they "call themselves victims of the forgotten storm, and there are several thousand people tonight that are still displaced. Here in Sabine Pass, out of 300 homes, a small community, fewer than a dozen right now are livable." As the state "tonight prepares for a new season, there are arrangements with private companies to provide gas reserves along the interstates, even a formal plan for the evacuation of pets. All this amidst a region that is still cleaning up and hoping that they won't have to do it all over again."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 7, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported in Mississippi that "an estimated 38,000 families start this hurricane season in a lightweight trailer or mobile home like the one you see behind me. Obviously, these structures were not built to withstand hurricane-force winds. The concern is how well they will protect in even a summer storm, where wind guts can hit 50 miles or better. Evacuating people here in Biloxi will be far more of a challenge this year than last because the Biloxi Bay Bridge is still chopped into pieces from Hurricane Katrina."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 8, 1:20, Potter, 9.87M) reported, "Florida officials insist that they will be ready but with damage like this still around two years after Hurricane Charlie hit here in Punta Gorda, the officials this year are also insisting that the residents themselves do more to get ready by putting together their supplies, by putting together their own hurricane plans, their individual plans. They're also running TV commercials urging everyone to obey the evacuation orders. Now, Florida officials have also cut a deal with grocery stores, hardware stores, gas stations to use generators to open up right after the next hurricane, so perhaps they can end those long relief lines that we saw so painfully last year."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 9, 1:10, Savidge, 9.87M) reported that in New Orleans, "a city that's below sea level, getting rid of water is equally important. They rely on canals, they rely on pumping stations. There too that system has been compromised. The Army Corps says it won't be fully functional 'til some time next year. Now, that means just a heavy rain could cause flooding in some of the lowest-lying neighborhoods, even damaging flooding."

Many Coastal Homeowners Building Hurricane-Resistant Homes. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 8, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Many coastal homeowners are determined not let the hurricane season get the better of them. Instead of retreating inland, they're putting up stronger homes, anticipating this new hurricane season's powerful storms."

Army Corps Investigation Finds New Orleans Levees Were Flawed. The New York Times (6/2, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports a "sweeping new study" by the Army Corps of Engineers has found that the levees it built for New Orleans "were an incomplete patchwork of protection, containing flaws in design and construction and not built to handle a storm anywhere near the strength of Hurricane Katrina." Though "outside engineering panels…have come to similar conclusions," the Times continues that the new "report is remarkable for being a product of the corps' own official investigation." Thought they "found no evidence of negligence or malfeasance by the corps or its contractors," investigators "said the corps had failed to take into account the tendency of the local soil to sink over time, leaving some sections of levee lower than they should have been."

ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 6, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Today, the US Army Corps of Engineers made a stunning admission of responsibility for the flooding of New Orleans. The Corps's chief said the levees failed because their construction was flawed."

The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 7, 0:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that in the report, the corps "blamed itself for 'catastrophic failure.' Here are some more findings: The protection system of levees and floodwalls was '…a system in name only,' largely built using outdated elevation data; the storm exceeded design criteria and some protective sections were overwhelmed; and many areas of New Orleans remain vulnerable to another Katrina."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight, the Army Corp of Engineers has taken responsibility for the failure of the levee system, while saying now this city is much better off now and ready for a significant storm." NBC (Savidge) added, "This turnabout on the part of the Army Corps of Engineers, this report, is a huge about-face. What the Corps is saying is that the flood protection system for the city of New Orleans in Southeast Louisiana was a system in name only. The 6,000-plus page report went on to say the flood defense the Army Corps of Engineers built over decades '…was compromised by the incompleteness of the system, the inconsistency in levels of protection, and the lack of redundancy.'" To "independent investigators, the report is an epiphany of sorts for Corps leaders that they finally get it that the Corps was part of the problem." But "for New Orleans residents at the start of a hurricane season, the study only adds to concern."

USA Today (6/2, Levin, 2.31M) reports the report "offers the most complete account yet of why the levees failed. Some engineers said the report did not go far enough in identifying failures within the corps. A report last month by engineers at the University of California-Berkeley urged that the corps be made more efficient and less vulnerable to political pressure."

The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Vartabedian, 958K) reports the investigation said the city's levees were "'a system in name only,' a recognition that a wide range of errors, weak links and incomplete construction was at the heart of the massive damage that occurred on Aug. 29." Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, commander and chief engineer of the corps, said they are "deeply saddened and enormously troubled" by the reports findings.

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 2, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) interviewed Col. Lewis Setliff of the US Army Corps of Engineers. Asked about the Corps reports that says "the damage from Katrina is the work of people and not God.," Setfliff said, "Well, no city is safe. There is always a level of risk in each and every city, and I think the Corps' responsibility, you know, working with elected officials is to minimize that risk as much as we can. But we'll never eliminate it, and what we need to do is keep people, keep businesses informed so they are making these very important decisions."

WAR NEWS:

Charges Expected For Senior Commanders In Haditha Killings. President Bush yesterday again discussed the alleged killing of 24 Iraqi civilians by US Marines in Haditha, again saying he found the allegations "troubling." Meanwhile, military sources are indicating that charges may be filed against senior officials who knew about the killings but did not report them. In addition, the military is requiring that all troops in Iraq receive "core values" training. The story was reported as the lead story on ABC and CBS, while NBC ran it third in its lineup.

ABC World News Tonight (6/1, lead story, 2:50, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "Senior military officials tell ABC News that there will likely be charges against senior officials up the chain of command who were not on the scene at the time of the killing, but should have known that something wrong had happened and done something about it." President Bush: "This is just a reminder, for troops either in Iraq or throughout our military, that there are high standards expected of them. And there are strong rules of engagement. The Haditha incident is under investigation. Obviously, the allegations are very troubling for me and deeply troubling for our military." Karl: "Shortly after the killings, the military made $38,000 in payments to the families of the victims. Investigators believe that the officers who authorized those payments did so because they knew those civilians were killed by Marines, and not by a roadside bomb."

In a separate segment, the ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 2, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "All 130,000 troops in Iraq, every single one, will be given what's called 'core values training.'" Soldiers "will be instructed, 'The law of war provides that soldiers fight only enemy combatants.' It also requires soldiers to destroy no more than the mission requires."

The CBS Evening News (6/1, lead story, 2:35, Palmer, 7.66M) reported, "Already the US military is on the offensive, ordering extra moral, legal, and ethical training for all troops on the battlefield." The "trouble is many Iraqis don't believe it. They've witnessed too many raids on their homes and too many security operations gone wrong, like the death earlier this week of a pregnant woman shot when the car rushing her to a maternity hospital accidentally drove up a road closed by US forces. Today, Iraq's cabinet announced its own investigations into the killings in Haditha, and the new prime minister had harsh words for Coalition troops."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 3, 2:00, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "The top US ground commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, was the first to call for an investigation into the alleged atrocity in Haditha. Today he ordered training for all Coalition forces in moral and ethical conduct on the battlefield." President Bush "today called the reports troubling and promised a thorough investigation." President Bush: "And I'll get to the bottom of this, and if there is a wrongdoing, people will be held to account." Miklaszewski: "But Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki said today this appears to be a horrible crime, and the government in Baghdad announced it would launch its own separate investigation."

The AP (6/1) reports, "The White House said Thursday that it took nearly a month for President Bush to learn that the military was investigating reports that Marines murdered unarmed civilians in Iraq." The AP also reports, "Bush pledged Thursday that the results of the inquiry will be made public." The "U.S. military appears to be conducting four investigations into different aspects of the incident, including into why the American military's initial statement about the incident described it as an ambush on a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol, with a roadside bombing and subsequent firefight killing 15 civilians, eight insurgents and a Marine. The statement, which said the 15 civilians were killed by the blast, has led some to allege a coverup."

Unit Responsible For Haditha Deaths Now At Camp Pendleton. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 2, 2:00, Hughes, 7.66M) reported, "Known as the Marine's Thundering Third, the unit responsible for the deaths in Haditha, Iraq, is back at Camp Pendleton, home base and mostly friendly territory for the troops now under investigation." Some are "comparing the Haditha killings to the Vietnam massacre at Mai Lai," but "in this company town, almost everyone is withholding judgment, waiting to hear the Marines' side of the story." All three commanding officers "have been reassigned to non-leadership duties here. One of them says it makes his blood boil to be blamed for what he calls a massacre when he wasn't even in Haditha that day."

Naval Investigators Plan To Exhume Bodies In Haditha Probe. The Washington Post (6/2, A16, White, Ricks, 744K) reports, "Criminal investigators are hoping to exhume the bodies of several Iraqi civilians allegedly gunned down by a group of U.S. Marines last year in the city of Haditha, aiming to recover potentially important forensic evidence." The Post reports, "Naval Criminal Investigative Service officials have interviewed families of the dead several times and have visited the homes where the shootings allegedly occurred to collect" evidence. The failure of the Marine Corps to report the Nov. 19 Haditha incident to the NCIS "until nearly four months" after it happened "has presented many hurdles for investigators…according to Defense Department officials, defense attorneys and sources close to the criminal probe."

Haditha Timeline Appears To Exonerate Marine Commandant. The Washington Times (6/2, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "US Marine Corps headquarters in Washington did not learn of the killing of Iraqi civilians by Marines in Haditha until early March, a timeline that appears to exonerate the highest ranks of the Marine Corps from any cover-up or failure to act." The Times reports that the "U.S. military command in Baghdad learned of the civilian killings in February and began two investigations: one criminal and one administrative. The administrative probe "is focusing on whether any information was covered up along the Marine Corps chain of command.

UN Mission In Iraq Failed To Pass Along Haditha Reports. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that the UN "failed in January to pass on initial reports of Haditha massacre. An international official blames 'disorganization' for lapse by U.N.'s Iraq mission, which should have informed U.S. ambassador of sketchy allegations."

Troops In Iraq To Get "Core Warrior Values" Training. USA Today (6/2, Brook, 2.31M) reports, "All 150,000 coalition troops in Iraq will undergo refresher training in "core warrior values" over the next month as top military commanders deal with the fallout from allegations of a Marine massacre last November." Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli Thursday ordered commanders to show troops in Iraq "slides that depict professional military values and the importance of disciplined conduct in combat."

The Chicago Tribune (6/2, Sly, 643K) reports, "The training effort marks the first attempt by the U.S. military to limit the fallout of the brewing scandal and the first implicit acknowledgement that the current training effort may fall short of what is required for American soldiers operating in the Iraqi environment." The statement announcing the training "did not mention the Haditha incident and said that the overwhelming majority of the 150,000 or so coalition forces currently based in Iraq 'perform their jobs magnificently every day.' However, it added, 'Unfortunately, there are a few individuals who sometimes choose the wrong path.'"

Henninger Sees Rising "Iraq Syndrome." Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M) columnist Daniel Henninger writes, "The Iraq Syndrome has finally arrived." Henninger writes that the narrative of the Haditha "story has pretty much set in already: It's another My Lai, we all know they did it, the brass covered it up, and prison sentences for homicide are merely a formality." Henninger writes, "The Vietnam Syndrome…was mainly a failure of U.S. elites. But it's different this time. This presidency has been steadfast in war. No matter. … This time the despondency looks to be penetrating the general population." Henninger cites Lt. Gen. Chiarelli's statement that 99.9% of the troops "perform their jobs magnificently," but writes, "Gen. Chiarelli's magnificent "99.9%" notwithstanding, it's the phenomenon of the so-very-public 0.01% -- at Abu Ghraib, on an Afghan street, at Haditha -- that is breaking America's will this time."

Maliki Denounces "Daily" US Attacks On Civilians. The New York Times (6/2, Oppel, 1.19M) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "lashed out at the American military on Thursday, denouncing what he characterized as habitual attacks by troops against Iraqi civilians. As outrage over reports" of atrocities in Haditha "continued to shake the new government, the country's senior leaders said that they would demand that American officials turn over their investigative files on the killings and that the Iraqi government would conduct its own inquiry." Maliki is quoted calling violence against Iraqi civilians by US and coalition soldiers "a daily phenomenon," and said those troops "do not respect the Iraqi people." The Times says Maliki implied that "attacks on civilians will play a role in future decisions on how long to ask American forces to remain in Iraq," and calls his remarks "an unusual declaration for a government that remains desperately dependent on American forces to keep some form of order in the country" and "a sign of the growing pressure on Mr. Maliki," who is "being pushed by the Americans to resolve the quarreling within his fragile coalition that has left him unable to fill cabinet posts for the Ministries of Defense and the Interior, the two top security jobs in the country."

Iraq Launches Separate Probe Of Haditha Killings. The Financial Times (6/2, Biedermann) reports, "Iraq's new government on Thursday launched an investigation into the alleged killing of up to 24 civilians in the town of Haditha by US marines last year," saying its separate inquiry will "look into other allegations of misconduct by the US-led forces in Iraq and at the way troops behave toward the civilian population after they have come under attack."

Maliki Will Announce Key Cabinet Nominees This Weekend. The Washington Times/AP (6/2, Quinn) reports Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "announced Thursday he would fill vacancies at the crucial defense and interior ministries over the weekend, despite failing to reach an agreement on candidates with Iraq's fractious ethnic and sectarian parties. The appointments, which must be approved by parliament, are the keystone of al-Maliki's plan to take complete control of security around Iraq from U.S.-led forces" before 2008.

Video Challenges US Military Account Of Civilian Deaths In March Incident. BBC News (6/2) reports that it has "uncovered new video evidence that US forces may have been responsible for the deliberate killing of 11 innocent Iraqi civilians" in March in the town of Ishaqi. BBC News says the "video appears to challenge the US military's account of events. The US said at the time four people died during a military operation, but Iraqi police claimed that US troops had deliberately shot the 11 people." The video "shows a number of dead adults and children at the site with" gunshot wounds. The tape "came from a hardline Sunni group opposed to coalition forces."

Marines To Face Murder Charges In April Shooting Of Civilian. The AP (6/2, Hettena) reports, "Military prosecutors plan to file murder, kidnapping and conspiracy charges against seven Marines and a Navy corpsman in the shooting death of an Iraqi civilian in April." The men served "with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, and are members of the battalion's Kilo Company. The highest-ranking serviceman is a staff sergeant."

The Los Angeles Times reports the troops "may also have attempted a cover-up by planting evidence near the body to suggest that the man was an armed insurgent digging a hole to plant a roadside bomb." Rep. John Murtha (D-PA) said this week on ABC television that "some Marines pulled somebody out of a house, put them next to an [improvised explosive device], fired some [AK-47s] so they'd have cartridges there. And then tried to cover that up."

Army Dog Handler Convicted Of Abu Ghraib Abuse. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 3, 0:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The last soldier charged with abusing Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib prison was convicted. Sergeant Santos Cardona, a dog handler from Fullerton, California, was found guilty of dereliction of duty and aggravated assault. He faces up to three and a half years in prison."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 4, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported Cardona "was convicted of using the dog to torment a prisoner. He now becomes the 11th soldier convicted in the Abu Ghraib affair." The Washington Times/AP (6/2, Dishneau) also reports the story.

Armitage Says US Didn't Have Enough Troops On Ground To Win Peace. The Washington Times (6/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside The Ring" column, "Former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage is adding his voice to critics of Pentagon civilian and military war planners who said there were not enough troops to produce a successful outcome in Operation Iraqi Freedom." Armitage told the Georgetown Journal of International Affairs, "I think there were some clear misjudgments, including the number of troops that would be required to secure the peace after combat."

Friedman Says Decision On Iraq Pullout Can't Wait For Bush's Successor. Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (6/2, 1.19M), "President Bush has told us that the question of whether to withdraw from Iraq is one that his successor will have to deal with -- not him. I don't think so. Mr. Bush is not going to have that luxury of passing Iraq along. You see, the insurgency in Iraq is in its 'last throes' -- just like Dick Cheney said. Unfortunately, it's being replaced by anarchy in many neighborhoods -- not democracy. And I don't believe the American people will put up with two and half more years of babysitting anarchy instead of midwifing democracy." The Haditha story "is a tragic reminder that a foreign occupation by US forces can't go on for years. Most US soldiers in Iraq have done heroic work, but occupations that drag on inevitably lead to Hadithas."

After Visit To Iraq, Lawmakers Divided On Progress. The Washington Times (6/2, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Members of a congressional delegation to Iraq will return home from the Middle East this weekend with differing opinions about progress in the region." Sen. George Allen, "Virginia Republican and one of several lawmakers touring the region, predicted yesterday that within a year, the United States and its partners will transition to providing more logistical support and medical assistance, allowing some troops to return home. … By contrast, Rep. James E. Clyburn, South Carolina Democrat, said he was 'highly disappointed and quite frankly shocked' at the lack of success of reconstruction efforts and domestic peacekeeping." The Times adds, "Also on the trip were House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, and Republican Reps. Rodney Frelinghuysen of New Jersey and Sam Graves of Missouri."

Marine Corps Says Three KIA Escorts Were Mistreated By TSA. The Washington Times (6/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside The Ring" column, "The Marine Corps is livid over the mistreatment of three Marines at the hands of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) in Philadelphia last month. According to a Marine Corps memo we obtained, three Marines were 'humiliated' by TSA security guards while escorting the body of Marine Sgt. Lea R. Mills, 21, who was killed April 28 along with two others in Al Anbar province, Iraq, by an improvised explosive device." The three Marines "who were accompanying the casket, Sgt. John C. Stock, Cpl. Aaron J. Bigalk and Cpl. Jason A. Schadeburg, were forced to remove their dress blue uniforms, belts and shoes, which were then scanned. They were then 'patted down' by TSA inspectors."

Disabled Iraq War Veteran Sues Moore Over Fahrenheit 9/11. The Washington Post (6/2, 12:52 PM, Lavoie, 744K) reports, "A veteran who lost both arms in the war in Iraq is suing filmmaker Michael Moore for $85 million, alleging that Moore used snippets of a television interview without his permission to falsely portray him as anti-war in 'Fahrenheit 9/11.'" Sgt. Peter Damon "claims in his lawsuit that the way Moore used" a film clip of Damon in the movie "makes him appear to 'voice a complaint about the war effort' when he was actually complaining about 'the excruciating type of pain' that comes with the injury he suffered."

Protesters Fail To Delay Navy Cargo Ship. The New York Times (6/2, Egan, 1.19M) reports, "After nearly a week of protests" in Olympia, WA, "intended to delay a large Navy cargo ship from sailing to the war in Iraq, the vessel sailed out…on time Wednesday." However, "the protests, which were raucous at times, could portend a summer of escalating tensions in the port. The police said 20 protesters…were arrested earlier in the week on misdemeanor charges of attempted trespass and were then released. Two others were charged with a separate offense stemming from a clash with the police."

Karzai Denounces US Gunfire Against Kabul Mob. USA Today (6/2, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "Afghan President Hamid Karzai denounced U.S. soldiers on Thursday for having fired their weapons to escape a mob in Kabul. A member of his Cabinet, meanwhile, said the Afghan government has launched its own investigation into how a traffic crash Monday spiraled into the worst violence in the capital since the fall of the Taliban in 2001." Karzai "spoke a day after Afghanistan's parliament passed a non-binding resolution that called for local prosecution of U.S. troops responsible for the crash." The AP (6/2, Harris) reports Karzai said in a radio address, "The coalition opened fire, and we strongly condemn that. … I have to say, all the time we tell them to be careful because we have one joint aim, which is the struggle against terrorism."

Under the headline "Where Does Karzai Go From Here?," the Christian Science Monitor (6/2, Morarjee, 61K) reports "confidence in President Hamid Karzai's government is at an all-time low. Residents and observers say that the government needs to restore credibility by reforming the Afghan police and insisting on better conduct for foreign troops."

Afghan Ambassador To US Forecasts Increase In Taliban Attacks. The Washington Times (6/2, Motlagh, 90K) reports, "The Taliban will wage its fiercest campaign of attacks in the coming months in an attempt to hamper the transfer of security duties in Afghanistan from the US military to NATO, Kabul's ambassador in Washington says." Said

Jawad told the Times, "During the upcoming months, the Taliban will resort to the utmost violence to prevent reconstruction and discourage NATO countries from further deployment." Jawad "said it was critical that the international community help reinforce the capacity of the cash-strapped Afghan government to deliver services 'so the presence of the state will be felt in areas experiencing attacks.'"

AEI Fellow Warns Against Cutting Support For Afghan Army. In a Washington Post (6/2, 744K) op-ed, American Enterprise Institute research fellow Vance Serchuk writes that the US's accomplishment in creating a "multiethnic, battle-hardened and increasingly professional" Afghan National Army "is under threat" from the Bush administration's proposal to reduce US contributions. Serchuck writes, "Asked about the guidance they receive from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on building the Afghan army, officers here often cite the same three questions: Why is it taking so long, why do you need so many people, and when can we leave?" Serchuk writes that, for now, "the emphasis shouldn't be on the army Afghanistan can afford but on the one it needs: a force that can defeat the Taliban and become a long-term partner in the war on terrorism."

LATimes Says US Must Crush Taliban, Protect Afghan Lives. In an editorial responding to Monday's riots in Kabul, the Los Angeles Times writes, "The international community must immediately focus on building roads and providing electricity to blacked-out Kabul." The Times writes, "Arab and Persian Gulf states…should give the $90 million that will be needed for diesel fuel to keep Kabul electrified for the next two years while transmission lines are being built to bring power from Central Asia. The U.S. and NATO also will have to invest the military resources to crush the Taliban decisively — and insist that Pakistan do the same." Lastly, the Times writes, "the United States must begin to treat Afghanistan as a sovereign state whose citizens' lives have to be protected. A start would be for Washington to sign a 'status of forces agreement' to govern the behavior of U.S. military forces there. Lessons in driving and crowd control wouldn't hurt, either."

DOJ:

DOJ Awards $42 Million Litigation Case Management Contract To CSC. Federal Computer Week (6/2, Hubler) reports, "The Justice Department has awarded Computer Sciences Corp., a contract worth $42 million to build the department's new Litigation Case Management System (LCMS), which will give the various litigating divisions greater data sharing capabilities." FCW continues, "The system will include a centralized application and database with unique interfaces for various divisions of the agency. The interfaces will allow employees in the Antitrust, Civil Rights, Criminal, Environmental and Natural Resources and Tax divisions, as well as the 94 U.S. Attorney offices, to access data unique to the respective agencies. … At the same time, LCMS will be a single repository where Justice executives can access all litigation case management information and reporting. It will also improve the quality of data used for reporting to Congress, the Office of Management and Budget and other agencies, according to a department announcement."

Government Computer News (6/2, Dizard) reports, "Justice now has dozens of litigation case management systems because each of the department's U.S. Attorney's offices nationwide has had the autonomy to tailor systems to its own needs. In addition, the department's six divisions that send platoons of trial attorneys into courtrooms have developed separate case management systems. … The Justice system forms an important part of the Office of Management and Budget's Case Management System Line of Business. … That line of business also includes the FBI's failed Virtual Case File and its successor, the fledgling Sentinel project. OMB also has directed Justice, leader of the case management line of business project, eventually to develop an administrative case management system." GCN adds, "LCMS is intended to serve as a template for other litigation case management systems used by attorneys across the federal government. … 'The Department's Antitrust, Criminal, Civil Rights, Civil, Environment and Natural Resources, and Tax divisions, as well as the U.S. Attorney's offices, will use the LCMS to facilitate the transfer of information through the use of common solutions and data standards,' Justice said in a statement."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

NASD Drops Civil Case Against Quattrone. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Smith) reports, "Wall Street regulators dropped civil charges against Frank Quattrone, giving the former investment-banking star his third win in three months in cases that arose from the Internet-stock bubble of 1999-2000. … He still faces a possible retrial on criminal obstruction-of-justice charges." The Journal continues, "The National Association of Securities Dealers this week withdrew "spinning" charges first brought in March 2003 that Mr. Quattrone improperly used the lure of sought-after initial public offerings to win financing business as head of technology banking at the then-named Credit Suisse First Boston securities unit of Credit Suisse Group, now simply Credit Suisse. The NASD also dropped stock-research bias charges. … In a statement, Mr. Quattrone said he had 'complied with the rules and regulations' throughout his 23-year career in banking and was 'pleased that justice has been done.' The NASD asked to withdraw the charges because many potential witnesses weren't any longer under its jurisdiction as registered securities-industry employees, and thus couldn't be compelled to testify. Quattrone lawyer Kenneth Hausman also argued witnesses' memories might be impaired because the case was based on events that occurred between 1998 and 2001, five to eight years ago."

The New York Times (6/2, Sorkin) reports, "The decision comes just two months after a federal appeals court overturned his conviction on charges of obstruction of justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission reversed a decision to ban him for life from the securities industry. … If prosecutors decide against retrying Mr. Quattrone, speculation is already rife that he could return to deal making in the Valley, where he helped companies like Cisco Systems and Amazon.com go public." The Times adds, "Yesterday's decision by NASD, which polices the brokerage industry, to dismiss its own case is notable because it was the accusations in the case — that he illegally doled out hot initial public offerings to corporate clients in exchange for business — that prosecutors later cited in his criminal trial to suggest that he was trying to cover up that activity and obstruct justice. … The dismissal is also notable because Mr. Quattrone's former firm, Credit Suisse First Boston, now Credit Suisse, paid $100 million to settle similar charges against the firm with the NASD in 2002. … Still, Mr. Quattrone faces the possibility that prosecutors could bring the obstruction of justice case against him again. But some legal experts suggested that with the dismissal of the NASD's 2003 case, momentum might be building for the criminal case to be extinguished, too."

The AP (6/2) reports, "Quattrone was the king dealmaker of the Internet stock boom who made a fortune helping bring some of the hottest new Internet companies to the market at his Wall Street investment bank, Credit Suisse First Boston, which has since changed its name to Credit Suisse (USA) Inc. He was convicted in May 2004 on federal charges of obstruction of justice, after his first trial ended in a hung jury. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the conviction in March, granting Quattrone a third trial. … The NASD in March 2003 had charged Quattrone with 'spinning' - giving corporate executive clients the chance to buy into coveted initial public offerings as a way to win their companies' investment-banking business - from July 1998 to December 2001. The hearing officer on Wednesday granted a motion by the organization's enforcement department to withdraw the charges. … Quattrone had asserted that he was not responsible for making or supervising IPO allocations at CSFB and that NASD rules did not prohibit the conduct in question."

Uncharged Enron Directors Lie Low After Guilty Verdicts. The Washington Post (6/2, D01, Masters) reports, "A week after a Houston jury convicted former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay of fraud, one of the Houston oil company's onetime directors says he still can't believe Lay knew about accounting schemes that caused the firm's 2001 implosion. … 'I'm convinced he didn't know what was going on. . . . I just can't bear the picture of him going off to jail,' said Charls E. Walker, a Potomac-based economist and lobbyist who joined the Houston energy company's board before it was known as Enron." The Post continues, "As for his own role as a member of the board of directors from 1985 to 1999, Walker, 82, is regretful. 'I was duped. Part of the problem was putting so much confidence in Ken's integrity and ability. . . . We were taken for a ride.' … Walker is unusual among the 18 former Enron directors in that he is still willing to talk about the company and the role he played in it. All of the others either declined to comment or failed to return messages left at their homes and workplaces." The Post adds, "After enduring widespread public criticism and congressional scrutiny in 2001 and 2002 for failing to spot or stop Enron's mounting financial troubles, most of the board members have largely gone underground. Many of them resigned from -- or did not run again for seats on -- a number of corporate boards, and those who are still in the public eye have largely removed references to Enron from their biographies. … Compared with Lay and other top Enron executives who face lengthy prison terms, the former Enron directors got off lightly. They have faced no government sanctions, and their personal financial costs have been relatively small. Yet outside directors are almost never held responsible for corporate malfeasance, and the fact the Enron's former directors paid any price at all is testament to the depth of public anger over the collapse of what was once ranked the nation's seventh-largest company. … The Securities and Exchange Commission has not taken any formal action against the former Enron directors, but Enron investors sued them, alleging that all 18 had engaged in insider trading by selling shares while they knew more than the public about Enron's complicated financial structures."

Pitt Says Options Backdating Scandal Highlights Need For Improved Internal Controls. In a Financial Times op-ed (6/2), former SEC Chairman Harvey Pitt says, "We now have an unfolding scandal over alleged backdating of option grants to senior executives. Even though it is unlikely we will find much of this misconduct occurring after Sarbanes-Oxley was enacted, this is more than of historical interest. There are important lessons to be learnt from this scandal." Options backdating "calls a company's internal controls into question. Many discussions of backdating options start with the observation that backdating is not, per se, illegal. That is wrong." Backdating is "not only illegal and unethical, it points to a lack of integrity in a company's internal controls. With more and more companies being identified as having a backdating problem, the issue for regulators, prosecutors and plaintiffs' attorneys is who was at fault. Already, executives have resigned or been fired, with more casualties sure to follow. But from the company/shareholder perspective, the question is more properly one of how to move forward. For that, solutions must start with the board of directors and its compensation committee."

CRIMINAL LAW:

ABC Poll Finds 86% Support FBI Search Of Congressional Offices. ABC News (6/1, Langer) reports on its Web site, "In the rift between Congress and the Justice Department, Americans side overwhelmingly with law enforcement: Regardless of precedent and the separation of powers, 86 percent say the FBI should be allowed to search a Congress member's office if it has a warrant. That view is broadly bipartisan, this ABC News poll finds, ranging from 78 percent among Democrats to 94 percent of Republicans," and "support for FBI searches is about equally high whether people see Congress as honest or not." ABC notes that the poll "was conducted by telephone May 26-30, 2006, among a random national sample of 1,044 adults. The results have a three-point error margin."

Fox News' Special Report with Brit Hume (6/1) briefly reported the poll results in its "Political Grapevine" segment, noting, "Despite the constitutional howls from Capitol Hill, Americans seem to have no problem with FBI raids on congressional offices."

Meanwhile, in a USA Today (6/2, 2.31M) column, Chuck Raasch writes that the Jefferson case "would make the writers of the Constitution cringe. … There are serious constitutional issues at stake. But the way that leaders in the House of Representatives reacted looked on Main Street like yet another example of Washington politicians putting themselves above the law." Raasch adds, "Had the average American been suspected of doing what Jefferson is alleged to have done, no one in Congress would have protested when the FBI came knocking."

FBI-Hastert Rift Appears To Be Cooling. The White House Bulletin (6/1) reported, "Anger in FBI ranks over House Speaker Dennis Hastert's charge that they went too far when seizing papers" from Jefferson's office "appears to be cooling, according to both sides. 'I think it's over and they know what we meant. It wasn't a slam on them,' said a House leadership official regarding, and FBI officials "said that their anger at Hastert's claim that the FBI had crossed constitutional boundaries has waned after the affair erupted last week." Still, "some leadership officials remain worried that hearings into the document raid could again enflame relations and are hoping that they end without any acrimonious charges from the Judiciary Committee. … Meanwhile, leadership officials said they hope the whole episode sent a message to the White House that the GOP expects better communication from the West Wing and federal agencies than they've seen in recent months, a problem dating back at least to the Dubai ports scandal."

Both DOJ, Congress Said To Have Overreached In Jefferson Search. The New York Times (6/2, Liptak, 1.19M) reports, "The Justice Department is probably correct in saying that it was legally entitled to search" Rep. William Jefferson's office. "But in ignoring history and established conventions in that case, some legal scholars say, the Bush administration has again unsettled widely shared understandings of constitutional relationships and freedoms that have existed for generations." The Times adds that "having the legal power to conduct a search of another branch of government does not mean it is a wise or prudent thing to do. … At the same time, Congressional leaders may have overreached in describing the search as a flagrant violation of the Constitution."

Dionne Says House Hearing Was Attempt To Pressure DOJ Over Probes. In his Washington Post (6/2, 744K) column, E.J. Dionne compares the House Judiciary hearing on the Jefferson search to a brushback pitch in baseball, writing that "Rep. James Sensenbrenner's committee was really sending a message as the House confronts a far-reaching corruption investigation: Nice little Justice Department you have there, Mr. Attorney General. Too bad if anything were to happen to it. Stop messing with us before we mess with you." Dionne adds, "So keep an eye on the leadership of the Justice Department. Here's hoping that it resists political pressure -- whether from Congress or the White House -- and allows its prosecutors to proceed with legitimate investigations of corruption."

Jefferson Said To Have Been Undone By Love Of Money. The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Simmons, Fiore, 958K) reports Rep. Jefferson was "once famous in Louisiana circles as the sharecropper's son who made his way to Harvard, steered by parents who preached the value of education. Today, Jefferson is infamous nationally as the Louisiana Democrat who stashed $90,000 of alleged bribe money in his kitchen freezer." Those who "have watched his career's spectacular rise and potential fall believe the terrible poverty he escaped was ultimately his undoing. He rose to become his state's first African American congressman since Reconstruction, but people who know him say he still had a thirst for wealth." New Orleans political consultant Allan Katz said, "His perceived flaw among his peers has always been that, shaped by his humble beginnings, Bill loved money and desperately wanted to be a rich man."

Roots Of Controversy Said To Lie In Constitution. Voice of America (6/2, Malone) reports, "A controversy over federal agents raiding the office of a congressman has its roots in the formation of the U.S. Constitution more than 200 years ago." VOA continues, "In the early days of the American Republic, the revolutionaries who won independence from Britain were determined not to replace a powerful English monarch with an equally potent American president. … So the founders devised a system of separate powers whereby the Congress made the laws, the executive branch, led by the president, enforced the laws, and the judicial branch, led by the Supreme Court, interpreted the laws to make sure they conformed with powers set forth in the U.S. Constitution." VOA adds, "Lawmakers upset with the FBI raid on Congressman Jefferson's office are concerned with what they view as an attempt by the executive branch, in the form of the Justice Department, to intimidate a member of the legislative branch. … Charles Tiefer is a law professor at the University of Baltimore in Maryland. He testified at a recent hearing called by members of Congress angry about the search of Congressman Jefferson's office. … 'Now this raid had all the elements of unconstitutional executive intimidation,' he said. … Another witness, George Washington University law Professor Jonathan Turley, said the office search represented a break in tradition that goes back 219 years to the formation of the Constitution in 1787." VOA notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says his department has the right to investigate allegations of corruption in Congress and is respectful of the separation of powers. … 'Personally, in the department collectively, we have a great deal of respect for the Congress as a co-equal branch of government, as a separate and independent branch of government,' said Mr. Gonzales."

Tampa Tribune Calls Constitutional Criticism Of FBI Search "Wildly Overblown." The Tampa Tribune (6/2) editorializes, "Many members of Congress are outraged that the FBI raided the offices of Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson and took legislative files along with the evidence they sought for a bribery investigation. But accusations that the FBI trampled the doctrine of separation of powers are wildly overblown. … The Constitution anticipated attempts to harass Congress," but "the writers of the Constitution never envisioned an office hideout for elected felons." The Tribune adds, "If rumors are true about the breadth of the improper generosity of certain lobbyists, those assigned to write the guidelines have no time to dally."

More Commentary. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (6/2), Dan K. Thomasson writes, "Congress' relationship with the FBI always has been Frankenstein-like with the father of the monster regarding his creation with cautious affection rooted in fear. The result has been fawning accommodation and unlimited tolerance for whatever the bureau demands, no matter how outrageous or unwarranted, a willingness to excuse what clearly was the inexcusable from Waco to Ruby Ridge to 9/11. … Now the bureau's woes have been exacerbated by the Jefferson affair resulting in outrage from the leaders of both parties in Congress and embarrassment to a president who badly needs a better relationship with the legislative branch. … While this encroachment can be expected to pass, it clearly is another blow to the FBI's reputation. A number of constitutional scholars believe the action leaps the barrier separating the branches of government. … Whatever the reason, the Prometheus that remained unchained so long faces a new challenge to stay that way and to prevent the growing number of lawmakers who would relieve it of its responsibilities from succeeding."

Data Retention Talks Continue Between DOJ, Internet Providers. The AP (6/2) reports, "Top U.S. law enforcement officials have told Internet companies they must retain customer records longer to help in child pornography and terrorism investigations, and they are considering asking Congress to require preservation of records. … Industry representatives are expected to meet Friday with Justice Department officials, a week after Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller first raised the issue with executives from several Internet service providers, including AOL, Comcast Corp., Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc." The AP continues, "The subject has prompted alarm from some executives and privacy advocates, especially after Gonzales' Justice Department took Google to court earlier this year to force it to turn over information on customer searches. Civil liberties groups also have sued Verizon and other telephone companies, alleging they are working with the government to provide information without search warrants on subscriber calling records. … Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, who attended the first meeting, said Thursday that some executives raised privacy concerns at the meeting. But she said Gonzales has not made any decisions about how to proceed and that the department would be mindful of the privacy issue. … 'We are looking at whether requiring longer data retention or asking ISPs to do it informally is something we want to pursue,' Brand said. … Mueller suggested a period of two years and said terrorism investigations also would be helped by such a rule, several people who attended the meeting said. Gonzales was focused on child pornography cases, they said."

The New York Times (6/2, Hansell, Lichtblau) reports, "The attorney general has appointed a task force of department officials to explore the issue, and that group is holding another meeting with a broader group of Internet executives today," DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. "The department also met yesterday with a group of privacy experts. … The Justice Department is not asking the Internet companies to give it data about users, but rather to retain information that could be subpoenaed through existing laws and procedures, Mr. Roehrkasse said." The Times adds, "While initial proposals were vague, executives from companies that attended the meeting said they gathered that the department was interested in records that would allow them to identify which individuals visited certain Web sites and possibly conducted searches using certain terms. … It also wants the Internet companies to retain records about whom their users exchange e-mail with, but not the contents of e-mail messages, the executives said. The executives spoke on the condition that they not be identified because they did not want to offend the Justice Department. … The proposal and the initial meeting were first reported by USA Today and CNet News.com."

In a front-page story, The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Menn, 958K) reports, "Big Internet and telephone companies are girding to fight" the "unprecedented" request by Gonzales and Mueller, which "would dramatically expand the government's ability to track what people do online and with whom they communicate." The Times notes, "Law enforcement officials would still need some legal instrument, such as a subpoena or search warrant, to look at the data. But FBI agents also have the power to request information secretly, without a court order, through so-called National Security Letters."

The San Jose Mercury News (6/2, Ackerman) reports, "Current regulations require companies to preserve data that is the subject of specific criminal investigations while law enforcement collects evidence that could support a warrant. … 'This is a radical departure from current practices,' said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, who meet with justice department officials Thursday. 'We've opposed it because we think it creates an unnecessary risk to privacy and security of Internet users.' … Brian Roehrkasse, a department spokesman, said the purpose of the meetings with the Internet companies and others is 'to solicit their input and seek their assistance in formulating proposals and recommendations on the issue of data retention.'"

Bloomberg (6/2, Schmidt) reports, "The Justice Department has no legal authority to require companies to keep data on their customers and would need to ask Congress for that ability, Roehrkasse said. He said there has been no decision on how long companies would need to store the records." Bloomberg adds, "New York-based Verizon Communications Inc., the No. 2 U.S. telephone company, and Philadelphia-based Comcast Corp., the largest U.S. cable provider, were among the companies at last week's meeting, Roehrkasse said. AOL is the Internet unit of New York-based Time Warner Inc., the world's largest media company. … Gonzales said in April that Internet service providers had hurt child pornography probes by not keeping data long enough. He said he would personally reach out to chief executive officers of leading providers to resolve the problem. … Earlier this year, the Justice Department sparred with Google over a request for information on its customer searches. In March, a federal judge ordered the Mountain View, California-based company to turn over some of the records demanded by the government."

Maryland Judge Sentences Sniper Muhammad To Six Life Terms. The Washington Times (6/2, Ward) reports, "A Montgomery County judge yesterday sentenced sniper John Allen Muhammad to six consecutive life sentences for his role in the 2002 shootings that terrorized the D.C. metropolitan area. … 'You came into this county and randomly murdered innocent and defenseless people. You would have murdered more people, but you got caught,' Circuit Judge James L. Ryan said to Muhammad, the mastermind of the shootings. … 'The citizens have, to the best of their ability, recovered and will continue to recover,' he said. 'But you, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope, no future.' Muhammad, 45, said nothing but looked at the judge with his arms crossed. … As Muhammad was handcuffed and led out of the Rockville courtroom, family members of the sniper victims and onlookers broke into applause."

The AP (6/2, Manning) reports, "After representing himself throughout the monthlong trial, Muhammad chose not to speak at his sentencing. J. Wyndal Gordon, an attorney helping him, said Muhammad told him, 'I said everything I wanted to say.' … Muhammad was convicted Tuesday of six counts of murder for six of the 10 deadly sniper attacks that terrorized the Washington area in October 2002. He was already under a death sentence in Virginia for a killing there. … This time, Muhammad's young accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, took the stand for the first time to testify against him. Malvo told jurors how the older man, his one-time mentor, trained him to shoot and drew him into a sinister plan to kill people, including children, indiscriminately. … Jurors deliberated less than five hours before finding Muhammad guilty."

The Baltimore Sun (6/2, Siegel) reports, "More than three years after a sniper's bullet felled Conrad Johnson as he stood in the doorway of a Montgomery County bus, Sonia Wills had the opportunity Thursday to confront her son's convicted killer. … Calling John Allen Muhammad the 'devil's advocate,' Wills bore into the 45-year-old Gulf War veteran as he looked downward, toward papers at the defense table. … 'It is a shame you will not look at us to see the lives you have devastated, the lives that you have ruined,' Wills told Muhammad. … Wills was one of four relatives of Muhammad's victims who spoke at a hearing at which he was sentenced to six consecutive life terms with no possibility of parole for sniper shootings in Montgomery County in the fall of 2002."

The Washington Post (6/2, B1, Londoño, Rich) reports, "As his last act in a Maryland courtroom, John Allen Muhammad chose silence. … The man convicted twice of terrorizing the Washington area with a powerful rifle and an impressionable accomplice betrayed no emotion yesterday as relatives of the people he killed spoke of their loss. He remained impassive as a judge sentenced him to six consecutive terms of life in prison without the possibility of parole. … 'You chose the wrong community, sir, to stain with your acts of violence,' Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan told Muhammad." The Post notes, "J. Wyndal Gordon, one of Muhammad's stand-by lawyers, maintained that Muhammad -- who doggedly defended himself during the month-long trial -- is an innocent man who was not allowed to tell his side of the story. … 'We came here in search for justice,' Wyndal said. 'We came here in the search for the truth, to find out what really happened during those 23 days in October. My humble opinion is that we fell short.'" The Post adds, "Outside, State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, flanked by relatives of sniper victims, faced a wall of cameras to hail the sentence. … 'Anyone who suggested that this trial shouldn't be brought to Montgomery County should be ashamed,' he said of people who questioned the need for another trial after Muhammad had been convicted of murder in Virginia. … His deputy, Katherine Winfree, who prosecuted the case, said that although the county is no stranger to violent crimes, Muhammad is in a league of his own. … 'No one has ever stood before a judge in this county with more on his conscience and more crimes to his discredit than John Allen Muhammad,' Winfree said."

Longtime Aide Testifies About Managing Dixon Bribe Money. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/2, Buser) reports, "A longtime aide to Roscoe Dixon testified Thursday the former state senator had him handle bribe money and that Dixon also sometimes directed him to give portions to Kathryn Bowers and other legislators. In his second day on the witness stand in Dixon's federal extortion and bribery trial, Barry Myers watched himself on surveillance tapes telling an informant that Dixon trusted him 'like a son' and that his boss was paranoid and 'scared of his own (expletive) shadow' about getting caught taking payoffs." In a second story, The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/2, Perrusquia) reports, "Reputations went on trial Thursday…when prosecutors played secret tapes that included allegations of payoffs to uncharged politicians. On those tapes…confessed 'bag man' Barry Myers brags to an undercover FBI agent about delivering money to several local public officials. … The taped statements triggered sharp denials from the uncharged parties." The Commercial Appeal adds, "Defense attorney Coleman Garrett, who has portrayed Myers as a crook and a liar, got him to admit he had lied when he was first questioned by the FBI about his Waltz involvement, yet Myers said he did it to protect Dixon."

The AP (6/2, Baird) reports jurors watched surveillance video of Dixon "picking up a stack of $100 bills put before him by an aide and an FBI informant." Myers "said the money was to pay for the senator's help in getting a favorable state law passed for a company called E-Cycle Management," which "Myers and Dixon found out later, was a fake company set up by the FBI to snag state lawmakers and other Tennessee officials looking for bribes." The AP adds, "Agents working on the two-year investigation made hundreds of audio and video recordings, most of them with the help of informant" Tim Willis, "a convicted felon and former business consultant." WPTY-TV Memphis (6/1) noted, "The bribe was not connected to E-Cycle, the dummy company set up by the FBI to target crooked law makers in the Tennessee waltz sting, but it goes back to a scandal involving the Children's Dental Clinic and TennCare certification. Lawyers for the government say tapes like this led to Dixon's investigation."

Under the headline "Tape Shows Dixon Pocket Cash," The Tennessean (6/2, de la Cruz) adds, "Thursday afternoon, Dixon's attorney quizzed Myers on his motives for involving Dixon, suggesting that Myers had no other real source of income. Attorney Coleman Garrett also suggested that the $1,000 Dixon took could have been a campaign contribution and that there were no witnesses who saw Myers turn over more money to Dixon. A Dixon supporter who attended the trial as a spectator said he did not believe the recordings were incriminating." Del Gill said, "You hear them saying to Roscoe, 'I need your support.' Of course, Roscoe will tell a friend, 'You've got my support.'" He also "noted that $1,000 is the same amount other legislators, such as Sen. Jeff Miller, who have not been charged in Tennessee Waltz, got from E-Cycle." WTVF-TV Nashville (6/1) also reported on the tapes and Myers' testimony.

Sorich Lawyer Tries To Undermine Credibility Of Key Prosecution Witness. The Chicago Tribune (6/2, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "The lawyer for Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief aggressively attacked the credibility of a key prosecution witness in the City Hall corruption trial Thursday, suggesting the witness agreed to wear a hidden recording device to shorten his prison stay. Defense attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin portrayed retired city official Daniel Katalinic…as a crook with little choice but to help the federal investigation of alleged corruption in the Daley administration. Katalinic pleaded guilty last year to one mail fraud count, admitting he got $15,000 in bribes from city trucking contractors. He said he hoped his cooperation would earn a lesser sentence." However, The Tribune notes, Katalinic's "testimony provided damning accounts of the roles that Durkin's client, Robert Sorich, and three other city officials allegedly played in city hiring." WLS-TV Chicago (6/1, Schulte) also reported on the cross-examination and noted, "Meantime, prosecutors never played a tape of a conversation Katalinic had with Robert Sorich when the FBI had Katalanic wear a wire. The defense says the tape actually helps exonerate Sorich."

The Chicago Sun-Times (6/2, Korecki, Warmbir, Spielman) reports Katalinic testified yesterday that "political groups competed over the number of city jobs they could give their troops as post-election rewards, and they even complained that the powerful Hispanic Democratic Organization got a larger share." But defense attorneys "attacked…Katalinic's testimony, getting him to grow misty-eyed about his decision to flip for government prosecutors -- and to admit that while political groups did slip lists of names to the Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, there were 'no guarantees' they'd be hired." The Sun-Times adds, "Meanwhile, City Hall disclosed that Mayor Daley's corporation counsel, Mara Georges, has been subpoenaed by the defense and will testify if she is called."

Ryan Lawyers File Motion Seeking New Trial. The AP (6/2, Robinson) reports, "George Ryan's lawyers set the stage Thursday for the former governor's appeal of his racketeering and fraud conviction by filing 70 pages of court papers asking for a new trial on the grounds that juror misconduct 'taints the verdict in this case.' … Much of the document was a painstaking rehashing of the agony that followed the April 18 guilty verdict…when goings-on in the jury room began to come to light," but "it also said that prosecutors had failed to provide adequate proof of the charges and that the judge should have allowed the defense to tell jurors more about what Ryan did when he was in power in Springfield."

Arrest Of Fumo Aides Raises Questions About Charges Against Senator. The AP (6/2, Dale) reports, "The FBI spent three years investigating powerful state Sen. Vincent Fumo…before charging two underlings Wednesday with obstructing justice. A day later, the obvious question remained: What about Fumo?" Defense lawyer William DeStefano said, "It tells me that they're trying to either scare the devil out of these two guys who got arrested to obtain their cooperation, or to put the fear of God into other people. And that sort of tells me that they're not comfortable with their case against the senator." But "others suggested that federal prosecutors – humbled perhaps by the acquittal of some bankers in the Philadelphia pay-to-play scandal – want to build an ironclad case."

In an editorial, The Philadelphia Daily News (6/2) also says that "questions surrounding…Fumo are beginning to pile up. … There's the obvious ones such as, is Fumo guilty of anything? So far, the answer is no, though an investigation is continuing. … Then there's the less obvious question: At what point does a politician mau-mauing a company into doing what could be argued is a public good become criminal activity? … It could be if the feds can prove the other part of their inquiry: whether Fumo benefited politically or personally from expenditures made by Citizens' Alliance. Here the feds may have a convincing case." The Daily News concludes, all of "which prompts this final question: Isn't it time for stricter restrictions on whether politicians should operate foundations at all?"

FBI Affidavit Provides Details Of Fumo Probe. The Philadelphia Daily News (6/2, Davies) reports, "Information contained in a federal affidavit released Wednesday casts some doubt on state Sen. Vince Fumo's claim earlier this year that he had no role in a $310,000 real-estate deal involving electrical contractor Donald 'Gus' Dougherty, whose office was raided by the FBI in January. And Fumo may have directed a nonprofit organization's purchase of as many as two dozen properties in South Philadelphia, the affidavit suggests. … The affidavit said Fumo instructed an unnamed aide 'that he alone would decide which properties are to be purchased' by Citizens Alliance," the nonprofit group. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/2, McCoy, Cattabiani, 423K) provides "a probe primer" detailing what's known about the investigation thus far and notes that in yesterday's affidavit, "the FBI disclosed it was investigating whether Fumo 'engaged in extortion' in seeking money for a nonprofit from two corporations, Peco Energy and Verizon Communications. Verizon balked, but Peco gave $17 million to Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods under secret deals in which Fumo dropped his opposition to the electric giant's business plans."

Analysts Predict Fumo Will Remain In Office, Evade Prosecution. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/2, Mauriello, 261K) reports, "Dubbed by some 'Prince Vince,' Mr. Fumo is unlikely to be shaken off his throne anytime soon, insiders say, despite an FBI investigation into whether he extorted contributions to a Philadelphia charity that were later used to benefit him personally and politically. … The U.S. Department of Justice says more charges and more arrests are possible, but insiders and pundits predict Mr. Fumo will emerge unscathed." The Post-Gazette notes, "The trick now for Mr. Fumo will be avoiding the legal traps being laid out by federal investigators who arrested the two Fumo staffers Wednesday. Attorneys for the men say the arrests were an FBI tactic to get the staffers to cooperate in the investigation," but they "plan to fight the charges and remain loyal to Mr. Fumo, their lawyers told reporters."

FBI Raids Office Of DC Charter School Office Director. The Washington Post (6/1, B3, Haynes, Strauss, 744K) reported, "The FBI raided the office and home of the D.C. school board's executive director of charter schools" Wednesday "as part of an investigation into the possible misuse of hundreds of thousands of dollars in federal and city funds, school board officials and law enforcement sources said. Investigators are focusing on the charter school office," and executive director Brenda L. Belton. "School sources…said authorities also are looking into whether some firms hired by the charter school office were connected to Belton. The sources said that the FBI search of the office began about 7 a.m. and continued for six hours and that numerous boxes of documents were confiscated."

Judge Upholds Admission Of Evidence From FBI Pellicano Search. The AP (6/2) reports, "A federal judge presiding over the trial of a private investigator accused of wiretapping Hollywood celebrities said prosecutors can use evidence gathered in a search of his offices. FBI agents raided Anthony Pellicano's offices in 2002 and found illegal explosives," and Pellicano lawyer Steven Gruel "challenged the legality of the search, saying the raids amounted to a fishing expedition." In a decision made public yesterday, US District Judge Dale S. Fischer "on May 22 concurred with an earlier ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that found the search was valid," but "the judge said her decision doesn't preclude Pellicano from requesting a hearing at which Gruel could call FBI agents to determine if there were any misrepresentations made with the search warrants."

Officials Seek United Response To Maryland Gang Crime. The Washington Times (6/2, Wagner) reports, "Federal, state and local officials who participated in the Maryland Gang Summit yesterday agreed that cooperation is key for fighting the increasing number of criminal gangs in the state." The Times continues, "Gaithersburg Police Detective Patrick Word said yesterday that there are currently about 10,000 gang members in Maryland. The gangs that exist in Maryland include the Bloods/United Blood Nation, Black Guerilla Family, Mara Salvatrucha or MS-13, Tiny Rascal Gangsters, Street Thug Criminals, Hells Angels, Vatos Loco, Pagans and South Side Locos, he said. … More than 300 people attended the day-long summit at the Sheraton Hotel. Participants included Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, sheriffs, federal and state prosecutors, police, mayors, community officials and non-profit organizations."

The Washington Post (6/2, B05, Vogel) reports, "Criminal gangs are operating across Maryland at a level many in the state do not recognize or are unwilling to admit, participants in what was billed as the first Maryland gang summit warned yesterday." The Post continues, "At the Columbia summit, speakers -- who included police detectives, state and federal prosecutors, politicians and representatives of community groups -- described an insidious problem and said law enforcement is often not the solution. The battle to keep young people out of gangs is being fought inside schools and homes, they said, with teachers, parents and social workers on the front line. … Maryland, with its broad socioeconomic and ethnic mix, has become a 'microcosm of gang activity,' according to Assistant U.S. Attorney James Trusty. 'We really have every type of gang activity,' added Trusty, gang coordinator for the U.S. attorney's office for Maryland. 'Our schools and businesses are increasingly in the line of fire.' … The problem drew broad attention in Montgomery County last summer when, on a single day in August, gang fights led to the stabbing of two summer school students at a Silver Spring high school and to a melee at a Wheaton shopping center that left four teenagers wounded. Later that month, 19 Mara Salvatrucha members were indicted on federal racketeering charges."

The Baltimore Sun (6/2, Dolan) reports, "MS-13, the target of a major federal indictment in Maryland last summer, isn't the state's biggest gang problem. The Bloods are. … That is the conclusion reached by the state's leading gang investigators, who presented their latest findings Thursday at a summit in Columbia of 300 law enforcement officers, political leaders and educators." The Sun continues, "MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, originated in Los Angeles among refugees from El Salvador and received national attention in recent years for its rapid spread and violence. … Federal prosecutors charged 19 alleged MS-13 members from Southern Maryland in August." The Sun adds, "Experts said Thursday that it is still the Bloods, who crop up on street corners in Baltimore, in schools in Harford County and in prisons throughout the state, who have the greatest reach. … The daylong conference, funded by a $2 million federal grant to the Maryland U.S. attorney's office, sought to promote local and federal efforts to prevent young people from joining gangs, to encourage current members to quit, and to lock up their leaders."

Alleged Chicago Mob Murderer Seeks Release On Bail. The Chicago Sun-Times (6/2, Warmbir) reports, "Frank Calabrese Sr. has been accused of killing 13 people in mob hits, but his attorney swears he's not a danger to society. So attorney Joseph Lopez is asking a federal judge to release Calabrese…from the Metropolitan Correctional Center while he awaits trial as one of the top mobsters charged in the most important recent criminal case filed against the Chicago mob, called Family Secrets." The Sun-Times notes, "Calabrese Sr.'s chances to get out appear slim. When a fellow defendant, alleged Chicago mob leader James Marcello, charged with three murders in the case asked for bond, the judge denied the request. And the evidence appears extensive against Calabrese."

Texas Death Row Inmate Sparks Debate Over Execution Of Insane. The New York Times (6/2, Blumenthal, Liptak) reports, "Scott Panetti, a death row inmate in Texas, understands that the state says it intends to execute him for the murder of his wife's parents. … But Mr. Panetti, 48, who represented himself in court despite a long and colorful history of mental illness, says he believes that the state's real reason is a different one. He says the state, in league with Satan, wants to kill him to keep him from preaching the Gospel." The Times continues, "That delusion has been documented by doctors and acknowledged by judges and prosecutors. It poses what experts call the next big question in death penalty law now that the Supreme Court has barred the execution of juvenile offenders and the mentally retarded: what makes someone too mentally ill to be executed?" The Times adds, "A three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, recently said Mr. Panetti was sane enough to die. The full court will soon decide whether to hear the case. … Mr. Panetti, in prison now almost 14 years for the killings in 1992 in the quaint Hill Country city of Fredericksburg, has long seemed to exemplify madness, addressing himself to the jury in his trial in 1995 as 'the born-again April Fool,' a schizophrenic healed by God. … In and out of mental institutions 14 times and addicted to drugs and alcohol since he almost drowned as a child and was nearly electrocuted by a power line, Mr. Panetti wore cowboy costumes to court, delivered rambling monologues, put himself on the witness stand and sought to subpoena the pope, Jesus and John F. Kennedy. … Jurors were clearly alienated and took little more than an hour to reject his insanity defense. … They found that Mr. Panetti knew right from wrong and so deserved the death penalty. That is a separate question from whether his mental illness should bar his execution."

Two New York Sex Offenders Arrested For Child Porn Possession. The AP (6/2) reports two North Tonawanda, N.Y., "registered sex offenders have been arrested for allegedly possessing child pornography, federal authorities said Thursday." Jeffrey Frazier, "who was sentenced to 60 days in prison after being convicted in 2003 of sexual abuse and endangering the welfare of a child, was charged following a visit to his home by probation officers." Timothy Brenon "was charged with possessing child pornography four years after his conviction on a charge of possessing a sexual performance by a child, for which he received five years probation."

Connecticut Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Possession. Under the headline "FBI Discovers 117 Images Of Minors On Two Computers," The Middletown (CT) Press (6/1, Engelhardt) reported, "Following a federal investigation, a local man plead guilty on Wednesday to possession of child pornography." Richard Wertheim "waived indictment in U.S. District in Hartford. According to Thomas Carson, spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor, Wertheim could face 10 years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000." According to documents, "Wertheim participated in 'peer-to-peer' file sharing with other Internet users. … Forensic evidence revealed a large amount of child pornography on both of Wertheim's personal computers. According to Carson, the analysis revealed 117 images and videos."

Copyright Piracy Losses Difficult To Calculate. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Fowler) reports, "The plastic in a blank CD or DVD costs less than a quarter. Putting a price on a disc loaded with content is more difficult. … When the music industry finds a CD that has been ripped off by copyright pirates, it says it is worth between $1 and $5. Hollywood says a pirate disc can be worth between nothing and the full retail price of around $25. The software industry sometimes weighs in at more than $200 per counterfeit disc." The Journal continues, "Why is there such a wide range in the estimates? Counting the losses from piracy isn't a science -- it's an art. Police in developing countries like China may count pirated goods at their street value, but companies and industry associations have different, often political, goals behind their counting systems. Now the growing problem of Internet piracy is making gauging losses even harder, and more controversial." The Journal adds, "Police data and surveys can provide estimates of the number of DVDs sold in street pirate markets, and the numbers of songs and programs downloaded off the Internet. But the music, movie and software industries -- which have been hammered by piracy in many developing countries -- face a more vexing problem of reckoning their losses. … Somebody who buys a pirated disc at a steep discount isn't necessarily a lost customer for a full-priced product. In many poor countries, a customer who buys a CD for $1 could never afford to pay $16.95 for a legitimate copy. In countries such as China and Vietnam, many legitimate film titles aren't even allowed on store shelves because of government quotas and censorship standards. Moreover, music industry surveys have found that in some developed markets, 10% to 15% of consumers actually spend more money on legitimate music when they're also downloading songs illegally."

Former Federal Prosecutor Convertino Reportedly Under Probe In Drug Case. The Detroit News (6/2) reports, "Former federal prosecutor Richard Convertino is under criminal investigation for his handling of at least one other case in addition to the terrorism case for which he was indicted, one of Convertino's lawyers has alleged in a court filing." The News continues, "Lawyer Jeffrey Del Fuoco said in a motion recently filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit that Convertino is under investigation for possible criminal conduct in his handling of a 1998 drug case involving Joseph Stines." The News adds, "Stines, who was convicted of running a cocaine ring around Ypsilanti, has alleged misconduct by Convertino. Stines' lawyer, Carole Stanyar, has filed a motion seeking his release from prison. … 'It has been learned that Mr. Stines' baseless allegations are now the subject of an ongoing criminal investigation into Mr. Convertino's conduct,' Del Fuoco says in a motion filed May 26. … In the motion, Del Fuoco argues that Convertino should be allowed to intervene in the Stines case to protect his interests. If his request is granted, Convertino will be able to introduce evidence and cross-examine witnesses. .. Both parties involved, Stines and the U.S. government, allege misconduct by Convertino, Del Fuoco says in the motion."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Allows McCallum Questioning Over Tobacco Case. The AP (6/2) reports, "A judge ruled Thursday that Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum must undergo questioning in a lawsuit, a decision that is helpful to a private group seeking records about the Justice Department's conduct in a landmark case against the tobacco industry." The AP continues, "The action by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan is the latest problem related to McCallum's nomination as the Bush administration's choice to become ambassador to Australia. … Democratic Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois is blocking McCallum's nomination over allegations the No. 3 official at the Justice Department improperly influenced the government's lawsuit against cigarette manufacturers." The AP adds, "Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington sued last year after the department ignored the testimony of one of its own witnesses in the tobacco trial and reduced the amount the Bush administration is seeking from the tobacco industry from $130 billion to $10 billion. … CREW says the department has failed to produce a single responsive document to demands for information under the Freedom of Information Act."

The Financial Times (6/2, Washington) reports, "The judgment does not give Crew the latitude to interview Mr McCallum, the associate attorney-general nominated by President George W. Bush to be ambassador to Australia, on the underlying facts of the case. … But Crew says the deposition will shed light on whether the department sought to cover up its decision-making process by wilfully ignoring requests under the Freedom of Information Act." The Times adds, "The judge's ruling is the latest chapter in a long-running saga about whether a decision by the government last year to reduce the amount of penalties it was seeking from tobacco companies – from $130bn initially to $5.2bn – was politically motivated. … Reports in the Washington Post and other newspapers last June suggested that the government's decision to change its position on the five-year civil racketeering case against the tobacco industry was made over the objection of career lawyers at the Justice Department."

DOJ Requests Documents From Career Education. Crain's Chicago Business (6/2, Ryan) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has outlined the nature of its inquiry into Career Education Corp., almost two years after an investigation was first reported." Crain's continues, "On Tuesday the department asked the Hoffman Estates-based operator of for-profit schools to supply documentation of the way job placement rates and tuition costs were presented to current and prospective students at particular schools. The company was also asked to provide details about the way it compensates admissions officers, the way federal Pell Grants are used at one school, and the calculation of student refunds at another school, according to a Thursday filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. … 'We received a letter from the Civil Division of the U.S. Department of Justice advising us that it is reviewing allegations that certain of our schools may have submitted false claims to the U.S. Department of Education,' the Career Ed said in its SEC filing. A Justice Department probe was first reported in August 2004. Tuesday's SEC filing referred to the review as 'informational.'"

The Motley Fool (6/2, Duprey) reports, "Only last week, Career Education, the country's second-largest for-profit chain of colleges, announced that the Education Department had satisfactorily concluded its financial review of the company and might allow it to graduate to making acquisitions once again. … But (on Thursday), the company announced that the Justice Department was giving it detention again, investigating allegations that some of Career Education's schools had submitted false claims or statements to the Education Department. The DOJ also wants information related to compensation for admissions personnel, the use of Pell Grant funds at one school, and student refund calculations at another." Motley Fool adds, "The company, and indeed much of the industry, has been dogged by allegations of misrepresenting graduation and job-placement rates, lowering admission standards, and paying recruiters to get warm bodies in their classrooms. Last year, Apollo was fined $9.8 million for admitting unqualified students to boost enrollment at its University of Phoenix online campus. … Yet while these types of charges have been raised many times over the years, most of the complaints have turned out to be unproven. ITT Educational Services was investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice and subsequently exonerated of wrongdoing. And Corinthian College was also given a passing grade by the SEC last year."

DOJ Appeals Ruling In Teen Firefighter Case. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/2) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has appealed a judge's decision that a 14-year-old Delaware County junior firefighter killed while answering an alarm was entitled to death benefits and a place on the National Fallen Firefighters Memorial." The Inquirer continues, "Christopher Kangas' mother hoped to see his name added to that memorial in October, but unless the Justice Department drops its appeal, 'the dream is deferred again,' lawyer Frank W. Daly said yesterday." The Inquirer adds, "Kangas was struck and killed by a car four years ago while racing on his bicycle to Brookhaven Fire Co. No. 52. Local and state officials awarded death benefits to Kangas' mother, Julie Amber-Messick, but the Justice Department said Kangas did not qualify as a public safety officer. … A U.S. Court of Federal Claims judge ruled in Amber-Messick's favor on March 27. Daly said the government had 60 days to appeal and did so at the last minute Tuesday."

Frist's 2000 Senate Campaign Fined $11,000 By FEC. The AP (6/2, Zuckerbrod) reports that the FEC "has determined that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's 2000 Senate campaign violated federal campaign finance laws. The federal agency fined Frist 2000, Inc., $11,000, according to a lawyer representing Frist's campaign and a watchdog group. Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington had filed a complaint last year against Frist's 2000 campaign committee and received the FEC's findings Thursday. The FEC found that Frist 2000, Inc., failed to disclose a $1.44 million loan taken out jointly by the campaign and Frist's 1994 campaign committee." The AP notes, "Federal law requires full disclosure of any loans taken out by campaign committees. Frist's 1994 campaign committee did disclose the loan to the FEC in January 2001, but the 2000 campaign did not, according to the FEC." Jason Torchinsky, "a lawyer representing Frist 2000, Inc., said the campaign settled the FEC complaint. 'What the FEC suggested, we believe would have resulted in double reporting of the loan,' Torchinsky said."

WSJournal Says Federal Prosecutors Should Examine West Virginia CSX Case. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "If the Milberg Weiss indictments are anything to go by, federal prosecutors are finally getting serious about tort lawyer corruption. So let's hope they've also noticed a federal lawsuit in West Virginia that describes some of the most sordid asbestos fraud to date." CSX last year "turned the legal tables on its nemesis -- Pittsburgh-based plaintiffs firm Peirce, Raimond & Coulter -- filing a lawsuit against it and an employee alleging fraud, misrepresentation and negligence." As the CSX case "shows, many of the corrupt practices rampant in silicosis suits got their start in asbestos. If the Justice Department really wants to clean up the trial bar, asbestos-lawsuit fraud is the mother lode."

LATimes Says Supreme Court Whistleblower Ruling Was Correct. The Los Angeles Times (6/2, 958K) says in an editorial that some civil libertarians are "denouncing a U.S. Supreme Court ruling Tuesday against a former Los Angeles prosecutor who says he was disciplined for speaking out against police misconduct. They may want to consider how they would feel if the same decision went against, say, a Bush administration official who was fired for saying that proponents of the president's immigration policy suppressed evidence that illegal immigrants increase crime and disease." The high court "was divided along ideological lines on the case. It held that the Los Angeles County district attorney's office did not violate the free-speech rights of Deputy Dist. Atty. Richard Ceballos by denying him a promotion because of his memo alleging that police officers lied to obtain a search warrant." Whatever "one thinks of Ceballos' actions, the court was right not to blur the distinction between citizen speech and employee speech."

DOJ Asked To Probe Ohio School District's Handling Of Disabled, Minority Students. The Ironton (OH) Tribune (6/2, Caldwell) reports, "Nearly 70 citizens — and one U.S. Congressman — are asking for some federal help to investigate the Rock Hill School District's handling of disabled and minority students, an issue that is already being addressed in three pending legal cases." The Tribune continues, "Though Rep. Ted Strickland has joined in on the request, the effort has been led by Richard Diamond, a vocal opponent to longtime Superintendent Lloyd Evans and parent of a child with disabilities in the school district." The Tribune adds, "Sixty-nine signatures were turned in on a petition asking the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Department of Education to step in, citing a host of allegations, most of which have not been substantiated or are part of three pending legal cases. … 'We know that over the years, parents have asked the Ohio Department of Education and the Justice Department for help but, until now, nothing has happened,' Diamond said in a written release distributed by Columbus attorney Mike Moore, who also represents the three families in the pending legal cases. … Three years ago, Brent and Amanda Unroe filed a lawsuit against the board, claiming Brent Unroe was unlawfully fired from his job as a special education teacher and that their adopted African-American special needs children were discriminated against. … School officials have always denied the allegations and have said in the past that Brent Unroe was terminated for insubordination and inappropriately handling students. … The Unroe case is scheduled for trial next week in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati."

Bush To Promote Gay Marriage Amendment. The AP (6/2, Pickler) reports, "President Bush will promote a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage on Monday, the eve of a scheduled Senate vote on the cause that is dear to his conservative backers." The AP adds, "Bush aides said he would be making his remarks on the subject Monday. … 'The president firmly believes that marriage is an enduring and sacred institution between men and women and has supported measures to protect the sanctity of marriage,' White House spokesman Ken Lisaius said."

US Threatens Suit Over Care At Wisconsin Prison. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (5/31, Zahn) reports, "Female prisoners with mental illness - some as young as 15 - are regularly placed in isolation cells at Taycheedah Correctional Institution, receive little treatment and are given psychotropic drugs for months without monitoring by a physician, a U.S. Justice Department report has concluded." The Sentinel continues, "In a May 2 letter to Gov. Jim Doyle, the assistant attorney general in charge of the Civil Rights Division, Wan J. Kim, called Taycheedah's treatment of inmates with mental illness 'unacceptable' and a violation of their constitutional rights. The letter states that Wisconsin can either voluntarily correct the problems or face possible legal action by the federal government this year." The Sentinel adds, "The Justice Department report was based on a yearlong federal investigation. It does not indicate what prompted the review, and federal officials declined to comment further. … John Dipko, Department of Corrections spokesman, said Tuesday the concerns raised in the report are being taken 'very seriously' and that the state will work with U.S. officials to address them."

New York Gay Couples Seek Right To Marry. The AP (6/2, Hill) reports, "Lawyers for same-sex couples seeking the right to marry in New York told the state's highest court Wednesday they are being treated as 'unequal citizens' and denied a constitutional right." The AP continues, "The 44 couples want the Court of Appeals to follow the lead of high court judges in neighboring Massachusetts and rule that New York's constitution gives same-sex couples the same right to wed that straight couples have always had. … 'We are evolving as a society,' said Terence Kindlon, one of the lawyers representing the couples in four lawsuits before the court, 'and just because we did something 200 years ago, or 100 years ago or 50 years ago, it's not necessarily a good justification to do it now.'" The AP adds, "The couples have lost in lower appeals courts and are at odds with Gov. George Pataki's health department and state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer's office, which claim New York law prohibits issuing licenses to same-sex couples."

WPost Examines Current State Of Black Men. The Washington Post (6/2, A1, Fletcher, 744K) reports in a front page story that it will run a series of stories in African American men, saying, "More than 50 years after the publication of Ralph Ellison's 'Invisible Man,' black men appear more visible than ever -- a freshman senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, is the American Idol of national politics, and Will Smith is perhaps the most bankable star in Hollywood. Yet black men who put their kids through college by mopping floors, who sit at home reading Tennyson at night, who wear dreadlocks but design spacecraft, say it sometimes seems as if the world doesn't believe they exist. The dueling realities of their history -- steady progress and devastating setbacks -- continue to burden many black men in ways that are sometimes difficult to explain."

WSJournal Criticizes Hawaii Reorganization Act. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M) says in an editorial that the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act is "secessionist, unconstitutional and un-American. And that was being kind. Our view of the bill -- which, like Freddy Krueger, refuses to die -- hasn't changed. But now that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has promised to bring it to a cloture vote in the coming days, it's worth reminding readers what this ugly drama from the beautiful state is all about." The Reorganization Act – "better known as the Akaka Bill, after its U.S. Senate sponsor, Democrat Daniel Akaka," could "also lead to discriminatory treatment of non-Native Hawaiians, who already are excluded from private schools run for the exclusive benefit of the Natives. Vast tracts of land (entire islands, perhaps) might also be set aside exclusively for Native use. The Office of Hawaiian Affairs, a state agency, acknowledges that the Akaka Bill allows for the 'complete legal and territorial independence from the United States and the re-establishment of a Hawaiian nation-state.' Years, if not decades, of litigation would follow its passage."

Michigan Minimum-Service Real Estate Legislation Moves Forward. Inman News (6/2, Roberts) reports, "A proposal to require real estate agents and brokers to provide a specific set of services for their clients is moving forward in the Michigan Legislature, despite opposition from the U.S. Department of Justice, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and a state regulatory agency." Inman continues, "House Bill 4849 and House Bill 4850, companion bills that passed a state Senate committee in a 4-0 vote Wednesday, provide that real estate licensees who enter into service agreements with clients must provide certain services for that client, including acceptance and delivery of offers and counteroffers; assistance in developing, communicating, negotiating and presenting offers, counter-offers and related documents or notices; and furnishing or causing to be furnished a complete and detailed closing statement." Inman adds, "In October 2005, after the Michigan state House of Representatives voted 105-3 to pass the bills, the Federal Trade Commission and Justice Department sent a letter to a state Senate committee chairman and the director of the Michigan Department of Labor and Economic Growth to express opposition, citing concerns about the possible anti-competitive and anti-consumer effects of the legislation. … The language in the bills is similar to other state legislation, sometimes referred to as minimum-service legislation, that has passed in other states despite similar federal objections. The Michigan Association of Realtors is supporting the bills, which could reach the state Senate floor as soon as next week. In other states, too, Realtor trade groups have endorsed the legislation as pro-consumer. … Opponents of minimum-services legislation have said that such efforts could serve to limit consumer choice for real estate services, while supporters have said the legislation ensures that real estate consumers will receive adequate service in real estate transactions."

eBay Launches E-Mail Campaign In Net Neutrality Battle. CNET News (6/2, McCullagh) reports, "eBay this week unleashed a political machine that should make politicians envious: a national e-mail blast over Net neutrality." CNET continues, "Meg Whitman, chief executive of the Internet auctioneer, called on more than a million eBay members to get involved in the debate over telecommunications laws and 'send a message to your representatives in Congress before it is too late.' … 'The telephone and cable companies in control of Internet access are trying to use their enormous political muscle to dramatically change the Internet,' Whitman wrote. 'It might be hard to believe, but lawmakers in Washington are seriously debating whether consumers should be free to use the Internet as they want in the future.'" CNET adds, "This is the first time that eBay has used e-mail to urge its members to weigh in on a national issue, and also the first time Whitman sent it out under her own name, the company said Thursday. … eBay--which has been active in a pro-Net neutrality coalition for years--confirmed that more than a million e-mails have been sent out so far, but declined to offer a more specific number. The campaign is ongoing."

Inco Will Not Sell More Assets To Win Antitrust Nod For Falconbridge Buy. Bloomberg (6/2, Alexander) reports, "Inco Ltd. said it doesn't expect to have to sell more than a Norwegian metals refinery to win U.S. and European regulatory approval for its C$19.5 billion ($17.7 billion) takeover of Canadian mining company Falconbridge Ltd." Bloomberg continues, "The deal, which would create the world's largest nickel producer, is being reviewed by regulators and Toronto-based Inco has offered to sell Falconbridge's Nikkelverk refinery in Kristiansand, Norway, and 'related marketing organizations' as a remedy to get approvals. … 'My view is that the remedy we propose should be adequate,' Inco Chief Executive Officer Scott Hand said today in an interview. 'I'm confident we'll get the clearance that we need.' … The European Commission, the EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, held a closed-door hearing May 29 to discuss Inco's proposals and antitrust concerns. The EC on Feb. 24 opened a four-month probe of the deal. A ruling is due by July 12. … The transaction, which has already been cleared by Canadian authorities, is also under review by the U.S. Department of Justice."

Rambus Releases E-Mails From Micron, Hynix In Chip Antitrust Case. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, A8, Clark) reports, "Newly released emails from Micron Technology Inc. and Hynix Semiconductor Inc. provide some of the first details of a global conspiracy to raise prices on memory chips and could support allegations by Rambus Inc. in a closely watched antitrust case." The Journal continues, "The messages were gathered by Hynix and Micron and provided to Rambus, which disclosed them to The Wall Street Journal. The Silicon Valley technology company has filed private antitrust claims in San Francisco County Superior Court against Micron, Hynix and Samsung Electronics Co., makers of memory chips that have been implicated along with Infineon Technologies AG in a long-running Justice Department price-fixing investigation. … The emails, mainly among sales personnel at Micron and Hynix, refer to other messages, phone calls, lunches and meetings among direct competitors in the memory-chip business. In some cases, the messages suggest competitors traded information in an effort to keep chip prices up." The Journal notes, "The conspiracy allegations have been a black eye to makers of memory chips, long considered one of the most competitive segments of high technology. The products at issue -- known as DRAMs, for dynamic random-access memory chips -- have become essential for many kinds of products, including computers and consumer-electronics devices. … The Justice Department investigation, launched in 2002, has so far resulted in more than $731 million in fines and guilty pleas negotiated with four companies -- Samsung, Hynix, Infineon and Elpida Memory Inc. -- and jail terms and fines for 12 individuals. … The Justice Department says the conspiracy hurt computer makers that included Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc. and Gateway Inc. In plea agreements, the defendants admitted discussing memory-chip prices to be charged to particular customers, agreeing on price levels and exchanging information to monitor adherence to those agreements. … But the Justice Department documents provide few details about how the conspiracy operated, and little about the involvement of Micron, the only U.S.-based company implicated in the probe."

The Financial Times (6/2, Nuttall) reports, "Shares in Rambus, a US memory chip designer, rose nearly 20 per cent on Thursday after it released emails in support of its antitrust litigation against chip manufacturers Samsung and Hynix of Korea and Micron of the US. … But Micron responded that the emails collected during a Department of Justice price-fixing investigation were unrelated to the San Francisco lawsuit where Rambus accuses the three of trying to exclude it from the memory market. The emails made available by Rambus were the result of its successful court action to get evidence unsealed to help its case." The Times continues, "One email sent in June 2001 by Linda Turner, an international sales vice president for Micron at the time, comments on Hynix lowering its prices for DDR (Double Data Rate) memory. … 'No problem!' she writes. 'We want DDR to explode in the marketplace so have actually been requesting Infineon, Samsung and Hynix to lower their DDR pricing to help it become a standard and drive Rambus away completely.' … Other Micron emails suggest the company's salesforce is concerned at pricing of DDR, with major PC manufacturers Dell and Compaq seeming to prefer RDRAM (Rambus Dynamic Random Access Memory) chips designed by Rambus." The Times notes, "Daniel Francisco, spokesman for Micron, said yesterday: 'Rambus has attempted to bootstrap the DoJ price-fixing investigation into a supposed boycott of Rambus Dram.' … 'Rambus Dram was a failure in the marketplace because it was too costly and any performance differentials were not sufficient to justify the inherent cost differences.'"

NYTimes Praises NYSE Deal To Buy Euronext. The New York Times (6/2, 1.19M) supports the NYSE Group's plans to expand by reaching "a deal for the cross-border European exchange company Euronext. If approved by regulators and shareholders, it would be the first trans-Atlantic market, though the rival Nasdaq has already bought up a 25 percent stake in the London Stock Exchange. Rather than leading the way, the exchanges are catching up to the reality of internationalized investing." If "a combined company can pass the fruits of those savings on to the average investor — not to mention added ease in buying shares of foreign companies — we're all for it."

ENVIRONMENT:

US, Alaska Seek $92 Million More For Exxon Valdez Cleanup. The New York Times (6/2, Barringer) reports, "When the Justice Department and the State of Alaska reached their $900 million court settlement with the Exxon Corporation over the environmental damages caused by the Exxon Valdez oil spill, they agreed that, if unforeseeable damages occurred later, the two governments had 15 years to ask for $100 million more. … On Thursday, with the deadline approaching, the governments exercised this clause. They announced in a statement that they would seek $92 million from Exxon Mobil to clean up stubborn patches of oil, whose most toxic components, they say, have not dissipated since the spill in 1989." The Times continues, "Federal and state lawyers said in statements that they believed the lingering oil was still interfering with the recovery of animals in the area. The worries, environmentalists say, are focused on species that frequent the intertidal areas of Prince William Sound, like clams, mussels and harlequin ducks. … With this action, 'we are aggressively seeking to restore natural resource damages unforeseen at the time of the 1991 settlement,' said Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant attorney general for the Environment and Natural Resources Division of the Justice Department, in a statement. 'Our goal throughout this process has been to pursue all scientifically and legally appropriate means of restoration.'"

The Washington Post (6/2, A4, Mufson, Eilperin) reports, "Exxon has already paid $900 million for damage caused by the spill, the worst in the nation's history, but the 1991 agreement settling claims allowed the state and federal governments to ask for as much as $100 million more for damage that could not be foreseen at that time. The deadline for reopening the agreement is today. … 'After extensive review it is clear that populations and habitat within the oil spill area have suffered substantial and unanticipated injuries that are attributable to the Exxon Valdez oil spill,' said Alaska Attorney General David W. Márquez. In a background briefing yesterday, officials from the Agriculture, Interior and Commerce departments said the additional money was needed because substantial amounts of oil remained in the sound's tidal basin, affecting clams, mussels, sea otters, sea ducks -- especially harlequin ducks -- and other birds." The Post adds, "Exxon disputed the governments' move. 'Exxon will study this request carefully and respond as appropriate,' the company said in an e-mailed statement. 'Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified.'"

CNN.com (6/2) reports, "The Valdez ran aground in 1989 and leaked 11 million gallons of crude oil, polluting more than 1,000 miles of Alaska's shore and killing tens of thousands of birds and marine animals. … The company said it agrees that 'small pockets of sequestered and degraded oil residues' remain in spots on less than two-tenths of 1 percent of the affected shoreline. But it said 'there is no scientific evidence that this oil ... could cause damage to any population or species. Speculation and hypothesis do not amount to proof.'" CNN notes, "ExxonMobil also said the existence of small pockets of residue was expected at the time of the 1991 agreement and noted that about $145 million of the $900 million paid by Exxon to the oil spill trustees is still available. … 'If there were any matter in Prince William Sound that needed restoration or repair, it was the trustees' duty to use this money to remedy the problem, and we are confident that they would have done so,' the statement said."

The Financial Times (6/2, Mcnulty) reports, "Yet the federal and state governments said there was 'substantial loss of habitat' from the oil. … They said predators that feed in the inter-tidal - primarily harlequin ducks and sea otters - showed reduced survival rates in oiled areas and seemed to avoid locations with extensive lingering oil. … In addition, they said, subsistence users avoid harvesting in oiled areas because of concerns over contamination."

The AP (6/2, Lee) reports, "The state has until Sept. 1 to make financial demands of Exxon Mobil under the reopener provision. State and federal officials were required to provide the company with detailed plans and costs for any rehabilitation project at least 90 days before that date. … Alaska Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski sought to cut the process short by asking Exxon Mobil to voluntarily commit $100 million more to restoring the sound. The company, whose $36.1 billion in earnings last year were the highest ever by any U.S. corporation, rejected that proposal."

Bloomberg (6/2, Schmidt) reports, "The company is appealing to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals a $4.5 billion punitive damage award to fisheries, native Alaskans, cannery workers and landowners over the Valdez spill."

Gold Prospector Hopes To Hit Jackpot In Toxic-Waste Dump. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Carlton) reports, "Dave Pruett has prospected for gold for 46 years in mines from Arizona to the Amazon. He thinks he has finally found his big fortune in a pile of toxic waste in (Buckskin, NV). … Mr. Pruett's hope lies in nearly 200,000 tons of rubble sitting in man-made containment ponds outside a defunct mine. The rubble is laced with cyanide that Nevada regulators say threatens water supplies. But Mr. Pruett believes the pile, which is the waste, or tailings, left over from a previous mine, contains as much as 30,000 ounces of gold. Woven in with crushed rock and other material in a sort of rubble stew, that gold was considered not worth extracting. … But with gold prices having soared, the precious metal in the pile is suddenly worth around $20 million, Mr. Pruett figures. He has begun hauling truckloads of the waste to a larger mine that has facilities to extract the gold. 'Maybe, just maybe, this will be the big one,' Mr. Pruett says." The Journal adds, "The run-up in gold prices over the past few years -- the futures price stood at $627.60 a troy ounce yesterday -- has ignited a mining frenzy in Nevada, the biggest gold-producing state. It has led some mining companies to reopen mines with low-grade reserves that previously weren't profitable to extract. A 26-year high for the U.S. gold price was reached last month, well over $700. … In Nevada, most of the remaining gold lies deep underground, and the state's $3.7 billion-a-year gold-mining industry is dominated by big corporations with the technology and machinery to dig it out. But here and there are a few small-stake prospectors -- independent fortune seekers like Mr. Pruett who are a throwback to the gold rushes of yore. 'He's a dying breed,' says Royce Hackworth, owner of a drilling company in Elko, Nev. … The 68-year-old Mr. Pruett is racing against the chance gold prices may crash again. He rarely takes a day off as he shuttles between his pile, about 80 miles southeast of Reno, and a larger mine 350 miles away that extracts the gold. On a recent day, Wayne Monyihan and Wayne Monyihan Jr. -- a father-and-son team who call themselves the Sagebrush Express -- were each set to haul 20 tons of his ground-up waste rock on their 18-wheel tractor-trailers."

Greenpeace Memo About Bush Policies, Armageddon Was "A Joke." The Washington Post (6/2, A17, 744K) reports the environmental activist group Greenpeace "wanted to be prepared to counter President Bush's visit last week to Pennsylvania to promote his nuclear energy policy. 'This volatile and dangerous source of energy' is no answer to the country's energy needs, shouted a Greenpeace fact sheet, decrying the 'threat' posed by the reactors Bush visited in Limerick." But "after that assertion, the Greenpeace authors were apparently stumped while searching for the ideal menacing metaphor. 'In the twenty years since the Chernobyl tragedy, the world's worst nuclear accident, there have been nearly [FILL IN ALARMIST AND ARMAGEDDONIST FACTOID HERE],' the sheet said." Greenpeace spokesman Steve Smith "told the Web site that a colleague was making a joke in a draft that was then mistakenly released."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Bush Administration Seeks To Reduce Meth Use. The AP (6/2) reports the Bush administration "wants to cut methamphetamine use in the United States by 15 percent by 2009, relying on cooperation with Mexico and steps at home that include expanded random drug testing in schools. … Fewer than 600,000 Americans use meth, just two-tenths of 1 percent of the nation's population, according to administration estimates. But more than the half the nation's counties count meth as their top problem, said John Walters." There are more than 50 media references to this story. The AP story was published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of CBS News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, Arizona Republic, Kansas City Star, and Fort Worth Star Telegram.

Scripps Howard News Service (6/1) writes, "The U.S. government announced a new synthetic drug control strategy Thursday that calls for a 15 percent reduction in methamphetamine and prescription drug abuse in three years. 'Although teen drug use in the United States has dropped by nearly 20 percent over the last three years,' said John Walters…'we will not let up on the pressure being applied to the methamphetamine market. The aggressive measures called for in the synthetics strategy build upon significant progress already made as a result of law enforcement efforts.'"

From its Washington, D.C. bureau, the Des Moines (IA) Register (6/1) reports the national meth strategy "included recommendations to increase random testing of school students and use of special courts to handle drug addicts. The administration said that much of the production of U.S.-consumed meth has shifted to larger labs in Mexico and other countries. U.S. and Mexican officials said they are working to cut the flow of precursor chemicals to Mexico and to shut down labs in that country."

On its Web site, ABC News (6/1) reports the strategy is a global approach to curb the production and use of meth. ABC adds that John Walters said, "This represents a commitment of the administration to work toward a meaningful and a sustained reduction in meth use as well as the number of meth labs that have been poisoning too many communities." ABC notes the goal "is to cut methamphetamine abuse 15 percent by 2008 and reduce the production from illegal meth labs in the United States by 25 percent."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (6/1, 1:00 p.m.) reported, "The White House drug policy director is unveiling the administration's master plan for combating the methamphetamine epidemic. John Walters, along with law enforcement and homeland security officials, is announcing a 'synthetic drug control strategy' at this hour. A top diplomat from Mexico is also taking part in the announcement."

CNN (6/1) also reported, "A synthetic drug control strategy is being announced. The strategy aimed at reducing both the supply of and demand for methamphetamine in the US.

Local TV Coverage. KTVU-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (6/1, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "A new crackdown on the production and sale of methamphetamine. Officials at the Department Of Justice said while the [production] of meth is down, the international trade is up. They say the federal government is working to stop global trade of the chemicals used to make meth."

KING-TV, Seattle-Tacoma (6/1, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Methamphetamine is a grave problem in our state, and today in Washington, DC, the Bush administration unveiled a plan to help reduce meth abuse. The goal is to cut meth production by 15% over the next three years."

Individuals, Groups Added To List Of Foreign Drug Kingpins. The AP (6/2) reports, "President Bush added three accused drug traffickers and two reputed crime organizations to the US list of foreign drug kingpins on Thursday, denying them access to the American financial system and barring them from trade with US companies and individuals." The three individuals added to the list were "Dawood Ibrahim of India, Fahd Jamil Georges of Brazil and Ali Naway of Iran. The organizations are the Dawood Ibrahim Organization in India, Pakistan and United Arab Emirates and the Amezcua Contreras Organization in Mexico."

Connecticut Man Sentenced To 15 Years In Drug Conspiracy. The Hartford Courant (6/2, Tasker) reports, "A 32-year-old Hartford (CT) man was sentenced Tuesday to more than 15 years in federal prison for conspiracy to possess crack cocaine with intent to distribute." The Courant continues, "Kaniel 'Beevis' Forrester pleaded guilty on Aug. 23, 2005, to charges that he conspired to possess and distribute between 150 and 500 grams of crack, according to a statement released by the U.S. Justice Department. … Forrester, who his lawyer said has been on the streets since he was about 15, was on probation for a previous narcotics charge at the time of his arrest, federal law enforcement officials said. … Forrester was sentenced to 182 months in prison, and Hussey said he expects Forrester to serve about 10 years of the sentence. He also will have to complete a 500-hour drug program, Hussey said. … Forrester, a father of two, could be deported back to Jamaica after he finishes his sentence and five years of supervised release." The Courant notes, "Operation Big Boy, an investigation run by the FBI and the Hartford police, led to Forrester and his brother, Negus Forrester, after months of surveillance, wiretapping, crack seizures and purchases. … U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said in a sentencing memorandum that the calls were considered evidence by the FBI that Negus Forrester bought crack from an accomplice, and that Kaniel Forrester was involved in the transaction."

California Marijuana Dispensary's Safe Deposit Box Is Searched. The Desert Sun (6/1) reports federal agents "searched a safe deposit box belonging to a Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary earlier this week, prompting accusations of harassment from the dispensary's owner. 'I don't have anything to hide,' said Stacy Hochanadel, owner and operator of CannaHelp in Palm Desert, on Thursday. A spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Los Angeles office declined to comment, citing an ongoing investigation."

Brothers Sentenced In Georgia Crack Cocaine Case. The Athens (GA) Banner-Herald (6/2) reports, "Two Athens brothers will serve long sentences in federal prison after they pleaded guilty to being part of a local cocaine distribution ring. A U.S. District Court judge in Macon…sentenced Antron Ricardo Bishop, 24, and Antonio Ramon Bishop, 22, after they pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. … Since the Bishops and several other conspirators have been arrested, violent crime in the county has decreased, according to Athens-Clarke police Lt. Mike Hunsinger. … A countywide sweep of street-level crack cocaine dealers last July netted more than 80 arrests, and local police have been working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to collar mid-level suppliers." The Banner-Herald says Antron Bishop received a 14-year prison sentence, and his brother was sentenced to just under six years.

Confessed Colorado Drug Runner Sentenced, Agrees To Testify Against Alleged Conspirators. The Brighton (CO) Standard-Blade (6/1) reports, "A confessed drug runner who agreed to testify against his alleged fellow drug conspirators was sentenced May 18 to 7 1/2 years in federal prison. The sentence was slightly higher for 26-year-old Kenneth F. Fuqua of Brighton than prosecutors sought in exchange for Fuqua's continued cooperation with investigators. … Fuqua told investigators with the Drug Enforcement Administration and Boulder County Drug Task Force that he ran drugs between Santiago Mena-Flores, 26, of Henderson, and runners of the drug trafficking ring allegedly run by Donald Jason Skinner, 31, of Longmont. … Children allegedly were used to move the drugs locally."

Man Killed In Texas Blast Faced Federal Firearm, Drug Charges. The Longview (TX) News-Journal (5/31, Ramirez) reports, "A Longview (TX) man died Monday night while making a bomb he intended to use in retaliation against federal agents, local fire officials said." The News-Journal continues, "James Charles Torrence, 38, who faced possible jail time for multiple federal indictments from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Drug Enforcement Administration, died in his North Longview home while putting together one of two homemade bombs. … Torrence made the bombs to retaliate against authorities with both federal law enforcement agencies, whom Torrence believed had built a case against him, according to Brian Howell, Longview Fire Department assistant fire marshal. Documents inside the home listed names of several bureau and administration agents, Howell said." The News-Journal notes, "U.S. Attorney Matt Orwig told The Associated Press that Torrence had agreed to plead guilty to being a felon in possession of a firearm and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine. He said Torrence was set to enter the plea June 7, and the drug charge carried a minimum sentence of 10 years in prison up to life."

The Tyler (TX) Morning Telegraph (5/31, Middleton) reports, "Howell said it is believed Torrence was making pipe bombs to retaliate against individuals he believed 'snitched' on him in connection with a federal case against him. Howell said the individuals Torrence allegedly planned to use the bombs against actually were not related to the case. He told the Tyler Morning Telegraph he does not believe Torrence was targeting law enforcement agents. … Tom Crowley, a public information officer for the Dallas division of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), said via phone that authorities discovered bomb-making literature, firearms and additional bomb-making material inside Torrence's residence."

ATF Probes Suspicious New York Church Fire. The Glens Falls (NY) Post-Star (6/2, Lehman) reports, "Christ Church Episcopal on Route 9 was destroyed by a suspicious fire late Tuesday, a blaze that came two weeks after two burglaries at the church in which religious phrases were scrawled inside the building, officials said. … 'We believe, at this point, the fire was deliberately set,' Warren County Sheriff Larry Cleveland said." The Post-Star continues, "Investigators from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the state Office of Fire Prevention and Control, the Warren County Office of Fire Prevention and the Warren County Sheriff's Department were on the scene, sifting through the charred remnants throughout much of the day Wednesday." The Post-Star adds, "ATF was brought in because federal law requires the agency be notified when a church fire occurs where the cause is not clearly identifiable, said Warren County Fire Coordinator Marvin Lemery. That statute was put in place after a spate of arson fires at southern churches in the late 1990s. … 'Anything where there is something that looks like it could be the least bit suspicious (at a church), you need to notify ATF,' he said. 'That (burglary history) was enough to say we should get these guys in to look whether this was done to cover a burglary or there was something else going on.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Urges Congress To Pass Immigration Reform Bill. The AP (6/2, Loven) reports that in an address to the US Chamber of Commerce, President Bush "pressed a passionately divided Congress on Thursday to reach election-year compromise on immigration legislation that provides a chance at citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants already in the country." Bush "will travel to several cities next week -- Artesia, N.M., Laredo, Texas, and Omaha, Neb. -- to pitch his immigration approach, the White House announced Thursday." The AP adds, "There is skepticism that a compromise can be reached in a year when most of Congress is up for re-election, and many believe Republicans could be at risk of losing their control over one or both chambers."

Much of the reporting on Bush's remarks, which wasn't covered by the network newscasts, analyzes the House-Senate split on immigration, and Bush's attempt to promote the Senate bill without alienating the "GOP base," which is being identified with the House-passed legislation. Analysts, however, don't agree on whether Bush's emphasis yesterday was on challenging House Republicans or on touting his proposals as tough enough on the enforcement side.

The Washington Post (6/2, A4, Baker, 744K), for example, emphasizes the President's statement yesterday that "unscrupulous" employers "have contributed to the illegal immigration crisis in the United States by knowingly hiring undocumented workers, and called for steep new penalties on those exploiting the shadow economy." The President was trying "to emphasize his focus on enforcement and to combat the conservative complaint that his immigration proposals add up to amnesty for millions of foreigners violating US immigration law." Said Bush, "Businesses that knowingly employ illegal workers undermine this law and undermine the spirit of America. … And we're not going to tolerate it in this country."

Also, under the headline "Bush Tries To Regain His Footing On Once-Rock-Solid Conservative Base," USA Today (6/2, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports that "whether...Bush is talking about a get-tough border policy or the importance of judicial restraint -- he discussed both Thursday -- he is sure to throw in an appeal these days to wavering conservative supporters." Bush and his aides "are playing up items such as tighter borders and judges who 'administer the law' rather than make it, seeking to reconnect with conservative Republicans whose support has shrunk in recent polls -- and whose votes will be critical in this fall's congressional elections."

On the other hand, The New York Times (6/2, Stolberg, 1.19M) headlines its story "Bush Chides Party Members On Immigration," and says the President "rebuked conservative opponents of his plan on Thursday and warned that there is 'no excuse' for delay." Said Bush, "It's a difficult task. Yet the difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it." The Post also reports, "Whether Mr. Bush can bring his party's warring factions together remains to be seen." In his speech, Bush "took aim at House members who brand the Senate bill amnesty, though he did not mention any by name. 'Some members of Congress argue that no one who came to this illegally should be allowed to continue living and working in our country,' he said. The lawmakers are 'are acting on deeply felt principles,' he said, but added, 'I also believe that the approach they suggest is wrong and unrealistic.'"

And the Washington Times (6/2, Dinan, 90K) titles its report "Bush Shuns Republicans' Stand To Return Illegals," and says Bush yesterday "rejected House Republicans' stance that illegal aliens must return home, calling it 'wrong and unrealistic' and saying many will have to be allowed to stay." Bush "drew praise yesterday from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, a key Democrat on the issue." But Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, "demanded the president do more to distance himself from the House bill."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Quijano) noted the US Chamber of Commerce "stands firmly behind…Bush's proposal for a temporary guest worker program." CNN added that "what was interesting to note is that today we heard the President, despite being in the friendly environment, have some tough talk, really trying to show that he is serious about enforcing US immigration laws."

On its website, the Wall Street Journal (6/1, Pulizzi, 2.11M) noted Bush also "touted the economy, called for 'fiscal sanity,' and repeated his threat to veto a pending emergency spending bill if it exceeds his spending limit."

Tax Provision Of Senate Bill Called Unconstitutional, Could Derail Bill. The Washington Times (6/2, Hurt, 90K) reports, "The long-fought Senate immigration bill that opponents say grants amnesty to 10 million illegal aliens is unconstitutional and appears headed for certain demise, Senate Republicans now say. A key feature of the Senate bill is that it would make illegals pay back taxes before applying for citizenship, a requirement that supporters say will raise billions of dollars in the next decade." The Times adds, "There's just one problem: The U.S. Constitution specifically prohibits revenue-raising legislation from originating in the Senate." The Times adds, "Republicans -- including the bill's supporters -- say this will kill the bill, and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says he's offered a simple solution." He "wants to attach the immigration bill to a tax bill that has already passed the House. It would then proceed as planned to a 'conference committee,' where negotiators from the House and Senate hammer out differences between the two chambers' immigration bills." But Minority Leader Harry Reid "won't go along with that fix. His office said yesterday that the concerns raised by Mr. Frist and House Republicans are 'technical in nature' and can be ignored."

The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Gaouette, Gerstenzang, 958K) also reports the story, and says the problem "is stalling efforts to appoint a House-Senate conference committee that would try to reach a compromise on the final form of immigration legislation. Those negotiations were expected to difficult at best." But "unless the procedural stumbling block is resolved, the talks won't even start."

CBO Report Finds Senate Bill Would Add 20 Million Legal Immigrants Over 10 Years. The Washington Post (6/2, A4, Fears, 744K) reports, "The nation's population of legal immigrants would increase by nearly 20 million over the next decade if the recently passed Senate immigration bill becomes law, and taxpayers would spend more than $50 billion to operate a new guest-worker program and pay for extra welfare, Social Security and public health-care costs, according to a Congressional Budget Office report." But "the cost of absorbing the newcomers would be offset by a boost of $66 billion in federal revenue from income taxes and payroll taxes generated by the temporary guest-worker program, along with fees that immigrants must pay to participate, the report said."

Immigration Services May Be Unable To Implement Senate Bill. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports the executive branch "might be unable to implement Senate immigration bill even if Congress enacts it. Bill would require immigration service to handle 12 million illegals according to length of U.S. residence, processing some within 90 days. Current capacity 'is not there,' says agency director Emilio Gonzalez, noting the government's 4,000 'adjudicators' already have 'day jobs' processing seven million legal immigrants yearly."

Schwarzenegger To Send Guard Troops To Mexican Border. The AP (6/2, Davis) reports, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger agreed Thursday to send the California National Guard to the Mexican border, ending a 17-day standoff with the Bush administration." The two sides "had been at odds over whether California Guardsmen would join the effort to bolster the Border Patrol and who would pay for it." They "reached an agreement under which California will contribute about 1,000 Guardsmen for border duty and the federal government will pick up the full cost, Schwarzenegger said." The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Nicholas, 958K) also reports the story.

Immigration Is Key Issue In Fight For Cunningham's Seat. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Lueck, 2.11M) reports, "To Brian Bilbray, the 'greatest ethics scandal in America' isn't about Washington lobbyists or the bribery conviction of Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, formerly this area's unbeatable congressman." Bilbray, a former Republican House member seeking Cunningham's vacant seat, "is fighting what he calls the scandal of illegal immigration." He "hopes that tough talk on the campaign trail about securing borders and cracking down on employers who hire illegal workers will bring enough supporters to the polls on June 6 to help him defeat a challenge from Democrat Francine Busby." Busby "takes a softer line on the issue, supporting proposals to allow illegal immigrants to become citizens and create new guest-worker programs." The race, if Busby wins, "shift could portend a wave of Democratic wins this fall." It is also "shaping up as an early test for how immigration and scandal could play out this year in the polls, and which issue may get greater traction with voters." SurveyUSA, a nonpartisan market-research firm, "reported a dead heat -- 45% for Mr. Bilbray and 45% for Ms. Busby -- in May."

118 Illegal Aliens Arrested In Arizona. The Washington Times (6/2, Seper, 90K) reports, "The US Border Patrol arrested 118 illegal aliens at a 'safe house' in Rio Rico, Ariz., just north of the U.S.-Mexico border, in a raid this week by a unit of undercover agents that has targeted alien smugglers and those who help them." The team, known as the "Disrupt unit, raided the house near Interstate 19 after receiving a tip about 'suspicious activity.'"

Colorado Billboards Criticize "Illegal Sanctuary" For Undocumented Aliens. The Washington Times (6/2, Richardson, 90K) reports from Denver, "Two prominent billboards criticizing sanctuary policies for illegal aliens were uncovered here yesterday in the latest salvo in Colorado's simmering immigration debate." The first billboard "shows three military helmets atop rifles and has the message, 'Mr. President, Mr. Governor, Mr. Mayor; they did not die for ILLEGAL SANCTUARY.'" The second "purports to welcome illegal aliens to Denver, which has policies forbidding authorities from asking about immigration status. 'Welcome to SANCTUARY CITY ... Relax, you made it! Brought to you by Executive Order 116,' the black-and-white billboard says."

Washington State Imam Agrees To Accept Deportation Order. The AP (6/2) reports, "A Seattle-area mosque leader who was investigated for possible ties to terrorist groups agreed Thursday to accept an order of removal from the United States, federal officials said." In a hearing yesterday, Immigration Judge Victoria Young ruled Abrahim Sheikh Mohamed "had no legal basis to remain in the United States." ICE lawyers "presented evidence that Mohamed has Kenyan citizenship. Young ordered him deported to Kenya or, if that cannot be done, to Somalia, the agency said." The AP notes, "Among other things, federal agents believed he came to the country to help raise money for the Ogaden National Liberation Front, which wants an independent state for ethnic Somalis in Ethiopia, FBI Special Agent David Rubincam said during a February hearing in the case."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (6/2, Johnson) notes that the terrorism allegations had "angered his many supporters in the local East African community," and the "nearly six months of confinement -- much of it in isolation -- weighed heavily on his decision to accept deportation, according to his lawyer, Hilary Han." She "said Mohamed's decision to agree to be deported had nothing to do with the terrorism allegations. An FBI spokeswoman said she could not discuss whether there was an ongoing criminal investigation of Mohamed. Aziz Junejo, who hosts a local cable TV show on Islam, said it was 'a very sad day' for the Muslim community."

Embattled Philadelphia Immigration Judge Replaced. The AP (6/2) reports, "Another judge has been assigned to fill in for an immigration judge recently criticized by an appeals court for his handling of asylum cases, the court administrator said." The AP continues, "The Executive Office for Immigration Review, which manages the nation's immigration courts, has assigned a judge from Arlington, Va., to fill in for Judge Donald V. Verlise following an unexplained two-week absence. … Elliott Edwards, the administrator for the immigration court of the Philadelphia region, said Ferlise's absence was not due to illness, and the arrangement would continue for an indefinite period." The AP adds, "The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in April that Ferlise, 62, a former prosecutor, prejudged cases and bullied asylum-seekers, denying them their right to fair hearings. The Philadelphia City Council last month called for his removal. … Washington attorney Ralph Conte, who said he was defending Ferlise but declined to say why he had been retained, referred questions to the Justice Department, which declined comment on what a spokesman called a 'personnel action.' … A 2000 study published by the San Jose Mercury News ranked Ferlise as among the 10 toughest asylum judges in the country, saying he had granted 74 of 715 asylum requests between 1995 and 1999."

TAX:

IRS Ruling Could End Charitable "Conduit" For Mortgage Industry. The Washington Post (6/2, A1, Salmon, Downey, 744K) reports a ruling by the Internal Revenue Service "threatens to extinguish a fast-growing -- but controversial -- charitable industry that has funneled hundreds of millions of dollars in cash to first-time home buyers for their down payments." The "unexpected IRS edict throws into question a practice that has helped boost national home ownership rates to a near-record 69 percent in the past six years." Almost "200 charities, such as AmeriDream, based in Gaithersburg, and Nehemiah Corp. in California, have acted as cash conduits between home sellers and buyers." Sellers "provide cash to the charities, which then give it to home buyers for their down payments. The sellers, who pay the charities a service fee, often recoup their money by charging a higher price for the homes -- usually 2 or 3 percent more, or an amount equal to the down payment, says a Government Accountability Office study."

Former Norristown, PA, Councilman Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/2, Shields) reports, "A former Norristown councilman whose criminal activity inspired a four-year corruption investigation pleaded guilty yesterday to tax evasion charges." The Inquirer continues, "Ernest W. Scott Jr., 56, admitted in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia that he hid more than $142,000 in income from his auto tags business between 1999 and 2001. He is scheduled for sentencing Sept. 8; federal guidelines call for a sentence of 12 to 18 months in prison. … He is the third Norristown official to be convicted or plead guilty in the last six weeks in a series of indictments resulting from the U.S. Attorney's investigation. Ex-Mayor Ted LeBlanc was convicted on bribery and tax evasion charges April 18, and former municipal administrator Anthony Biondi pleaded guilty to corruption charges May 12. Scott is currently serving a 6 1/2- to 20-year state sentence. In 2003, Scott, then a member of the Norristown municipal council, admitted to running a corrupt organization that included issuing fake insurance cards and dealing marijuana." The Inquirer adds, "The Montgomery County District Attorney's wiretap evidence from Scott's case was handed over to federal investigators in late 2002. The U.S. Attorney's Office used it to launch a wide-ranging probe that produced indictments against Scott and the man who prepared his taxes, as well as LeBlanc, Biondi, and four businessmen who were awarded contracts with Norristown."

Nevada Strip Club Owner Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion. The AP (6/2, Ritter) reports Las Vegas strip club owner Rick Rizzolo "pleaded guilty Thursday to a felony tax evasion charge but avoided any mention of organized crime as the government ended a decade-long federal probe of whether the club was linked to the mob." Rizzolo "pledged to sell the club," Crazy Horse Too, "and agreed not to contest some $17 million in fines, forfeitures and restitution. The financial settlement includes a $10 million payment to Kirk Henry, a tourist from Olathe, Kan., whose separate civil lawsuit alleges he was paralyzed when he was beaten by club employees in 2001." US Attorney Daniel Bogden "called Thursday's deals an efficient way to achieve what he called a primary goal of the investigation -- to strip Rizzolo of club ownership and bring closure to Henry and his family 'for the brutal and tragic extortionate attack at the club.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

White House Credited With Attracting "A-List Names" As It Retools Under Bolten. Under the headline "Bush's New Team Scores A-list Names," the Christian Science Monitor (6/2, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "These are hardly the waning days of the Bush White House, but in some ways, time is running short for major new policy initiatives. And in the inevitable changing of the guard, as top appointees move on, it might seem a tough sell to lure A-listers onto the team. The pay isn't much to write home about, especially for those used to a healthy private-sector paycheck, and the administration remains deeply unpopular with much of the public." But "something has happened on the way to the makeover of Team Bush: The president has managed to bring in some first-string players, at a time when two-term White Houses are typically moving to the bench, analysts say." The Monitor adds, "Exhibits A and B are Goldman Sachs chairman Henry Paulson, tapped to take over Treasury, and FOX TV commentator Tony Snow, the new press secretary." Joshua Bolten, the new chief of staff, is also "getting high marks for his energetic retooling work -- including helping snag his former colleague, Mr. Paulson -- and setting his sights on upgrading the White House's communications and domestic policy shops."

Paulson's Environmentalist Beliefs Noted. The A2 (6/2, Heilprin) reports, "Paulson may find the tightrope he'll be walking as…Bush's Treasury secretary will span a wider gulf than in his current twin jobs as chairman of Goldman Sachs and The Nature Conservancy." Both Paulson "and the world's richest environmental group look at global warming as a dire threat requiring government-mandated reductions in carbon dioxide and other gases that trap heat in the atmosphere like a greenhouse. Bush doesn't." Steve McCormick, president of The Nature Conservancy, "said Paulson won't shy from sharing his views on global warming in Bush's Cabinet."

Paulson's Experience With China Could Prove "Crucial." The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Solomon, Browne, 2.11M) reports, "Few US business leaders have courted China as assiduously" as Paulson, and "those ties could prove crucial as the administration deals with China's emergence as an economic powerhouse." Paulson 'says he has traveled to China more than 70 times in the past 15 years, rubbing shoulders with the country's political, financial and academic elite, both as chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and as a director of the Nature Conservancy, an environmental group." Paulson's "ties could be pivotal as the US tries to navigate its delicate relationship with China -- a country that puts a premium on loyalty among its foreign friends and where personal credibility counts for more than a corporate title."

Bush Said To Have Lied About Snow's Resignation. The Washington Post (6/2, Froomkin, 744K) reports in its online "White House Briefing" that when "asked about Treasury Secretary John Snow's future last week, President Bush could easily have ducked the question, or told the truth -- but instead, he chose to lie about it." There's "really no other way to describe what Bush said Thursday. Press secretary Tony Snow's widely-quoted explanation that Bush's statement was in some way 'artfully worded' is just plain wrong." When asked at his joint press conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair if Treasury Secretary Snow had given him "any indication that he intends to leave his job any time soon," Bush said, "No, he has not talked to me about resignation. I think he's doing a fine job."

More Commentary On Paulson. In the New York Times (6/2, 1.19M), , Paul Krugman writes a memo to Paulson, "So you decided to take the job, after all. It's no surprise that they wanted you. As the joke that's making the rounds puts it, they're so desperate they're scraping the top of the barrel. But most of us are surprised that you accepted." He adds, "Before we get to the specifics, you need to disabuse yourself of any illusion that this administration rewards loyalty. … Right now, you're being flattered. You have a natural urge to be a team player. But if you play the game your new bosses want you to play, your credibility with the public will evaporate in no time at all. And when you're no longer useful to your new friends, you'll be tossed aside."

Kavanaugh Sworn In As US Appeals Court Judge. CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush today sealed a victory in his drive to put a more conservative stamp on the nation's courts. He hosted the swearing in ceremony for new U.S. Appeals Court Judge Brett Kavanaugh. Kavanaugh is a former White House aide who once worked for the independent counsel Ken Starr in his investigation of President Clinton." Kavanaugh "won confirmation despite critics who complained he was too political and inexperienced for the bench." Bush "urged the Senate to give more of his stalled judicial nominees the green light."

The AP (6/2, Riechmann) says presidents "usually are not present when new judges take their oaths. But Kavanaugh, whose nomination was opposed by Democrats, has worked at the White House for the past five years -- in the White House counsel's office and as staff secretary."

34% Rate Bush As Worst President In 60 Years. CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Blitzer) reported that a new poll finds that "registered voters rate President Bush as…the worst president in the last six decades. The Quinnipiac University poll shows 34 percent of voters put Mr. Bush at the top of the list of worst presidents. Richard Nixon comes in second with 17 percent. Who was the best president? Twenty-eight percent of the voters surveyed say it was Ronald Reagan. Twenty-five percent say it was Bill Clinton, but another 16 percent of voters rated Clinton as the worst president, whatever that means."

Reid's Office Admits Misstating Ethics Rules For Boxing Tickets. The New York Times (6/2,

DOJ_NMG_0031163

1.19M) runs a version of the AP story that was first distributed yesterday, noting that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's office "acknowledged Wednesday night that he had misstated the ethics rules governing his acceptance of free boxing tickets and had decided to avoid taking such gifts in the future." Several "ethics experts criticized Mr. Reid's rationale that he felt obligated to take the tickets to ensure that boxing was being properly conducted in his home state."

Hastert Becomes Longest-Serving GOP Speaker. The AP (6/2, Abrams) reports Rep. Dennis Hastert, "who vaulted out of political obscurity when Newt Gingrich resigned as speaker of the House more than seven years ago, on Thursday became the longest-serving Republican speaker in history." Hastert, 64, "surpasses fellow Illinoisan Joseph 'Uncle Joe' Cannon, a pugnacious politician who ruled the House from November 1903 until the Democrats regained the majority in March, 1911."

Air Force Fuel Bill Rises With Oil Prices. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 6, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported "gasoline prices in this country are likely to remain high, at least through the summer. And Americans will also be footing the bill for the US military's soaring fuel bill." CBS (Martin) added, "The Air Force burns more than three billion gallons of fuel a year, and every time the cost of oil goes up $10 a barrel, the fuel bill goes up $600 million."

Medicare Posts Prices On 30 Surgical Procedures Online. USA Today (6/2, Appleby, 2.31M) reports the prices Medicare "pays for hip replacements, cardiac surgery and 28 other procedures in each of the nation's counties went online Thursday, in the government's first effort to post hospital price information for consumers." The "move comes as employers and others who pay the nation's $1.9 trillion health care tab encourage patients to be more like savvy shoppers when it comes to medical care, currently a difficult prospect because so little comparative information on cost and quality is available." Employers groups say that "the federal government, the nation's largest purchaser of health care, is posting such information on its Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services website is important."

USA Today Says Ethics Reform Legislation For Show Purposes Only. USA Today (6/2, 2.31M) says in an editorial that Congress' response to scandal of Jack Abramoff's 2002 Scotland golfing trip has been "well, not much. In separate 'lobbying reform' bills crawling through the legislative process, the House of Representatives and Senate leave many of the loopholes allowing members and their staff to accept gifts from lobbyists well above the stated $50 limit. These include sham trips, bargain rates on jets, and premium seats for major sporting events and concerts." The legislation "has one objective: to make it appear as if a scandal-racked Congress is doing something in an election year. But the fact is that many members of Congress feel cruelly cheated by the $165,200 annual salary they have voted for themselves and harbor a sense of entitlement to supplement their incomes with freebies."

OTHER NEWS:

Data Suggest Economy Is Slowing. USA Today (6/2, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "The economy is cooling from the torrid pace of earlier this year, with home construction, housing price gains and manufacturing activity starting to slow, according to government and private data released Thursday. Factories are paying more for materials. Labor costs are rising more slowly than previously estimated -- bad news for workers who have seen wages lag but a signal that inflation pressures aren't mounting." Economists said "the reports add credence to the Federal Reserve's prediction that the economy will slow in the second half of the year but added it's not yet clear where inflation is headed."

The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Conkey, 2.11M) runs a similar report titled "Data Indicate Economy Is Cooling," and the Washington Post (6/2, D1, Fleishman, 744K) notes "US home prices continued to rise in the first quarter of the year, but in another sign of a cooling market the pace slowed from the last quarter of 2005, according to a report released yesterday." Home prices "nationally were 12.5 percent higher in the first quarter than a year earlier, according to the survey released by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. In 2005, the average home price jumped about 13.3 percent."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (6/2, Trumbull, 61K) reports on "a common quandary in today's economy. On average, American paychecks are rising, as employers offer higher salaries to attract and retain staff. At the same time, inflation has been heating up, burning a bigger hole in consumers' pockets. The result is a dynamic that's challenging for workers and potentially risky for the economy."

Reports Suggest Inflationary Pressure Easing, Boosting Stocks. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Browning, 2.11M) reports, "A fresh batch of economic reports spurred hopes that inflationary pressure might be easing, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average, which has been under pressure for almost a month, rose 91.97 points, or 0.82%, to 11260.28. It is up 5.1% this year." Investors "shifted money to stocks they had fled. The Nasdaq Composite Index, whose beleaguered technology stocks had pushed it into the red for 2006, surged 1.88%, or 40.98 points, to 2219.86. It is up for the year again, by 0.7%." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, "whose 3.1% May decline was its worst monthly drop in two years, rose 1.23%, or 15.62 points, to 1285.71, up 3% for 2006." USA Today (6/2, Shell, 2.31M) also reports the stock numbers.

US Automaker Sales Continue To Slump. ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 10, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was more bad news for the American auto industry today. General Motors and Chrysler posted double-digit declines in sales for May. Sales at Ford also fell, all as a result of high fuel prices and increasing demand for fuel-efficient vehicles. Toyota and Honda reported large sales increases."

More Commentary On Economy. In a column titled "Economy Holds Good News -- For The Rich," Julianne Malveaux writes in USA Today (6/2, 2.31M), "The average American has not experienced much good economic news lately. The wealth gap is growing. Median family income has been dropping. Meanwhile, gasoline prices are up 36% from a year ago. With interest rates rising, those with adjustable rate mortgages face higher payments, and residential rents also are nudging up. Incomes are not keeping pace with inflation, and the job market is weak."

Author Charles R. Morris writes in the New York Times (6/2, Morris, 1.19M) notes that May "saw one of the sharpest drops in consumer confidence since the recessions of 1979-1982. But those were truly dreadful times. Oil prices tripled, rates on home mortgages shot into the mid-teens, the stock market was a disaster area and unemployment rates reached double digits. Over the past three years, by contrast, American economic performance has been almost glittering." There are "parallels with another historical period, however, that suggest the deeper currents of uneasiness. Pan the camera back to Pittsburgh, July 1877. … But why did people feel so miserable? Partly they were confused by prices, which were dropping sharply. Farmers thought falling grain prices meant they were getting poorer, without noticing that the price of everything else was falling too. Farmers' terms of trade -- the price differences between what they sold and what they bought -- actually racked up solid gains in the 1870's."

US Foster Care System Examined. ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 9, 2:45, Gibson) reported, "500,000 children are in foster care right now a number that has doubled in 20 years. And one of the most troubling aspects of the system -- how so many children are moved from family-to-family, never finding a real home." ABC (Sawyer) added, "They are witness to a searing truth, how the most fragile, abused and neglected children in the country, are bounced from home-to-home, with devastating results, in the American foster care system." And the "more placements, say the experts, the worse the outcome. One study shows there's twice as much posttraumatic stress disorder in foster kids as there is in veterans of US wars." There is now a "pioneering approach that respects the attachment a child has to a biological parent. A team of counselors surrounds and guides both parent and child. And it costs no more than the foster care which can have such disastrous results."

New York Comptroller Apologizes For Remark About Shooting Bush. The AP (6/2, Goldman) reports New York State Comptroller Alan Hevesi "publicly apologized Thursday for a 'beyond dumb' remark about a fellow Democrat 'putting a bullet between the president's eyes.'" Hevesi "hastily called a mea culpa press conference hours after putting his foot in his mouth at the Queens College commencement." In the videotaped speech, Hevesi "describes Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., as, 'the man who, how do I phrase this diplomatically, who will put a bullet between the president's eyes if he could get away with it.'" At the news conference, "a contrite Hevesi said he was trying to convey that Schumer has the strength and courage to stand up to the president." Hevesi "apologized to Bush and Schumer and said he is 'not a person of violence.'"

New York Republicans Fear Political Clout May Be Slipping Away. The New York Times (6/2, Cooper, 1.19M) reports, "Twelve years ago, when they gathered at their state convention, Republicans were so hungry to retake the governorship that party bosses led by Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato brokered a deal to spare George E. Pataki a primary against his fiercest opponent." But when Hew York Republicans met "Thursday to choose a new candidate for governor, the party found itself dispirited and deeply divided. Last-minute efforts by Governor Pataki, a lame duck, and other party leaders to avoid a potentially damaging primary fell apart. And the leadership's favored candidate for governor, William F. Weld, finished a distant second, earning a spot on the primary ballot but failing in his bid to be the party's designee." The Times adds that "many Republicans here said privately that they feared their 12-year run of good fortune was coming to an end. … Many Republicans, from state senators to consultants to county chairmen to a former Pataki administration official, said privately that some of the blame lay with Governor Pataki. They used phrases like 'train wreck' to describe the party and 'lack of leadership' to describe the governor's stewardship of it."

Faso, Weld Win Spots On GOP Gubernatorial Ballot. The AP (6/2, Gormley) reports that New York Republicans "on Thursday designated former Assembly minority leader John Faso as their candidate for governor but gave enough support to former Massachusetts Gov. Bill Weld for a spot on the primary ballot. Faso became the party designee by receiving more than 50 percent of the weighted vote after negotiations that went into the early morning and included Gov. George Pataki, said state Republican Chairman Stephen Minarik. Faso, who had lost a December straw poll, came away Thursday with 59.5 percent of the weighted vote to Weld's 40.5 percent. 'Today we begin a battle for the hearts and minds of our fellow New Yorkers,' Faso said. 'Our message is clear: We need to cut taxes, we need to create jobs and we need to restore opportunity, and we need to reform New York state's government.'"

Bloomberg (6/2, Bensinger) notes that Faso "also has the endorsement of the state Conservative Party, which has backed every successful statewide Republican candidate for the past 30 years. Weld has been dogged by questions about his presidency of Decker College a Kentucky trade school, which fell into bankruptcy a month after he resigned. The Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating the school for fraud." State Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno (R) "said Faso's win 'was a very decisive vote.' Without saying whether he would ask Weld to withdraw, Bruno described Faso as 'the nominee.' Weld said he would stay in the race. 'This is the first day of the rest of the campaign,' he told reporters. 'I will predict with some assurance that I will win the primary.' Faso said, 'I would certainly like to avoid a primary, but if we have one, so be it.'"

Supreme Court Decisions Could Become 2006 Issue. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports that the Supreme Court under Chief Justice John Roberts "looms as factor in 2006 elections. Justices prepare to rule on series of controversial issues at close of first session under Bush's new chief justice. Each side hopes that decisions, to be issued at 10 a.m. each Monday this month, will fire up ideological base as Republican and Democratic candidates square off for control of Congress." Rulings are "expected on military trials for Guantanamo detainees, Texas redistricting driven by DeLay, Vermont's campaign-finance laws, and application of Clean Air Act. With O'Connor gone, close cases may turn on maverick Justice Kennedy, who has infuriated conservatives by citing international law and opposing a voter initiative challenging gay rights."

Iraq Vote Seen As Putting Senators Eyeing '08 Bids At Disadvantage Over Governors. The New York Times (6/2, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports, "With Iraq looming yet again over an American presidential campaign, senators considering a White House race are at a disadvantage over governors who might run, forced to explain their votes -- and in some cases, alter their views -- on an increasingly unpopular war." The Times notes that Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "have encountered hecklers protesting their support for the Iraq war." Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D) and ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D) now "say they regret voting for the war. Both have called for setting a deadline to withdraw American troops." Meanwhile, "governors are finding considerable maneuvering room when it comes to Iraq. And they are taking advantage of it for now." For example, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) "declined to say in an interview how he would have voted on the war." Vilsack said, "If we're looking at the elections of 2006 and 2008, I think it's important to look to the future and learn from whatever mistakes we made in the past." And ex-Virginia Gov. Mark Warner (D) said of the war in Iraq, "My sense is going out without a plan is just as bad as going in without a plan. So I have not been one of those people who say that come heck or high water, we are going to leave by a fixed date."

Kerry Lambastes Bush Administration Over Iraq Policies. The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Khalil, 958K) reports that Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D), in a speech Thursday in Los Angeles, "harshly criticized the Bush administration for 'disdaining diplomacy' in favor of a confrontational and unilateral foreign policy that has hurt the United States' standing around the world and made it less safe." Kerry "warned that the mistakes of Iraq must not be repeated in the current standoff with Iran. 'War is the ultimate failure of diplomacy,' Kerry told a gathering of the Pacific Council on International Policy. 'Yet our current leadership has arrogantly discarded this basic principle." Kerry said the result "was an ill-advised rush to war in Iraq that alienated other governments and diminished sympathy for the U.S. generated by the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. America's current isolation, and the presence of thousands of U.S. troops in Iraq, is 'playing right into Iranian hands,'" said Kerry. The senator "said he would attach an amendment to this summer's defense appropriations bill calling for a total withdrawal of U.S. combat troops by the end of this year. But he acknowledged that the idea would be unpopular. 'I know I'm not going to get the majority of my own caucus.'"

First Plame Book Deal Falls Through. The New York Times (6/2, Rich, 1.19M) reports the "$2.5 million book deal that Valerie Plame Wilson, the former Central Intelligence Agency officer whose identity was publicly disclosed three years ago, negotiated with Crown Publishing Group last month has fallen through." Wilson, who "could not agree on terms with Crown, is now in exclusive negotiations with Simon & Schuster, which originally had lost an auction for the book to Crown."

NYTimes Backs Courts For Striking Down AIDS Funding Rule. The New York Times (6/2, 1.19M) says in an editorial that "Federal judges in New York and the District of Columbia have declared unconstitutional a 2003 rule that limits the way U.S. health groups spend their privately raised money if they want to get federal money for international AIDS work." The rule required "nonprofits that want government support" to "sign a pledge saying they oppose prostitution and will not spend any money — public or private — on programs the government does not approve of." By "declaring that government may not use its spending clout to compel or coerce private speech, the new decisions have vindicated an important constitutional principle, while removing at least one impediment for health groups trying to reach a high-risk community, and save lives."

WPost Says More Money Needed To Combat AIDS. The Washington Post (6/2, A18, 744K) says in an editorial that the UN target "of mobilizing $7 billion to $10 billion per year has been met: Last year low- and middle-income countries spent $2.5 billion of their own money and an additional $5.8 billion from donors on AIDS treatment and prevention and the care of orphans. But that money has bought less than expected. Rather than hitting the 'three by five' target of getting medicines to 3 million people by 2005, the world has put only about 1.4 million people on treatment -- a big improvement on the 240,000 who were receiving drugs in 2001 but still well less than half of the number who need medicines immediately. Equally, better-financed prevention efforts have succeeded in driving down infection rates among young adults, notably in Kenya, Uganda, Zimbabwe and Haiti. But last year there were 4.1 million new infections worldwide. The plague is still advancing."

Russia, China Back Package Of Incentives, Penalties For Iran. CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Blitzer) reported that "the United States and five other world powers appear ready to formally make an offer to Iran." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "and other officials reportedly have reached what is being described as a substantial agreement on a package of incentives and penalties to formally be presented to Iran. If Iran is to accept those penalties and those incentives, the whole package, the U.S. presumably would start direct talks with Iran, the first time in more than two decades." CNN (Ensor) added that the announcement is "something of a success for American diplomacy."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 5, 1:20, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "Russia has now said they will join these talks in trying to pressure Iran; China not so sure yet after a conversation between President Bush and the Chinese leader today. What does Iran get? Iran gets a possible trade deal, airplane parts, a lifting of sanctions, and a suspension of all action at the United Nations if it gives up its nuclear research and sits down to talk."

ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 4, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Vienna, Austria, and the US and five other world powers, including Russia and China, have agreed upon a package of incentives to convince Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment program."

The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Rubin, 958K) says "few details of the agreement were forthcoming, and British Foreign Minister Margaret Beckett, who announced the deal in muted language, cautioned that negotiators wanted to present the package to the Iranians before making it public." But "diplomats close to the issue said incentives were similar to past proposals, including helping Iran obtain a civilian nuclear reactor." Fox News' Special Report (6/1, Cameron) reported, "Officials said the package will be revealed publicly after their presentation to Iran. Some incentives include allowing Iran to have a water reactor and a supply of fuel so it would not need to enrich uranium itself. Sanctions include a ban on Iranian visas."

The Financial Times (6/2, Khalaf) reports the "rare show of international unity will substantially raise the diplomatic pressure on the Islamic Republic," while the New York Times (6/2, Shanker, Sciolino, 1.19M) notes "the word 'sanctions' was not uttered in the public dialogue on Thursday, perhaps in an effort to avoid giving Iran an obvious target for early objections." The "emphasis of the agreement on Thursday was less on how to punish Iran, than on how to reward it for agreeing to freeze its enrichment-related activities." Undersecretary Burns, when "pressed on whether the six nations had reached full consensus on Thursday, …expressed broad satisfaction. 'We are very satisfied by the results of today's meetings here in Vienna,' he said. 'We consider them a step forward in our quest to deny Iran a nuclear weapons capability.'"

The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Solomon, Spindle, Iran, 2.11M) says the deal "sought to buttress a pledge by the Bush administration to engage directly with Iran should it agree to give up uranium enrichment work," and it "provides Tehran with a clear path to reintegrating with the global community should it agree to talk." Undersecretary Burns is quoted calling the agreement "a step forward in our quest to deny Iran a nuclear-weapons capability," and said discussions had been "by far the most substantive and…concrete" to date.

Meanwhile, Iranian officials yesterday welcomed the US offer to negotiate over its nuclear program but declined to stop enriching uranium. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 4, 1:40, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "The Iranians had a mixed answer about the US offer for direct talks about their nuclear program. Yes, they'd love to talk. But, no, not if they have to stop enriching uranium to do it." President Bush: "My reaction is the choice is theirs, and we'll see whether or not that is the firm position of their government." Axelrod: "The President's position was strengthened in Vienna tonight. The US reached an agreement with Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, and China on a unified approach to Iran: Stop enriching, negotiate, or, says the British foreign secretary, face further UN Security Council measures." Margaret Beckett, British Foreign Secretary: "We urge Iran to take the positive path." Axelrod: "Iran's response to the US was really no big surprise, but getting Russia and China to say that they're willing to join the US to tighten the pressure on Iran, that really was in doubt."

On its front page today, the Washington Post (6/2, A1, Kessler, 744K) says the deal "brings general unity to the countries' approach to Iran after months of discord, diplomats said. It is intended to sharpen the choice facing Iran, giving it a clear reason to opt for cooperation over confrontation on its nuclear program." The Post adds, "Aides to Rice said the deal also commits China and Russia to a long list of specific steps to punish Iran if it refuses to halt its enrichment program. … Analysts and diplomats described [Iranian] responses as preliminary. The most powerful elements of Iran's theocratic government remained silent on the US proposal and were said to be intensely engaged in the private consultations that precede major policy announcements in Tehran. The measured tenor of the Iranian diplomats' initial replies appeared to signal that their country was at least not dismissing the start of a process it had actively solicited in recent weeks, through back-channel messages seeking direct engagement with Washington."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Roberts) reported, "This is a very high-stakes game of chess. The prize, the support of Europe, Russia and China. And with Iran's insistence that it will not agree to talks with preconditions, the U.S., for the moment, appears to be winning. Iran's rejection of the White House offer was not just expected, it was part of the plan. According to administration officials, the entire goal of this new overture was meant to heighten awareness of the world to Iran's intransigence. … What looks on the surface like a softening of the U.S. position, the offer of face-to-face talks, is actually just another play in their game of diplomat hardball to force Iran to give up its nuclear program."

The Washington Times/AP (6/2, Gearan, Jahn) reports that at the White House, President Bush "warned that the confrontation would end up at the U.N. Security Council if Iran continues to enrich uranium. 'If they continue their obstinance, if they continue to say to the world, "'We really don't care what your opinion is," then the world is going to act in concert,' Mr. Bush said after meeting with his Cabinet."

More Commentary On Iran. William P. Kucewicz, editor of GeoInvestor.com, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M) that Rice, "in signaling a new US willingness to negotiate with Iran, also warned that 'international isolation and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions' would follow if Tehran defies its international obligations by continuing to develop nuclear weapons. … There's simply no getting around the fact that you can't eat petroleum. Iran's 132.5 trillion barrels in proved oil reserves -- 10.2% of the world total -- are of little benefit unless they're earning money. A trade embargo would hit Iran especially hard, because its economy and government budget are inordinately dependent on petrodollars. Oil shipments account for about 25% of GDP, represent 90% of total export earnings and provide as much as 50% of fiscal receipts." Iran "doesn't have the world over a barrel. It's the other way around. The economic and fiscal squeeze of new trade sanctions could indeed become so painful as to prompt regime change."

White House Turns Down North Korean Offer Of Bilateral Talks. The New York Times (6/2, Onishi, 1.19M) reports Pyongyang "on Thursday invited the top American nuclear envoy to visit its capital, Pyongyang, for bilateral talks, but the White House insisted that the North return to long-deadlocked six-nation talks instead. North Korea invited" Assistant Secretary Chris Hill "to Pyongyang, indicating that it wanted to discuss an agreement that was reached last September but never carried out." Press Secretary Tony Snow is quoted saying, "The United States is not going to engage in bilateral negotiations with the government of North Korea. The United States sticks by its position, which is, North Korea has to return to the six-party talks."

The Financial Times (6/2, Fifield) adds, "With the move, North Korea again demonstrated its capacity for wily negotiating as the invitation is unlikely to be accepted, enabling Kim Jong-il's regime to blame further the stand-off on the Bush administration."

Backers Of India Nuclear Deal Worry Opponents May Insert "Poison Pill." The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports, "Proponents fret about prospects for civilian nuclear deal with India. Pact opening up sale of U.S. technology is top Bush priority, and backers say it has majority support in Congress. But opponents could add 'poison pill' amendments that might force New Delhi to scotch agreement to separate civilian and military nuclear programs. Administration still hopes to win approval before the August recess, despite tight legislative calendar."

Bush May Criticize Putin's Human Rights Record. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports President Bush "weighs human-rights digs of his own at Russia's Putin, who has turned increasingly autocratic. The president plans one-day stopover in Ukraine, Russia's adversary. Before July G-8 summit in St. Petersburg, U.S. officials may attend a gathering of democracy advocates organized by chess champion Garry Kasparov."

Bush Will Host Congolese President Monday. The AFP (6/2) reports President Bush "will welcome Congo's President Denis Sassou-Nguesso June 5 for talks on efforts to keep peace in Sudan's Darfur region, the White House said." Press Secretary Tony Snow is quoted saying, "The two leaders will discuss implementation of the May 5, 2006 Darfur Peace Agreement, NATO assistance to strengthen the African Union Mission in Sudan and the follow-on UN mission, United Nations authorization to promptly transition to a UN peacekeeping force." Sassou-Nguesso currently chairs the African Union.

Nuclear China, Assertive Japan Likely To Dominate Rumsfeld Trip. Under the headline "Washington And Beijing Stoke Nuclear Fears," the Financial Times (6/2, Dickie, Sevastopulo) reports Secretary Rumsfeld is due in Singapore today for a three-day security conference that is "likely to include much discussion about China." The FT says the Pentagon "drew plenty of attention" in its report last week that suggested US analysts "had been surprised by changes in the capacity of China's nuclear deterrent. … It is not entirely clear what surprises the Pentagon was referring to since the unclassified version of the report provided few details about new developments." But the report "was a reminder of the possibility for mutual miscalculation between the world's most powerful country and its most populous."

The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Wain, 2.11M) focuses its coverage on the "deteriorating political relations between Japan and China," saying that while the US "has recently stepped up its criticism of Chinese military spending, some Asian countries have become alarmed about an increasingly nationalistic Japan." Former ASEAN leader Rodolfo Severino said that while the US "has a major presence in the region, 'the defining relationship in East Asia will be between China and Japan. … Unfortunately, they just don't like each other, and they sense a certain rivalry.'"

Some Lawmakers Object To Lobbying From Chinese Embassy. The Washington Times (6/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside The Ring" column, "The Chinese Embassy continues to lobby Congress with impunity on the issue of Taiwan. The latest effort was a recent letter to members of the House Armed Services Committee aimed at China-related provisions of the fiscal 2007 defense authorization bill." Chinese Ambassador Zhou Wenzhong "warned that provisions increasing military ties between the Pentagon and Taiwan and improving Taiwan's defenses against a Chinese attack 'will do serious harm to China-U.S. relations' if enacted into law. Mr. Zhou said the new provisions would create a military alliance between the United States and Taiwan and violate diplomatic communiques governing U.S.-China ties." The letter "has angered several lawmakers who view it as foreign government interference in the congressional legislative process."

Chinese Officials Seek Sympathy For Country's Problems. The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Magnier, 958K) reports, "Chinese officials have settled on a new mantra in meetings with visiting foreign dignitaries: You've seen Beijing and Shanghai. Now it's time to go out to the countryside and see our tired, our poor, our huddled masses yearning to be fed." The Times adds, "Behind the polite invitation is a more substantive message. Namely, you may view us as a strategic threat poised to steal your jobs, drive up your gas prices and take over the world. But take a peek beyond the tall buildings and bright lights and you'll have more sympathy for our problems. And then maybe, just maybe, you won't be so hard on us. … Even on trips abroad, officials are making the pitch for a visit to the Chinese sticks. … Encouraging influential foreigners to have a 'Green Acres' moment not only helps outsiders better understand China in all its complexity, it also makes tactical sense."

OPEC Rejects Venezuelan Proposal To Reduce Production. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 5, 1:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Oil ministries of the OPEC cartel meeting in Venezuela today agreed to keep pumping crude at nearly full capacity, rejecting their host's call to cut production. That did not stop Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez from again blasting his favorite target, the United States." CBS (Regan) added, "All eyes were on Venezuela's leftist wildcard President Hugo Chavez today. In typical fashion, he ranted against the US, calling Americans imperialists who have been taking advantage of Latin America's resources for decades."

The Financial Times (6/2, Hoyos, Webb-Vidal) reports Chávez "angered OPEC ministers with anti-US rhetoric as they united against him in rejecting his call to cut the oil cartel's production." And the Washington Post (6/2, D5, Mufson, 744K) says "oil traders and analysts took little comfort from OPEC's commitment, noting that the cushion between world supply and demand remained uncomfortably thin." Moreover, they said, "the oil producers were unlikely to reduce output when they could cash in on record high prices that many consumers think are already out of control." The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Bahree, Luhnow, 2.11M), among other sources, runs a similar story this morning.

Uribe Win Seen As Backlash Against Chavez Model. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M), "Liberty lovers across the Western Hemisphere are cheering Colombian President Alvaro Uribe's second-term victory on Sunday. Colombians gave their president more than 62% of the vote. His closest competitor, the hard-left Carlos Gaviria, whose platform mirrored the ideology of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, earned only 22%. Pro-Uribe parties also won a majority in Congress." The Uribe win "is not only an endorsement of a worldview favoring security, the rule of law and global engagement for Colombia. It is also evidence of a backlash against the economic isolation and hostility toward private property preached by Mr. Gaviria and Mr. Chávez next door."

WHO Puzzled By Indonesian Bird Flu Cluster. AFP (6/2, Kearney) reports the World Health Organization (WHO) "has admitted it was having difficulty identifying the source of bird flu infection in a case where seven people in the same family died of the virus." The case raised fears of human-to-human transmission of the virus and a deadly global flu pandemic. "There are three possible sources of infection, but there is no conclusion," WHO epidemiologist Steve Bjorge told reporters at a joint press conference with Indonesian health ministry officials in Jakarta

Thursday. "It's difficult to get good information from that village, and that family," he said. However, Bjorge said the first family member to contract avian flu was most likely infected by her sick chickens.

Local Tests Show Indonesian Girl Died From Bird Flu. The AP (6/2) reports, "An eight-year-old girl in Indonesia has died of bird flu, a health official said Friday, citing local tests." The World Health Organization has yet to confirm the girl's death, which comes three days after her brother died "with similar flu-like symptoms, but no samples were taken." The children's' family "reported that chickens died near their house, and we have been told they had contact with birds," said Dr. Hariadi Wibisono, a senior official at the national Health Department.

Bird Flu Outbreak Could Paralyze African Health System. The Wall Street Journal Online (6/2) reports, "African health systems, already crumbling under the strain of AIDS, malaria and other diseases, could collapse if a bird-flu pandemic takes hold on the continent," health experts said at the World Economic Forum on Africa. Idrissa Sow, a senior WHO official, "said it was vital to increase the number of laboratories capable of testing for the H5N1 virus in Africa." Currently South Africa has the only advanced laboratory facilities, while other countries have had to send samples to Europe for testing.

UN Agency Proposes Plan To Track Birds. The AP (6/2) reports the UN food agency said Thursday it is "considering a plan to fit wild birds with tiny backpacks and monitor their annual migrations to help combat the spread of the deadly H5N1 bird flu." The project would "rely on communications satellites and a network of computers to track the birds' movements" at an estimated cost of $6.8 million, the UN Food and Agricultural Organization said in a statement. A system of radio beacons and satellites would "feed data into the computers of ornithologists, ecologists, virologists and epidemiologists" around the world. "Early warning would give governments and producers more time to respond to potential threat -- with great benefits for the poultry industry and society at large," the FAO said.

Arab League's Reaction To Darfur Violence Decried. Mohammed Buisier, a Libyan-American political activist, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M), "Once again, the international community, and the UN in particular, is being shamed into acting to stop the massacres in Darfur, and once again the Arab League and Arab leaders are unwilling and unable to face facts, or to deal with them in a civilized and humane manner. Indeed, the most recent Arab League summit, which took place in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum…ended with a resolution denying that any massacres had taken place in Darfur and expressing resistance to any outside intervention in the 'interna'" affairs of an Arab country. (Not surprisingly, this stance is identical to that taken by Osama Bin Laden.)" Buisier adds, "By adopting this argument, the Arab League was not just covering up for the atrocities perpetrated by the Sudanese government, but also for the direct or indirect involvement in this part of the Sudan of some of the Arab governments attending the summit." It is "but one more shameful manifestation of Arab governments turning a blind eye to the continuing inhumane atrocities committed against their own citizens."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Fate Of Freed Detainees Complicates US Handling Of Guantanamo. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, A1, Higgins, 2.11M) reports in a front page story that after "four years in Guantanamo Bay, Abu Bakker Qassim, a former terror suspect cleared last year of having ties to al Qaeda, got word last month that he finally would be set free." He and "four fellow Muslims from China were loaded onto a U.S. military transport plane in the middle of the night, shackled to the floor and flown for 12 hours to their new home: a converted military barracks in Tirana, the capital of Albania." The case of the five Uighurs from China shows the US is "in a predicament it never expected: What should it do with Guantanamo inmates who have been found deserving of release but who face jail or execution if returned to their homelands?" Washington's "hesitation to repatriate some detainees reflects its growing unease with authoritarian states it initially enlisted as partners in the post-9/11 war on terror."

89 Detainees Now On Hunger Strikes. The AP (6/2, Selsky) reports more Guantanamo Bay detainees "have joined a hunger strike, raising the total to 89, and six of them were being force-fed, the U.S. military said Thursday." The strike, "which last weekend jumped from three participants to 75 — is now the biggest of the year at the U.S. prison on Cuba, where about 460 men are being held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban." Military officials "said the hunger strikers are an attempt to gain public sympathy to pressure the United States to release them."

German Intelligence Service Admits Knowledge Of El-Masri Rendition. The New York Times (6/2, Mekhennet, Smith, 1.19M) reports Germany's external intelligence service, the BND, "said yesterday that it knew about the American seizure and detention of a German citizen 16 months before the country was officially informed of his mistaken arrest. It was unclear whether that information had been passed on to senior officials." Germany had "previously maintained that it did not learn of the abduction of its citizen, Khaled el-Masri, until he returned to Germany in May 2004." The disclosure, "made as a parliamentary inquiry into the case reconvened in Berlin, adds to suspicions that European governments, or at least their intelligence services, have abetted the American practice of 'extraordinary rendition.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says New York Terror Funding Reflects Average Of Previous Years. Criticism of DHS' distribution of Urban Area Security Initiative grants continued yesterday, as Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff defended reduced funding for New York City and Washington, DC. Asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (6/1) why anti-terror funds for the cities are being cut, Chertoff said, "First of all…I don't think it's fair to describe them as cuts. Take New York, for example. Last year, New York got $200 million. This year, we're going to give them $124 million under this particular program. But last year was an artificially elevated number to make up from the very low grant the year before. If you average out the prior three-year grants, you're going to see this year is directly in line with what we've done over the last four years."

ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Money for the city of Washington and New York, both attacked on 9/11, is being slashed 40%. Why? Well, Homeland Security says there aren't enough national monuments or national icons in those cities to protect. Really? New York and Washington officials are furious." ABC (Thomas) added, "In New York, the loss of funding means fewer resources for protecting its massive transit system. In Washington today, officials said they'd have to curtail some programs already on the table." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "defended the funding formula as fair." Secretary Chertoff: "What is critical here is we have put over four years, over half a billion, in this one, single program into New York." Thomas: "Not everyone is unhappy. Mid-size cities like Omaha, Nebraska, are getting a boost in funding."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 10, 1:55, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "New York City officials are furious that they took a 40% cut this year in Homeland Security money intended to make big cities safer." New Yorkers were "especially galled by Homeland's finding that the city had zero national monuments or icons, even though it's home to the UN headquarters, the Statue of Liberty, and landmark bridges. Washington DC also took a 40% cut. The police chief said today the formula should be different for getting money to the two cities already attacked." And though "the Homeland Security Secretary was roughed up in the New York papers, he says today New York has received over half a billion dollars since the grants began, twice the total of any other city. And he says it's getting about the same share this year as it has on average during the past three."

An aggressive response from city and state lawmakers, as well as New York City papers, has turned much of the national media's attention towards New York's funding. Appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (6/1, Matthews), Rep. Peter King said, "I'm not begrudging other cities. Los Angeles certainly has threat (sic), Chicago, others, I'm not getting into that. But to cut New York City 40 % when every intelligence threat estimate shows that New York is at the very top, to me is absolutely indefensible. And Mike Chertoff and others at the department are changing their story by the hour. Today apparently said this was an averaging out of the first year and the second year and now the third year is an average of the first two, which makes no sense at all, especially when they were coming out with all these complicated formulas yesterday, which also added up to nothing." King added later, "There is a bureaucracy at the Department of Homeland Security which undercuts New York any number of times. I don't even know how familiar Mike Chertoff was with these final numbers. I heard people in the department saying yesterday they were running around once the storm hit trying to find ways to justify it."

On MSNBC's The Situation (6/1, Carlson), King said, "We're calling hearings on this. They have a peer-review panel which is shrouded in secrecy. We're not certain who was on that. We're not certain who came up with the formula they claim they used, and by the way, the department changed their story about five times over the last 36 hours as to why this was done. And you have then it went to an assistant secretary, perhaps an undersecretary. I don't even know if it made it to Secretary Chertoff for the final sign-off. I don't know how they came up with these numbers."

In an article appearing on at least 77 news websites, the AP (6/2, McShane) reports, "New Yorkers are seething over" the funding cuts, "and some are demanding the firing of Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff. … Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., on Thursday said President Bush 'should not come back to New York and stand with us' until his administration comes up with more money to keep New York safe." Meanwhile, "In Washington, Homeland Security Undersecretary George Foresman said his agency would review its finding that New York City has no national monuments or icons that would be at risk of terrorist attack."

NYC Funding Said To Have Been Cut Due To "Numerous Flaws" In Application. Under the headline "City Has Itself To Blame For Terror Cuts, US Says," the New York Times (6/2, Baker, Cardwell, 1.19M) reports DHS cut New York City's funding due to "numerous flaws" in its application. Though "federal officials said yesterday that the city…did a poor job of articulating its needs in its application" and "mishandled the application itself, failing to file it electronically as required and instead faxing its request to Washington," New York City and state "officials insisted that they had made no mistakes." Meanwhile, "Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg questioned yesterday whether old-fashioned pork barrel politics was at play in doling out the money in an election year."

Reports throughout the day on Fox News noted an editorial in the New York Daily News yesterday calling for the firing of Secretary Chertoff. Fox News' Special Report (6/1, Herridge) reported that Chertoff told the network he "would not be cowed by the criticism." Chertoff was shown saying, "People may not always agree with the decisions that the department makes. They may no always agree with my decisions. But they can be sure on one thing: Threatening me, insulting me and attacking me is not going to cause me to say, "Oh wow, I'm going to reconsider now and I'm going to pay more money now." Fox News (Herridge) added that DHS' funding was based on a "sophisticated risk assessment, which took into account the threat information, as well as the city's ability to prevent and respond to a terrorist attack."

NYTimes Says Peer Review Panel Was "Too Focused On Politics." Under the headline "Pork 1, Antiterrorism 0," the New York Times (6/2, 1.19M) editorializes, "If Al Qaeda is planning on following up its 2001 attacks on New York and Washington with an assault on Nebraska, the Department of Homeland Security's new urban areas security grants are brilliant. But, of course, the White House, Wall Street and densely populated urban areas are the most likely terrorist targets, and these are precisely the places the department dangerously shortchanged this week." The Times adds that DHS' anonymous peer review panels "appear to have been too focused on politics, and not enough on safety. … Mr. Bush and Mr. Chertoff owe the American people a system that recognizes the vulnerability of places like New York and Washington not just when the television cameras are rolling, but when the money is being handed out."

More Commentary. Dana Milbank, in his Washington Sketch column for the Washington Post (6/2, A2, 744K) writes that following the announcement of cuts for New York and Washington, Tracy Henke, "who is in charge of Homeland Security's grant-making, has become a target of ridicule." Milbank continues that while the cities New York and Washington lost funding, "those terrorism magnets of Kansas City and St. Louis -- both by happenstance in Henke's home state of Missouri -- received boosts in funds. Other winners: the horses of Louisville, the cattle of Omaha and five cities in Jeb Bush's Florida. Sounds dubious? Sorry, you can't see the data Henke used. Classified."

Code Red Declaration Could Contribute To DC Gridlock In Terror Attack Evacuation. The Washington Times (6/2, Seper, 90K) reports two traffic accidents in DC's Northeast yesterday that "shut down two major highways" served as "an ominous warning: What if it had been a terrorist attack?" The Times continues that "the prospect of being able to get either in or out of the city without being caught in a massive traffic jam remains in doubt," and a Code Red declaration by DHS "could contribute to the problem," possibly resulting in "an immediate lockdown of public and government facilities and restrictions on public travel." Meanwhile, Randall J. Larsen, director of the Virginia-based Institute for Homeland Security, said yesterday that in the event of a terrorist attack, "finding 'shelter in place' -- a small, interior room with no or few windows -- could be a better option" than evacuation.

Chertoff Says FEMA "Much More Prepared" For Hurricane Season. Under the headline "Chertoff: FEMA Is Hurricane-Ready," USA Today (6/2, Hall, Martin, 2.31M) reports that while Secretary Chertoff says FEMA is "much more prepared" this hurricane season than it was last year, "some disaster-response experts, members of Congress and FEMA employees are skeptical." Emergency-response officials in hurricane-prone states "say they're cautiously optimistic," and Rep. Bennie Thompson says, "There's still suspicion in the Gulf Coast region."

Paulison Says Government Is Ready For Hurricane Season. FEMA Director David Paulison was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/1) about a statement by Rep. Chris Shays that the federal government is not ready for hurricane season. Paulson said, "I don't agree with that. We are going to be ready. Are we as ready as we want to be? Do we have FEMA where we actually want it to be? The answer is probably not. This is a long-term thing that you can't fix in just a few months. We have taken all those lessons learned in Katrina, that we saw, that the Congress saw, that the IG's office saw, the GAO saw. We're taking all the reports. We've put things into several buckets. And the four primary ones is one, logistics, two, communications, situation awareness and victim registration. Those are the four big ones."

Gulf Coast Officials Warn Residents To Prepare. ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 7, 2:45, von Fremd, 8.78M) reported, "Much of the Gulf of Mexico still looks like a hurricane hit just yesterday. More than 200 people died here in Gulfport. And this year, officials are demanding that everyone in vulnerable areas take some responsibility for saving themselves." While cities "all along the Gulf Coast clean up and rebuild from last year's storms, officials worry that residents have short memories and won't heed the warning this year to stock up and get out." David Nichols, city manager: "People have got to take care of themselves. Government can only take care of them to a certain degree." Von Fremd: "Public service announcements, intended to scare people into leaving, are flooding the airways." In New Orleans, "officials say unlike last year, fleets of buses are ready to go. Today, the Army Corps of Engineers says it spent more than $800 million, to repair the levees. The Corps says they're back to pre-Katrina strength. The problem, say some engineers, is that pre-Katrina strength isn't good enough."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 6, 1:35, Shamlian, 9.87M) reported from Sabine Pass, Texas, where they "call themselves victims of the forgotten storm, and there are several thousand people tonight that are still displaced. Here in Sabine Pass, out of 300 homes, a small community, fewer than a dozen right now are livable." As the state "tonight prepares for a new season, there are arrangements with private companies to provide gas reserves along the interstates, even a formal plan for the evacuation of pets. All this amidst a region that is still cleaning up and hoping that they won't have to do it all over again."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 7, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported in Mississippi that "an estimated 38,000 families start this hurricane season in a lightweight trailer or mobile home like the one you see behind me. Obviously, these structures were not built to withstand hurricane-force winds. The concern is how well they will protect in even a summer storm, where wind guts can hit 50 miles or better. Evacuating people here in Biloxi will be far more of a challenge this year than last because the Biloxi Bay Bridge is still chopped into pieces from Hurricane Katrina."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 8, 1:20, Potter, 9.87M) reported, "Florida officials insist that they will be ready but with damage like this still around two years after Hurricane Charlie hit here in Punta Gorda, the officials this year are also insisting that the residents themselves do more to get ready by putting together their supplies, by putting together their own hurricane plans, their individual plans. They're also running TV commercials urging everyone to obey the evacuation orders. Now, Florida officials have also cut a deal with grocery stores, hardware stores, gas stations to use generators to open up right after the next hurricane, so perhaps they can end those long relief lines that we saw so painfully last year."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 9, 1:10, Savidge, 9.87M) reported that in New Orleans, "a city that's below sea level, getting rid of water is equally important. They rely on canals, they rely on pumping stations. There too that system has been compromised. The Army Corps says it won't be fully functional 'til some time next year. Now, that means just a heavy rain could cause flooding in some of the lowest-lying neighborhoods, even damaging flooding."

Many Coastal Homeowners Building Hurricane-Resistant Homes. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 8, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Many coastal homeowners are determined not let the hurricane season get the better of them. Instead of retreating inland, they're putting up stronger homes, anticipating this new hurricane season's powerful storms."

DOJ_NMG_0031178

Army Corps Investigation Finds New Orleans Levees Were Flawed. The New York Times (6/2, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports a "sweeping new study" by the Army Corps of Engineers has found that the levees it built for New Orleans "were an incomplete patchwork of protection, containing flaws in design and construction and not built to handle a storm anywhere near the strength of Hurricane Katrina." Though "outside engineering panels…have come to similar conclusions," the Times continues that the new "report is remarkable for being a product of the corps' own official investigation." Thought they "found no evidence of negligence or malfeasance by the corps or its contractors," investigators "said the corps had failed to take into account the tendency of the local soil to sink over time, leaving some sections of levee lower than they should have been."

ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 6, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Today, the US Army Corps of Engineers made a stunning admission of responsibility for the flooding of New Orleans. The Corps's chief said the levees failed because their construction was flawed."

The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 7, 0:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that in the report, the corps "blamed itself for 'catastrophic failure.' Here are some more findings: The protection system of levees and floodwalls was '…a system in name only,' largely built using outdated elevation data; the storm exceeded design criteria and some protective sections were overwhelmed; and many areas of New Orleans remain vulnerable to another Katrina."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight, the Army Corp of Engineers has taken responsibility for the failure of the levee system, while saying now this city is much better off now and ready for a significant storm." NBC (Savidge) added, "This turnabout on the part of the Army Corps of Engineers, this report, is a huge about-face. What the Corps is saying is that the flood protection system for the city of New Orleans in Southeast Louisiana was a system in name only. The 6,000-plus page report went on to say the flood defense the Army Corps of Engineers built over decades '…was compromised by the incompleteness of the system, the inconsistency in levels of protection, and the lack of redundancy.'" To "independent investigators, the report is an epiphany of sorts for Corps leaders that they finally get it that the Corps was part of the problem." But "for New Orleans residents at the start of a hurricane season, the study only adds to concern."

USA Today (6/2, Levin, 2.31M) reports the report "offers the most complete account yet of why the levees failed. Some engineers said the report did not go far enough in identifying failures within the corps. A report last month by engineers at the University of California-Berkeley urged that the corps be made more efficient and less vulnerable to political pressure."

The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Vartabedian, 958K) reports the investigation said the city's levees were "'a system in name only,' a recognition that a wide range of errors, weak links and incomplete construction was at the heart of the massive damage that occurred on Aug. 29." Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, commander and chief engineer of the corps, said they are "deeply saddened and enormously troubled" by the reports findings.

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 2, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) interviewed Col. Lewis Setliff of the US Army Corps of Engineers. Asked about the Corps reports that says "the damage from Katrina is the work of people and not God.," Setfliff said, "Well, no city is safe. There is always a level of risk in each and every city, and I think the Corps' responsibility, you know, working with elected officials is to minimize that risk as much as we can. But we'll never eliminate it, and what we need to do is keep people, keep businesses informed so they are making these very important decisions."

WAR NEWS:

Charges Expected For Senior Commanders In Haditha Killings. President Bush yesterday again discussed the alleged killing of 24 Iraqi civilians by US Marines in Haditha, again saying he found the allegations "troubling." Meanwhile, military sources are indicating that charges may be filed against senior officials who knew about the killings but did not report them. In addition, the military is requiring that all troops in Iraq receive "core values" training. The story was reported as the lead story on ABC and CBS, while NBC ran it third in its lineup.

ABC World News Tonight (6/1, lead story, 2:50, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "Senior military officials tell ABC News that there will likely be charges against senior officials up the chain of command who were not on the scene at the time of the killing, but should have known that something wrong had happened and done something about it." President Bush: "This is just a reminder, for troops either in Iraq or throughout our military, that there are high standards expected of them. And there are strong rules of engagement. The Haditha incident is under investigation. Obviously, the allegations are very troubling for me and deeply troubling for our military." Karl: "Shortly after the killings, the military made $38,000 in payments to the families of the victims. Investigators believe that the officers who authorized those payments did so because they knew those civilians were killed by Marines, and not by a roadside bomb."

In a separate segment, the ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 2, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "All 130,000 troops in Iraq, every single one, will be given what's called 'core values training.'" Soldiers "will be instructed, 'The law of war provides that soldiers fight only enemy combatants.' It also requires soldiers to destroy no more than the mission requires."

The CBS Evening News (6/1, lead story, 2:35, Palmer, 7.66M) reported, "Already the US military is on the offensive, ordering extra moral, legal, and ethical training for all troops on the battlefield." The "trouble is many Iraqis don't believe it. They've witnessed too many raids on their homes and too many security operations gone wrong, like the death earlier this week of a pregnant woman shot when the car rushing her to a maternity hospital accidentally drove up a road closed by US forces. Today, Iraq's cabinet announced its own investigations into the killings in Haditha, and the new prime minister had harsh words for Coalition troops."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 3, 2:00, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "The top US ground commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, was the first to call for an investigation into the alleged atrocity in Haditha. Today he ordered training for all Coalition forces in moral and ethical conduct on the battlefield." President Bush "today called the reports troubling and promised a thorough investigation." President Bush: "And I'll get to the bottom of this, and if there is a wrongdoing, people will be held to account." Miklaszewski: "But Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki said today this appears to be a horrible crime, and the government in Baghdad announced it would launch its own separate investigation."

The AP (6/1) reports, "The White House said Thursday that it took nearly a month for President Bush to learn that the military was investigating reports that Marines murdered unarmed civilians in Iraq." The AP also reports, "Bush pledged Thursday that the results of the inquiry will be made public." The "U.S. military appears to be conducting four investigations into different aspects of the incident, including into why the American military's initial statement about the incident described it as an ambush on a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol, with a roadside bombing and subsequent firefight killing 15 civilians, eight insurgents and a Marine. The statement, which said the 15 civilians were killed by the blast, has led some to allege a coverup."

Unit Responsible For Haditha Deaths Now At Camp Pendleton. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 2, 2:00, Hughes, 7.66M) reported, "Known as the Marine's Thundering Third, the unit responsible for the deaths in Haditha, Iraq, is back at Camp Pendleton, home base and mostly friendly territory for the troops now under investigation." Some are "comparing the Haditha killings to the Vietnam massacre at Mai Lai," but "in this company town, almost everyone is withholding judgment, waiting to hear the Marines' side of the story." All three commanding officers "have been reassigned to non-leadership duties here. One of them says it makes his blood boil to be blamed for what he calls a massacre when he wasn't even in Haditha that day."

Naval Investigators Plan To Exhume Bodies In Haditha Probe. The Washington Post (6/2, A16, White, Ricks, 744K) reports, "Criminal investigators are hoping to exhume the bodies of several Iraqi civilians allegedly gunned down by a group of U.S. Marines last year in the city of Haditha, aiming to recover potentially important forensic evidence." The Post reports, "Naval Criminal Investigative Service officials have interviewed families of the dead several times and have visited the homes where the shootings allegedly occurred to collect" evidence. The failure of the Marine Corps to report the Nov. 19 Haditha incident to the NCIS "until nearly four months" after it happened "has presented many hurdles for investigators…according to Defense Department officials, defense attorneys and sources close to the criminal probe."

Haditha Timeline Appears To Exonerate Marine Commandant. The Washington Times (6/2, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "US Marine Corps headquarters in Washington did not learn of the killing of Iraqi civilians by Marines in Haditha until early March, a timeline that appears to exonerate the highest ranks of the Marine Corps from any cover-up or failure to act." The Times reports that the "U.S. military command in Baghdad learned of the civilian killings in February and began two investigations: one criminal and one administrative. The administrative probe "is focusing on whether any information was covered up along the Marine Corps chain of command.

UN Mission In Iraq Failed To Pass Along Haditha Reports. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that the UN "failed in January to pass on initial reports of Haditha massacre. An international official blames 'disorganization' for lapse by U.N.'s Iraq mission, which should have informed U.S. ambassador of sketchy allegations."

Troops In Iraq To Get "Core Warrior Values" Training. USA Today (6/2, Brook, 2.31M) reports, "All 150,000 coalition troops in Iraq will undergo refresher training in "core warrior values" over the next month as top military commanders deal with the fallout from allegations of a Marine massacre last November." Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli Thursday ordered commanders to show troops in Iraq "slides that depict professional military values and the importance of disciplined conduct in combat."

The Chicago Tribune (6/2, Sly, 643K) reports, "The training effort marks the first attempt by the U.S. military to limit the fallout of the brewing scandal and the first implicit acknowledgement that the current training effort may fall short of what is required for American soldiers operating in the Iraqi environment." The statement announcing the training "did not mention the Haditha incident and said that the overwhelming majority of the 150,000 or so coalition forces currently based in Iraq 'perform their jobs magnificently every day.' However, it added, 'Unfortunately, there are a few individuals who sometimes choose the wrong path.'"

Henninger Sees Rising "Iraq Syndrome." Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M) columnist Daniel Henninger writes, "The Iraq Syndrome has finally arrived." Henninger writes that the narrative of the Haditha "story has pretty much set in already: It's another My Lai, we all know they did it, the brass covered it up, and prison sentences for homicide are merely a formality." Henninger writes, "The Vietnam Syndrome…was mainly a failure of U.S. elites. But it's different this time. This presidency has been steadfast in war. No matter. … This time the despondency looks to be penetrating the general population." Henninger cites Lt. Gen. Chiarelli's statement that 99.9% of the troops "perform their jobs magnificently," but writes, "Gen. Chiarelli's magnificent "99.9%" notwithstanding, it's the phenomenon of the so-very-public 0.01% -- at Abu Ghraib, on an Afghan street, at Haditha -- that is breaking America's will this time."

Maliki Denounces "Daily" US Attacks On Civilians. The New York Times (6/2, Oppel, 1.19M) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "lashed out at the American military on Thursday, denouncing what he characterized as habitual attacks by troops against Iraqi civilians. As outrage over reports" of atrocities in Haditha "continued to shake the new government, the country's senior leaders said that they would demand that American officials turn over their investigative files on the killings and that the Iraqi government would conduct its own inquiry." Maliki is quoted calling violence against Iraqi civilians by US and coalition soldiers "a daily phenomenon," and said those troops "do not respect the Iraqi people." The Times says Maliki implied that "attacks on civilians will play a role in future decisions on how long to ask American forces to remain in Iraq," and calls his remarks "an unusual declaration for a government that remains desperately dependent on American forces to keep some form of order in the country" and "a sign of the growing pressure on Mr. Maliki," who is "being pushed by the Americans to resolve the quarreling within his fragile coalition that has left him unable to fill cabinet posts for the Ministries of Defense and the Interior, the two top security jobs in the country."

Iraq Launches Separate Probe Of Haditha Killings. The Financial Times (6/2, Biedermann) reports, "Iraq's new government on Thursday launched an investigation into the alleged killing of up to 24 civilians in the town of Haditha by US marines last year," saying its separate inquiry will "look into other allegations of misconduct by the US-led forces in Iraq and at the way troops behave toward the civilian population after they have come under attack."

Maliki Will Announce Key Cabinet Nominees This Weekend. The Washington Times/AP (6/2, Quinn) reports Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "announced Thursday he would fill vacancies at the crucial defense and interior ministries over the weekend, despite failing to reach an agreement on candidates with Iraq's fractious ethnic and sectarian parties. The appointments, which must be approved by parliament, are the keystone of al-Maliki's plan to take complete control of security around Iraq from U.S.-led forces" before 2008.

Video Challenges US Military Account Of Civilian Deaths In March Incident. BBC News (6/2) reports that it has "uncovered new video evidence that US forces may have been responsible for the deliberate killing of 11 innocent Iraqi civilians" in March in the town of Ishaqi. BBC News says the "video appears to challenge the US military's account of events. The US said at the time four people died during a military operation, but Iraqi police claimed that US troops had deliberately shot the 11 people." The video "shows a number of dead adults and children at the site with" gunshot wounds. The tape "came from a hardline Sunni group opposed to coalition forces."

Marines To Face Murder Charges In April Shooting Of Civilian. The AP (6/2, Hettena) reports, "Military prosecutors plan to file murder, kidnapping and conspiracy charges against seven Marines and a Navy corpsman in the shooting death of an Iraqi civilian in April." The men served "with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, and are members of the battalion's Kilo Company. The highest-ranking serviceman is a staff sergeant."

The Los Angeles Times reports the troops "may also have attempted a cover-up by planting evidence near the body to suggest that the man was an armed insurgent digging a hole to plant a roadside bomb." Rep. John Murtha (D-PA) said this week on ABC television that "some Marines pulled somebody out of a house, put them next to an [improvised explosive device], fired some [AK-47s] so they'd have cartridges there. And then tried to cover that up."

Army Dog Handler Convicted Of Abu Ghraib Abuse. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 3, 0:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The last soldier charged with abusing Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib prison was convicted. Sergeant Santos Cardona, a dog handler from Fullerton, California, was found guilty of dereliction of duty and aggravated assault. He faces up to three and a half years in prison."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 4, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported Cardona "was convicted of using the dog to torment a prisoner. He now becomes the 11th soldier convicted in the Abu Ghraib affair." The Washington Times/AP (6/2, Dishneau) also reports the story.

Armitage Says US Didn't Have Enough Troops On Ground To Win Peace. The Washington Times (6/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside The Ring" column, "Former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage is adding his voice to critics of Pentagon civilian and military war planners who said there were not enough troops to produce a successful outcome in Operation Iraqi Freedom." Armitage told the Georgetown Journal of International Affairs, "I think there were some clear misjudgments, including the number of troops that would be required to secure the peace after combat."

Friedman Says Decision On Iraq Pullout Can't Wait For Bush's Successor. Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (6/2, 1.19M), "President Bush has told us that the question of whether to withdraw from Iraq is one that his successor will have to deal with -- not him. I don't think so. Mr. Bush is not going to have that luxury of passing Iraq along. You see, the insurgency in Iraq is in its 'last throes' -- just like Dick Cheney said. Unfortunately, it's being replaced by anarchy in many neighborhoods -- not democracy. And I don't believe the American people will put up with two and half more years of babysitting anarchy instead of midwifing democracy." The Haditha story "is a tragic reminder that a foreign occupation by US forces can't go on for years. Most US soldiers in Iraq have done heroic work, but occupations that drag on inevitably lead to Hadithas."

After Visit To Iraq, Lawmakers Divided On Progress. The Washington Times (6/2, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Members of a congressional delegation to Iraq will return home from the Middle East this weekend with differing opinions about progress in the region." Sen. George Allen, "Virginia Republican and one of several lawmakers touring the region, predicted yesterday that within a year, the United States and its partners will transition to providing more logistical support and medical assistance, allowing some troops to return home. … By contrast, Rep. James E. Clyburn, South Carolina Democrat, said he was 'highly disappointed and quite frankly shocked' at the lack of success of reconstruction efforts and domestic peacekeeping." The Times adds, "Also on the trip were House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, and Republican Reps. Rodney Frelinghuysen of New Jersey and Sam Graves of Missouri."

Marine Corps Says Three KIA Escorts Were Mistreated By TSA. The Washington Times (6/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside The Ring" column, "The Marine Corps is livid over the mistreatment of three Marines at the hands of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) in Philadelphia last month. According to a Marine Corps memo we obtained, three Marines were 'humiliated' by TSA security guards while escorting the body of Marine Sgt. Lea R. Mills, 21, who was killed April 28 along with two others in Al Anbar province, Iraq, by an improvised explosive device." The three Marines "who were accompanying the casket, Sgt. John C. Stock, Cpl. Aaron J. Bigalk and Cpl. Jason A. Schadeburg, were forced to remove their dress blue uniforms, belts and shoes, which were then scanned. They were then 'patted down' by TSA inspectors."

Disabled Iraq War Veteran Sues Moore Over Fahrenheit 9/11. The Washington Post (6/2, 12:52 PM, Lavoie, 744K) reports, "A veteran who lost both arms in the war in Iraq is suing filmmaker Michael Moore for $85 million, alleging that Moore used snippets of a television interview without his permission to falsely portray him as anti-war in 'Fahrenheit 9/11.'" Sgt. Peter Damon "claims in his lawsuit that the way Moore used" a film clip of Damon in the movie "makes him appear to 'voice a complaint about the war effort' when he was actually complaining about 'the excruciating type of pain' that comes with the injury he suffered."

Protesters Fail To Delay Navy Cargo Ship. The New York Times (6/2, Egan, 1.19M) reports, "After nearly a week of protests" in Olympia, WA, "intended to delay a large Navy cargo ship from sailing to the war in Iraq, the vessel sailed out…on time Wednesday." However, "the protests, which were raucous at times, could portend a summer of escalating tensions in the port. The police said 20 protesters…were arrested earlier in the week on misdemeanor charges of attempted trespass and were then released. Two others were charged with a separate offense stemming from a clash with the police."

Karzai Denounces US Gunfire Against Kabul Mob. USA Today (6/2, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "Afghan President Hamid Karzai denounced U.S. soldiers on Thursday for having fired their weapons to escape a mob in Kabul. A member of his Cabinet, meanwhile, said the Afghan government has launched its own investigation into how a traffic crash Monday spiraled into the worst violence in the capital since the fall of the Taliban in 2001." Karzai "spoke a day after Afghanistan's parliament passed a non-binding resolution that called for local prosecution of U.S. troops responsible for the crash." The AP (6/2, Harris) reports Karzai said in a radio address, "The coalition opened fire, and we strongly condemn that. … I have to say, all the time we tell them to be careful because we have one joint aim, which is the struggle against terrorism."

Under the headline "Where Does Karzai Go From Here?," the Christian Science Monitor (6/2, Morarjee, 61K) reports "confidence in President Hamid Karzai's government is at an all-time low. Residents and observers say that the government needs to restore credibility by reforming the Afghan police and insisting on better conduct for foreign troops."

Afghan Ambassador To US Forecasts Increase In Taliban Attacks. The Washington Times (6/2, Motlagh, 90K) reports, "The Taliban will wage its fiercest campaign of attacks in the coming months in an attempt to hamper the transfer of security duties in Afghanistan from the US military to NATO, Kabul's ambassador in Washington says." Said Jawad told the Times, "During the upcoming months, the Taliban will resort to the utmost violence to prevent reconstruction and discourage NATO countries from further deployment." Jawad "said it was critical that the international community help reinforce the capacity of the cash-strapped Afghan government to deliver services 'so the presence of the state will be felt in areas experiencing attacks.'"

AEI Fellow Warns Against Cutting Support For Afghan Army. In a Washington Post (6/2, 744K) op-ed, American Enterprise Institute research fellow Vance Serchuk writes that the US's accomplishment in creating a "multiethnic, battle-hardened and increasingly professional" Afghan National Army "is under threat" from the Bush administration's proposal to reduce US contributions. Serchuck writes, "Asked about the guidance they receive from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on building the Afghan army, officers here often cite the same three questions: Why is it taking so long, why do you need so many people, and when can we leave?" Serchuk writes that, for now, "the emphasis shouldn't be on the army Afghanistan can afford but on the one it needs: a force that can defeat the Taliban and become a long-term partner in the war on terrorism."

LATimes Says US Must Crush Taliban, Protect Afghan Lives. In an editorial responding to Monday's riots in Kabul, the Los Angeles Times writes, "The international community must immediately focus on building roads and providing electricity to blacked-out Kabul." The Times writes, "Arab and Persian Gulf states…should give the $90 million that will be needed for diesel fuel to keep Kabul electrified for the next two years while transmission lines are being built to bring power from Central Asia. The U.S. and NATO also will have to invest the military resources to crush the Taliban decisively — and insist that Pakistan do the same." Lastly, the Times writes, "the United States must begin to treat Afghanistan as a sovereign state whose citizens' lives have to be protected. A start would be for Washington to sign a 'status of forces agreement' to govern the behavior of U.S. military forces there. Lessons in driving and crowd control wouldn't hurt, either."

DOJ Awards $42 Million Litigation Case Management Contract To CSC. Federal Computer Week (6/2, Hubler) reports, "The Justice Department has awarded Computer Sciences Corp., a contract worth $42 million to build the department's new Litigation Case Management System (LCMS), which will give the various litigating divisions greater data sharing capabilities." FCW continues, "The system will include a centralized application and database with unique interfaces for various divisions of the agency. The interfaces will allow employees in the Antitrust, Civil Rights, Criminal, Environmental and Natural Resources and Tax divisions, as well as the 94 U.S. Attorney offices, to access data unique to the respective agencies. … At the same time, LCMS will be a single repository where Justice executives can access all litigation case management information and reporting. It will also improve the quality of data used for reporting to Congress, the Office of Management and Budget and other agencies, according to a department announcement."

Government Computer News (6/2, Dizard) reports, "Justice now has dozens of litigation case management systems because each of the department's U.S. Attorney's offices nationwide has had the autonomy to tailor systems to its own needs. In addition, the department's six divisions that send platoons of trial attorneys into courtrooms have developed separate case management systems. … The Justice system forms an important part of the Office of Management and Budget's Case Management System Line of Business. … That line of business also includes the FBI's failed Virtual Case File and its successor, the fledgling Sentinel project. OMB also has directed Justice, leader of the case management line of business project, eventually to develop an administrative case management system." GCN adds, "LCMS is intended to serve as a template for other litigation case management systems used by attorneys across the federal government. … 'The Department's Antitrust, Criminal, Civil Rights, Civil, Environment and Natural Resources, and Tax divisions, as well as the U.S. Attorney's offices, will use the LCMS to facilitate the transfer of information through the use of common solutions and data standards,' Justice said in a statement."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

NASD Drops Civil Case Against Quattrone. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Smith) reports, "Wall Street regulators dropped civil charges against Frank Quattrone, giving the former investment-banking star his third win in three months in cases that arose from the Internet-stock bubble of 1999-2000. … He still faces a possible retrial on criminal obstruction-of-justice charges." The Journal continues, "The National Association of Securities Dealers this week withdrew "spinning" charges first brought in March 2003 that Mr. Quattrone improperly used the lure of sought-after initial public offerings to win financing business as head of technology banking at the then-named Credit Suisse First Boston securities unit of Credit Suisse Group, now simply Credit Suisse. The NASD also dropped stock-research bias charges. … In a statement, Mr. Quattrone said he had 'complied with the rules and regulations' throughout his 23-year career in banking and was 'pleased that justice has been done.' The NASD asked to withdraw the charges because many potential witnesses weren't any longer under its jurisdiction as registered securities-industry employees, and thus couldn't be compelled to testify. Quattrone lawyer Kenneth Hausman also argued witnesses' memories might be impaired because the case was based on events that occurred between 1998 and 2001, five to eight years ago."

The New York Times (6/2, Sorkin) reports, "The decision comes just two months after a federal appeals court overturned his conviction on charges of obstruction of justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission reversed a decision to ban him for life from the securities industry. … If prosecutors decide against retrying Mr. Quattrone, speculation is already rife that he could return to deal making in the Valley, where he helped companies like Cisco Systems and Amazon.com go public." The Times adds, "Yesterday's decision by NASD, which polices the brokerage industry, to dismiss its own case is notable because it was the accusations in the case — that he illegally doled out hot initial public offerings to corporate clients in exchange for business — that prosecutors later cited in his criminal trial to suggest that he was trying to cover up that activity and obstruct justice. … The dismissal is also notable because Mr. Quattrone's former firm, Credit Suisse First Boston, now Credit Suisse, paid $100 million to settle similar charges against the firm with the NASD in 2002. … Still, Mr. Quattrone faces the possibility that prosecutors could bring the obstruction of justice case against him again. But some legal experts suggested that with the dismissal of the NASD's 2003 case, momentum might be building for the criminal case to be extinguished, too."

The AP (6/2) reports, "Quattrone was the king dealmaker of the Internet stock boom who made a fortune helping bring some of the hottest new Internet companies to the market at his Wall Street investment bank, Credit Suisse First Boston, which has since changed its name to Credit Suisse (USA) Inc. He was convicted in May 2004 on federal charges of obstruction of justice, after his first trial ended in a hung jury. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the conviction in March, granting Quattrone a third trial. … The NASD in March 2003 had charged Quattrone with 'spinning' - giving corporate executive clients the chance to buy into coveted initial public offerings as a way to win their companies' investment-banking business - from July 1998 to December 2001. The hearing officer on Wednesday granted a motion by the organization's enforcement department to withdraw the charges. … Quattrone had asserted that he was not responsible for making or supervising IPO allocations at CSFB and that NASD rules did not prohibit the conduct in question."

Uncharged Enron Directors Lie Low After Guilty Verdicts. The Washington Post (6/2, D01, Masters) reports, "A week after a Houston jury convicted former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay of fraud, one of the Houston oil company's onetime directors says he still can't believe Lay knew about accounting schemes that caused the firm's 2001 implosion. … 'I'm convinced he didn't know what was going on. . . . I just can't bear the picture of him going off to jail,' said Charls E. Walker, a Potomac-based economist and lobbyist who joined the Houston energy company's board before it was known as Enron." The Post continues, "As for his own role as a member of the board of directors from 1985 to 1999, Walker, 82, is regretful. 'I was duped. Part of the problem was putting so much confidence in Ken's integrity and ability. . . . We were taken for a ride.' … Walker is unusual among the 18 former Enron directors in that he is still willing to talk about the company and the role he played in it. All of the others either declined to comment or failed to return messages left at their homes and workplaces." The Post adds, "After enduring widespread public criticism and congressional scrutiny in 2001 and 2002 for failing to spot or stop Enron's mounting financial troubles, most of the board members have largely gone underground. Many of them resigned from -- or did not run again for seats on -- a number of corporate boards, and those who are still in the public eye have largely removed references to Enron from their biographies. … Compared with Lay and other top Enron executives who face lengthy prison terms, the former Enron directors got off lightly. They have faced no government sanctions, and their personal financial costs have been relatively small. Yet outside directors are almost never held responsible for corporate malfeasance, and the fact the Enron's former directors paid any price at all is testament to the depth of public anger over the collapse of what was once ranked the nation's seventh-largest company. … The Securities and Exchange Commission has not taken any formal action against the former Enron directors, but Enron investors sued them, alleging that all 18 had engaged in insider trading by selling shares while they knew more than the public about Enron's complicated financial structures."

Pitt Says Options Backdating Scandal Highlights Need For Improved Internal Controls. In a Financial Times op-ed (6/2), former SEC Chairman Harvey Pitt says, "We now have an unfolding scandal over alleged backdating of option grants to senior executives. Even though it is unlikely we will find much of this misconduct occurring after Sarbanes-Oxley was enacted, this is more than of historical interest. There are important lessons to be learnt from this scandal." Options backdating "calls a company's internal controls into question. Many discussions of backdating options start with the observation that backdating is not, per se, illegal. That is wrong." Backdating is "not only illegal and unethical, it points to a lack of integrity in a company's internal controls. With more and more companies being identified as having a backdating problem, the issue for regulators, prosecutors and plaintiffs' attorneys is who was at fault. Already, executives have resigned or been fired, with more casualties sure to follow. But from the company/shareholder perspective, the question is more properly one of how to move forward. For that, solutions must start with the board of directors and its compensation committee."

CRIMINAL LAW:

ABC Poll Finds 86% Support FBI Search Of Congressional Offices. ABC News (6/1, Langer) reports on its Web site, "In the rift between Congress and the Justice Department, Americans side overwhelmingly with law enforcement: Regardless of precedent and the separation of powers, 86 percent say the FBI should be allowed to search a Congress member's office if it has a warrant. That view is broadly bipartisan, this ABC News poll finds, ranging from 78 percent among Democrats to 94 percent of Republicans," and "support for FBI searches is about equally high whether people see Congress as honest or not." ABC notes that the poll "was conducted by telephone May 26-30, 2006, among a random national sample of 1,044 adults. The results have a three-point error margin."

Fox News' Special Report with Brit Hume (6/1) briefly reported the poll results in its "Political Grapevine" segment, noting, "Despite the constitutional howls from Capitol Hill, Americans seem to have no problem with FBI raids on congressional offices."

Meanwhile, in a USA Today (6/2, 2.31M) column, Chuck Raasch writes that the Jefferson case "would make the writers of the Constitution cringe. … There are serious constitutional issues at stake. But the way that leaders in the House of Representatives reacted looked on Main Street like yet another example of Washington politicians putting themselves above the law." Raasch adds, "Had the average American been suspected of doing what Jefferson is alleged to have done, no one in Congress would have protested when the FBI came knocking."

FBI-Hastert Rift Appears To Be Cooling. The White House Bulletin (6/1) reported, "Anger in FBI ranks over House Speaker Dennis Hastert's charge that they went too far when seizing papers" from Jefferson's office "appears to be cooling, according to both sides. 'I think it's over and they know what we meant. It wasn't a slam on them,' said a House leadership official regarding, and FBI officials "said that their anger at Hastert's claim that the FBI had crossed constitutional boundaries has waned after the affair erupted last week." Still, "some leadership officials remain worried that hearings into the document raid could again enflame relations and are hoping that they end without any acrimonious charges from the Judiciary Committee. … Meanwhile, leadership officials said they hope the whole episode sent a message to the White House that the GOP expects better communication from the West Wing and federal agencies than they've seen in recent months, a problem dating back at least to the Dubai ports scandal."

Both DOJ, Congress Said To Have Overreached In Jefferson Search. The New York Times (6/2, Liptak, 1.19M) reports, "The Justice Department is probably correct in saying that it was legally entitled to search" Rep. William Jefferson's office. "But in ignoring history and established conventions in that case, some legal scholars say, the Bush administration has again unsettled widely shared understandings of constitutional relationships and freedoms that have existed for generations." The Times adds that "having the legal power to conduct a search of another branch of government does not mean it is a wise or prudent thing to do. … At the same time, Congressional leaders may have overreached in describing the search as a flagrant violation of the Constitution."

Dionne Says House Hearing Was Attempt To Pressure DOJ Over Probes. In his Washington Post (6/2, 744K) column, E.J. Dionne compares the House Judiciary hearing on the Jefferson search to a brushback pitch in baseball, writing that "Rep. James Sensenbrenner's committee was really sending a message as the House confronts a far-reaching corruption investigation: Nice little Justice Department you have there, Mr. Attorney General. Too bad if anything were to happen to it. Stop messing with us before we mess with you." Dionne adds, "So keep an eye on the leadership of the Justice Department. Here's hoping that it resists political pressure -- whether from Congress or the White House -- and allows its prosecutors to proceed with legitimate investigations of corruption."

Jefferson Said To Have Been Undone By Love Of Money. The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Simmons, Fiore, 958K) reports Rep. Jefferson was "once famous in Louisiana circles as the sharecropper's son who made his way to Harvard, steered by parents who preached the value of education. Today, Jefferson is infamous nationally as the Louisiana Democrat who stashed $90,000 of alleged bribe money in his kitchen freezer." Those who "have watched his career's spectacular rise and potential fall believe the terrible poverty he escaped was ultimately his undoing. He rose to become his state's first African American congressman since Reconstruction, but people who know him say he still had a thirst for wealth." New Orleans political consultant Allan Katz said, "His perceived flaw among his peers has always been that, shaped by his humble beginnings, Bill loved money and desperately wanted to be a rich man."

Roots Of Controversy Said To Lie In Constitution. Voice of America (6/2, Malone) reports, "A controversy over federal agents raiding the office of a congressman has its roots in the formation of the U.S. Constitution more than 200 years ago." VOA continues, "In the early days of the American Republic, the revolutionaries who won independence from Britain were determined not to replace a powerful English monarch with an equally potent American president. … So the founders devised a system of separate powers whereby the Congress made the laws, the executive branch, led by the president, enforced the laws, and the judicial branch, led by the Supreme Court, interpreted the laws to make sure they conformed with powers set forth in the U.S. Constitution." VOA adds, "Lawmakers upset with the FBI raid on Congressman Jefferson's office are concerned with what they view as an attempt by the executive branch, in the form of the Justice Department, to intimidate a member of the legislative branch. … Charles Tiefer is a law professor at the University of Baltimore in Maryland. He testified at a recent hearing called by members of Congress angry about the search of Congressman Jefferson's office. … 'Now this raid had all the elements of unconstitutional executive intimidation,' he said. … Another witness, George Washington University law Professor Jonathan Turley, said the office search represented a break in tradition that goes back 219 years to the formation of the Constitution in 1787." VOA notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says his department has the right to investigate allegations of corruption in Congress and is respectful of the separation of powers. … 'Personally, in the department collectively, we have a great deal of respect for the Congress as a co-equal branch of government, as a separate and independent branch of government,' said Mr. Gonzales."

Tampa Tribune Calls Constitutional Criticism Of FBI Search "Wildly Overblown." The Tampa Tribune (6/2) editorializes, "Many members of Congress are outraged that the FBI raided the offices of Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson and took legislative files along with the evidence they sought for a bribery investigation. But accusations that the FBI trampled the doctrine of separation of powers are wildly overblown. … The Constitution anticipated attempts to harass Congress," but "the writers of the Constitution never envisioned an office hideout for elected felons." The Tribune adds, "If rumors are true about the breadth of the improper generosity of certain lobbyists, those assigned to write the guidelines have no time to dally."

More Commentary. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (6/2), Dan K. Thomasson writes, "Congress' relationship with the FBI always has been Frankenstein-like with the father of the monster regarding his creation with cautious affection rooted in fear. The result has been fawning accommodation and unlimited tolerance for whatever the bureau demands, no matter how outrageous or unwarranted, a willingness to excuse what clearly was the inexcusable from Waco to Ruby Ridge to 9/11. … Now the bureau's woes have been exacerbated by the Jefferson affair resulting in outrage from the leaders of both parties in Congress and embarrassment to a president who badly needs a better relationship with the legislative branch. … While this encroachment can be expected to pass, it clearly is another blow to the FBI's reputation. A number of constitutional scholars believe the action leaps the barrier separating the branches of government. … Whatever the reason, the Prometheus that remained unchained so long faces a new challenge to stay that way and to prevent the growing number of lawmakers who would relieve it of its responsibilities from succeeding."

Data Retention Talks Continue Between DOJ, Internet Providers. The AP (6/2) reports, "Top U.S. law enforcement officials have told Internet companies they must retain customer records longer to help in child pornography and terrorism investigations, and they are considering asking Congress to require preservation of records. … Industry representatives are expected to meet Friday with Justice Department officials, a week after Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller first raised the issue with executives from several Internet service providers, including AOL, Comcast Corp., Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc." The AP continues, "The subject has prompted alarm from some executives and privacy advocates, especially after Gonzales' Justice Department took Google to court earlier this year to force it to turn over information on customer searches. Civil liberties groups also have sued Verizon and other telephone companies, alleging they are working with the government to provide information without search warrants on subscriber calling records. … Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, who attended the first meeting, said Thursday that some executives raised privacy concerns at the meeting. But she said Gonzales has not made any decisions about how to proceed and that the department would be mindful of the privacy issue. … 'We are looking at whether requiring longer data retention or asking ISPs to do it informally is something we want to pursue,' Brand said. … Mueller suggested a period of two years and said terrorism investigations also would be helped by such a rule, several people who attended the meeting said. Gonzales was focused on child pornography cases, they said."

The New York Times (6/2, Hansell, Lichtblau) reports, "The attorney general has appointed a task force of department officials to explore the issue, and that group is holding another meeting with a broader group of Internet executives today," DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. "The department also met yesterday with a group of privacy experts. … The Justice Department is not asking the Internet companies to give it data about users, but rather to retain information that could be subpoenaed through existing laws and procedures, Mr. Roehrkasse said." The Times adds, "While initial proposals were vague, executives from companies that attended the meeting said they gathered that the department was interested in records that would allow them to identify which individuals visited certain Web sites and possibly conducted searches using certain terms. … It also wants the Internet companies to retain records about whom their users exchange e-mail with, but not the contents of e-mail messages, the executives said. The executives spoke on the condition that they not be identified because they did not want to offend the Justice Department. … The proposal and the initial meeting were first reported by USA Today and CNet News.com."

In a front-page story, The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Menn, 958K) reports, "Big Internet and telephone companies are girding to fight" the "unprecedented" request by Gonzales and Mueller, which "would dramatically expand the government's ability to track what people do online and with whom they communicate." The Times notes, "Law enforcement officials would still need some legal instrument, such as a subpoena or search warrant, to look at the data. But FBI agents also have the power to request information secretly, without a court order, through so-called National Security Letters."

The San Jose Mercury News (6/2, Ackerman) reports, "Current regulations require companies to preserve data that is the subject of specific criminal investigations while law enforcement collects evidence that could support a warrant. … 'This is a radical departure from current practices,' said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, who meet with justice department officials Thursday. 'We've opposed it because we think it creates an unnecessary risk to privacy and security of Internet users.' … Brian Roehrkasse, a department spokesman, said the purpose of the meetings with the Internet companies and others is 'to solicit their input and seek their assistance in formulating proposals and recommendations on the issue of data retention.'"

Bloomberg (6/2, Schmidt) reports, "The Justice Department has no legal authority to require companies to keep data on their customers and would need to ask Congress for that ability, Roehrkasse said. He said there has been no decision on how long companies would need to store the records." Bloomberg adds, "New York-based Verizon Communications Inc., the No. 2 U.S. telephone company, and Philadelphia-based Comcast Corp., the largest U.S. cable provider, were among the companies at last week's meeting, Roehrkasse said. AOL is the Internet unit of New York-based Time Warner Inc., the world's largest media company. … Gonzales said in April that Internet service providers had hurt child pornography probes by not keeping data long enough. He said he would personally reach out to chief executive officers of leading providers to resolve the problem. … Earlier this year, the Justice Department sparred with Google over a request for information on its customer searches. In March, a federal judge ordered the Mountain View, California-based company to turn over some of the records demanded by the government."

Maryland Judge Sentences Sniper Muhammad To Six Life Terms. The Washington Times (6/2, Ward) reports, "A Montgomery County judge yesterday sentenced sniper John Allen Muhammad to six consecutive life sentences for his role in the 2002 shootings that terrorized the D.C. metropolitan area. … 'You came into this county and randomly murdered innocent and defenseless people. You would have murdered more people, but you got caught,' Circuit Judge James L. Ryan said to Muhammad, the mastermind of the shootings. … 'The citizens have, to the best of their ability, recovered and will continue to recover,' he said. 'But you, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope, no future.' Muhammad, 45, said nothing but looked at the judge with his arms crossed. … As Muhammad was handcuffed and led out of the Rockville courtroom, family members of the sniper victims and onlookers broke into applause."

The AP (6/2, Manning) reports, "After representing himself throughout the monthlong trial, Muhammad chose not to speak at his sentencing. J. Wyndal Gordon, an attorney helping him, said Muhammad told him, 'I said everything I wanted to say.' … Muhammad was convicted Tuesday of six counts of murder for six of the 10 deadly sniper attacks that terrorized the Washington area in October 2002. He was already under a death sentence in Virginia for a killing there. … This time, Muhammad's young accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, took the stand for the first time to testify against him. Malvo told jurors how the older man, his one-time mentor, trained him to shoot and drew him into a sinister plan to kill people, including children, indiscriminately. … Jurors deliberated less than five hours before finding Muhammad guilty."

The Baltimore Sun (6/2, Siegel) reports, "More than three years after a sniper's bullet felled Conrad Johnson as he stood in the doorway of a Montgomery County bus, Sonia Wills had the opportunity Thursday to confront her son's convicted killer. … Calling John Allen Muhammad the 'devil's advocate,' Wills bore into the 45-year-old Gulf War veteran as he looked downward, toward papers at the defense table. … 'It is a shame you will not look at us to see the lives you have devastated, the lives that you have ruined,' Wills told Muhammad. … Wills was one of four relatives of Muhammad's victims who spoke at a hearing at which he was sentenced to six consecutive life terms with no possibility of parole for sniper shootings in Montgomery County in the fall of 2002."

The Washington Post (6/2, B1, Londoño, Rich) reports, "As his last act in a Maryland courtroom, John Allen Muhammad chose silence. … The man convicted twice of terrorizing the Washington area with a powerful rifle and an impressionable accomplice betrayed no emotion yesterday as relatives of the people he killed spoke of their loss. He remained impassive as a judge sentenced him to six consecutive terms of life in prison without the possibility of parole. … 'You chose the wrong community, sir, to stain with your acts of violence,' Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan told Muhammad." The Post notes, "J. Wyndal Gordon, one of Muhammad's stand-by lawyers, maintained that Muhammad -- who doggedly defended himself during the month-long trial -- is an innocent man who was not allowed to tell his side of the story. … 'We came here in search for justice,' Wyndal said. 'We came here in the search for the truth, to find out what really happened during those 23 days in October. My humble opinion is that we fell short.'" The Post adds, "Outside, State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, flanked by relatives of sniper victims, faced a wall of cameras to hail the sentence. … 'Anyone who suggested that this trial shouldn't be brought to Montgomery County should be ashamed,' he said of people who questioned the need for another trial after Muhammad had been convicted of murder in Virginia. … His deputy, Katherine Winfree, who prosecuted the case, said that although the county is no stranger to violent crimes, Muhammad is in a league of his own. … 'No one has ever stood before a judge in this county with more on his conscience and more crimes to his discredit than John Allen Muhammad,' Winfree said."

Longtime Aide Testifies About Managing Dixon Bribe Money. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/2, Buser) reports, "A longtime aide to Roscoe Dixon testified Thursday the former state senator had him handle bribe money and that Dixon also sometimes directed him to give portions to Kathryn Bowers and other legislators. In his second day on the witness stand in Dixon's federal extortion and bribery trial, Barry Myers watched himself on surveillance tapes telling an informant that Dixon trusted him 'like a son' and that his boss was paranoid and 'scared of his own (expletive) shadow' about getting caught taking payoffs." In a second story, The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/2, Perrusquia) reports, "Reputations went on trial Thursday…when prosecutors played secret tapes that included allegations of payoffs to uncharged politicians. On those tapes…confessed 'bag man' Barry Myers brags to an undercover FBI agent about delivering money to several local public officials. … The taped statements triggered sharp denials from the uncharged parties." The Commercial Appeal adds, "Defense attorney Coleman Garrett, who has portrayed Myers as a crook and a liar, got him to admit he had lied when he was first questioned by the FBI about his Waltz involvement, yet Myers said he did it to protect Dixon."

The AP (6/2, Baird) reports jurors watched surveillance video of Dixon "picking up a stack of $100 bills put before him by an aide and an FBI informant." Myers "said the money was to pay for the senator's help in getting a favorable state law passed for a company called E-Cycle Management," which "Myers and Dixon found out later, was a fake company set up by the FBI to snag state lawmakers and other Tennessee officials looking for bribes." The AP adds, "Agents working on the two-year investigation made hundreds of audio and video recordings, most of them with the help of informant" Tim Willis, "a convicted felon and former business consultant." WPTY-TV Memphis (6/1) noted, "The bribe was not connected to E-Cycle, the dummy company set up by the FBI to target crooked law makers in the Tennessee waltz sting, but it goes back to a scandal involving the Children's Dental Clinic and TennCare certification. Lawyers for the government say tapes like this led to Dixon's investigation."

Under the headline "Tape Shows Dixon Pocket Cash," The Tennessean (6/2, de la Cruz) adds, "Thursday afternoon, Dixon's attorney quizzed Myers on his motives for involving Dixon, suggesting that Myers had no other real source of income. Attorney Coleman Garrett also suggested that the $1,000 Dixon took could have been a campaign contribution and that there were no witnesses who saw Myers turn over more money to Dixon. A Dixon supporter who attended the trial as a spectator said he did not believe the recordings were incriminating." Del Gill said, "You hear them saying to Roscoe, 'I need your support.' Of course, Roscoe will tell a friend, 'You've got my support.'" He also "noted that $1,000 is the same amount other legislators, such as Sen. Jeff Miller, who have not been charged in Tennessee Waltz, got from E-Cycle." WTVF-TV Nashville (6/1) also reported on the tapes and Myers' testimony.

Sorich Lawyer Tries To Undermine Credibility Of Key Prosecution Witness. The Chicago Tribune (6/2, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "The lawyer for Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief aggressively attacked the credibility of a key prosecution witness in the City Hall corruption trial Thursday, suggesting the witness agreed to wear a hidden recording device to shorten his prison stay. Defense attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin portrayed retired city official Daniel Katalinic…as a crook with little choice but to help the federal investigation of alleged corruption in the Daley administration. Katalinic pleaded guilty last year to one mail fraud count, admitting he got $15,000 in bribes from city trucking contractors. He said he hoped his cooperation would earn a lesser sentence." However, The Tribune notes, Katalinic's "testimony provided damning accounts of the roles that Durkin's client, Robert Sorich, and three other city officials allegedly played in city hiring." WLS-TV Chicago (6/1, Schulte) also reported on the cross-examination and noted, "Meantime, prosecutors never played a tape of a conversation Katalinic had with Robert Sorich when the FBI had Katalanic wear a wire. The defense says the tape actually helps exonerate Sorich."

The Chicago Sun-Times (6/2, Korecki, Warmbir, Spielman) reports Katalinic testified yesterday that "political groups competed over the number of city jobs they could give their troops as post-election rewards, and they even complained that the powerful Hispanic Democratic Organization got a larger share." But defense attorneys "attacked…Katalinic's testimony, getting him to grow misty-eyed about his decision to flip for government prosecutors -- and to admit that while political groups did slip lists of names to the Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, there were 'no guarantees' they'd be hired." The Sun-Times adds, "Meanwhile, City Hall disclosed that Mayor Daley's corporation counsel, Mara Georges, has been subpoenaed by the defense and will testify if she is called."

Ryan Lawyers File Motion Seeking New Trial. The AP (6/2, Robinson) reports, "George Ryan's lawyers set the stage Thursday for the former governor's appeal of his racketeering and fraud conviction by filing 70 pages of court papers asking for a new trial on the grounds that juror misconduct 'taints the verdict in this case.' … Much of the document was a painstaking rehashing of the agony that followed the April 18 guilty verdict…when goings-on in the jury room began to come to light," but "it also said that prosecutors had failed to provide adequate proof of the charges and that the judge should have allowed the defense to tell jurors more about what Ryan did when he was in power in Springfield."

Arrest Of Fumo Aides Raises Questions About Charges Against Senator. The AP (6/2, Dale) reports, "The FBI spent three years investigating powerful state Sen. Vincent Fumo…before charging two underlings Wednesday with obstructing justice. A day later, the obvious question remained: What about Fumo?" Defense lawyer William DeStefano said, "It tells me that they're trying to either scare the devil out of these two guys who got arrested to obtain their cooperation, or to put the fear of God into other people. And that sort of tells me that they're not comfortable with their case against the senator." But "others suggested that federal prosecutors – humbled perhaps by the acquittal of some bankers in the Philadelphia pay-to-play scandal – want to build an ironclad case."

In an editorial, The Philadelphia Daily News (6/2) also says that "questions surrounding…Fumo are beginning to pile up. … There's the obvious ones such as, is Fumo guilty of anything? So far, the answer is no, though an investigation is continuing. … Then there's the less obvious question: At what point does a politician mau-mauing a company into doing what could be argued is a public good become criminal activity? … It could be if the feds can prove the other part of their inquiry: whether Fumo benefited politically or personally from expenditures made by Citizens' Alliance. Here the feds may have a convincing case." The Daily News concludes, all of "which prompts this final question: Isn't it time for stricter restrictions on whether politicians should operate foundations at all?"

FBI Affidavit Provides Details Of Fumo Probe. The Philadelphia Daily News (6/2, Davies) reports, "Information contained in a federal affidavit released Wednesday casts some doubt on state Sen. Vince Fumo's claim earlier this year that he had no role in a $310,000 real-estate deal involving electrical contractor Donald 'Gus' Dougherty, whose office was raided by the FBI in January. And Fumo may have directed a nonprofit organization's purchase of as many as two dozen properties in South Philadelphia, the affidavit suggests. … The affidavit said Fumo instructed an unnamed aide 'that he alone would decide which properties are to be purchased' by Citizens Alliance," the nonprofit group. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/2, McCoy, Cattabiani, 423K) provides "a probe primer" detailing what's known about the investigation thus far and notes that in yesterday's affidavit, "the FBI disclosed it was investigating whether Fumo 'engaged in extortion' in seeking money for a nonprofit from two corporations, Peco Energy and Verizon Communications. Verizon balked, but Peco gave $17 million to Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods under secret deals in which Fumo dropped his opposition to the electric giant's business plans."

Analysts Predict Fumo Will Remain In Office, Evade Prosecution. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/2, Mauriello, 261K) reports, "Dubbed by some 'Prince Vince,' Mr. Fumo is unlikely to be shaken off his throne anytime soon, insiders say, despite an FBI investigation into whether he extorted contributions to a Philadelphia charity that were later used to benefit him personally and politically. … The U.S. Department of Justice says more charges and more arrests are possible, but insiders and pundits predict Mr. Fumo will emerge unscathed." The Post-Gazette notes, "The trick now for Mr. Fumo will be avoiding the legal traps being laid out by federal investigators who arrested the two Fumo staffers Wednesday. Attorneys for the men say the arrests were an FBI tactic to get the staffers to cooperate in the investigation," but they "plan to fight the charges and remain loyal to Mr. Fumo, their lawyers told reporters."

FBI Raids Office Of DC Charter School Office Director. The Washington Post (6/1, B3, Haynes, Strauss, 744K) reported, "The FBI raided the office and home of the D.C. school board's executive director of charter schools" Wednesday "as part of an investigation into the possible misuse of hundreds of thousands of dollars in federal and city funds, school board officials and law enforcement sources said. Investigators are focusing on the charter school office," and executive director Brenda L. Belton. "School sources…said authorities also are looking into whether some firms hired by the charter school office were connected to Belton. The sources said that the FBI search of the office began about 7 a.m. and continued for six hours and that numerous boxes of documents were confiscated."

Judge Upholds Admission Of Evidence From FBI Pellicano Search. The AP (6/2) reports, "A federal judge presiding over the trial of a private investigator accused of wiretapping Hollywood celebrities said prosecutors can use evidence gathered in a search of his offices. FBI agents raided Anthony Pellicano's offices in 2002 and found illegal explosives," and Pellicano lawyer Steven Gruel "challenged the legality of the search, saying the raids amounted to a fishing expedition." In a decision made public yesterday, US District Judge Dale S. Fischer "on May 22 concurred with an earlier ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that found the search was valid," but "the judge said her decision doesn't preclude Pellicano from requesting a hearing at which Gruel could call FBI agents to determine if there were any misrepresentations made with the search warrants."

Officials Seek United Response To Maryland Gang Crime. The Washington Times (6/2, Wagner) reports, "Federal, state and local officials who participated in the Maryland Gang Summit yesterday agreed that cooperation is key for fighting the increasing number of criminal gangs in the state." The Times continues, "Gaithersburg Police Detective Patrick Word said yesterday that there are currently about 10,000 gang members in Maryland. The gangs that exist in Maryland include the Bloods/United Blood Nation, Black Guerilla Family, Mara Salvatrucha or MS-13, Tiny Rascal Gangsters, Street Thug Criminals, Hells Angels, Vatos Loco, Pagans and South Side Locos, he said. … More than 300 people attended the day-long summit at the Sheraton Hotel. Participants included Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, sheriffs, federal and state prosecutors, police, mayors, community officials and non-profit organizations."

The Washington Post (6/2, B05, Vogel) reports, "Criminal gangs are operating across Maryland at a level many in the state do not recognize or are unwilling to admit, participants in what was billed as the first Maryland gang summit warned yesterday." The Post continues, "At the Columbia summit, speakers -- who included police detectives, state and federal prosecutors, politicians and representatives of community groups -- described an insidious problem and said law enforcement is often not the solution. The battle to keep young people out of gangs is being fought inside schools and homes, they said, with teachers, parents and social workers on the front line. … Maryland, with its broad socioeconomic and ethnic mix, has become a 'microcosm of gang activity,' according to Assistant U.S. Attorney James Trusty. 'We really have every type of gang activity,' added Trusty, gang coordinator for the U.S. attorney's office for Maryland. 'Our schools and businesses are increasingly in the line of fire.' … The problem drew broad attention in Montgomery County last summer when, on a single day in August, gang fights led to the stabbing of two summer school students at a Silver Spring high school and to a melee at a Wheaton shopping center that left four teenagers wounded. Later that month, 19 Mara Salvatrucha members were indicted on federal racketeering charges."

The Baltimore Sun (6/2, Dolan) reports, "MS-13, the target of a major federal indictment in Maryland last summer, isn't the state's biggest gang problem. The Bloods are. … That is the conclusion reached by the state's leading gang investigators, who presented their latest findings Thursday at a summit in Columbia of 300 law enforcement officers, political leaders and educators." The Sun continues, "MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, originated in Los Angeles among refugees from El Salvador and received national attention in recent years for its rapid spread and violence. … Federal prosecutors charged 19 alleged MS-13 members from Southern Maryland in August." The Sun adds, "Experts said Thursday that it is still the Bloods, who crop up on street corners in Baltimore, in schools in Harford County and in prisons throughout the state, who have the greatest reach. … The daylong conference, funded by a $2 million federal grant to the Maryland U.S. attorney's office, sought to promote local and federal efforts to prevent young people from joining gangs, to encourage current members to quit, and to lock up their leaders."

Alleged Chicago Mob Murderer Seeks Release On Bail. The Chicago Sun-Times (6/2, Warmbir) reports, "Frank Calabrese Sr. has been accused of killing 13 people in mob hits, but his attorney swears he's not a danger to society. So attorney Joseph Lopez is asking a federal judge to release Calabrese…from the Metropolitan Correctional Center while he awaits trial as one of the top mobsters charged in the most important recent criminal case filed against the Chicago mob, called Family Secrets." The Sun-Times notes, "Calabrese Sr.'s chances to get out appear slim. When a fellow defendant, alleged Chicago mob leader James Marcello, charged with three murders in the case asked for bond, the judge denied the request. And the evidence appears extensive against Calabrese."

Texas Death Row Inmate Sparks Debate Over Execution Of Insane. The New York Times (6/2, Blumenthal, Liptak) reports, "Scott Panetti, a death row inmate in Texas, understands that the state says it intends to execute him for the murder of his wife's parents. … But Mr. Panetti, 48, who represented himself in court despite a long and colorful history of mental illness, says he believes that the state's real reason is a different one. He says the state, in league with Satan, wants to kill him to keep him from preaching the Gospel." The Times continues, "That delusion has been documented by doctors and acknowledged by judges and prosecutors. It poses what experts call the next big question in death penalty law now that the Supreme Court has barred the execution of juvenile offenders and the mentally retarded: what makes someone too mentally ill to be executed?" The Times adds, "A three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, recently said Mr. Panetti was sane enough to die. The full court will soon decide whether to hear the case. … Mr. Panetti, in prison now almost 14 years for the killings in 1992 in the quaint Hill Country city of Fredericksburg, has long seemed to exemplify madness, addressing himself to the jury in his trial in 1995 as 'the born-again April Fool,' a schizophrenic healed by God. … In and out of mental institutions 14 times and addicted to drugs and alcohol since he almost drowned as a child and was nearly electrocuted by a power line, Mr. Panetti wore cowboy costumes to court, delivered rambling monologues, put himself on the witness stand and sought to subpoena the pope, Jesus and John F. Kennedy. … Jurors were clearly alienated and took little more than an hour to reject his insanity defense. … They found that Mr. Panetti knew right from wrong and so deserved the death penalty. That is a separate question from whether his mental illness should bar his execution."

Two New York Sex Offenders Arrested For Child Porn Possession. The AP (6/2) reports two North Tonawanda, N.Y., "registered sex offenders have been arrested for allegedly possessing child pornography, federal authorities said Thursday." Jeffrey Frazier, "who was sentenced to 60 days in prison after being convicted in 2003 of sexual abuse and endangering the welfare of a child, was charged following a visit to his home by probation officers." Timothy Brenon "was charged with possessing child pornography four years after his conviction on a charge of possessing a sexual performance by a child, for which he received five years probation."

Connecticut Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Possession. Under the headline "FBI Discovers 117 Images Of Minors On Two Computers," The Middletown (CT) Press (6/1, Engelhardt) reported, "Following a federal investigation, a local man plead guilty on Wednesday to possession of child pornography." Richard Wertheim "waived indictment in U.S. District in Hartford. According to Thomas Carson, spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor, Wertheim could face 10 years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000." According to documents, "Wertheim participated in 'peer-to-peer' file sharing with other Internet users. … Forensic evidence revealed a large amount of child pornography on both of Wertheim's personal computers. According to Carson, the analysis revealed 117 images and videos."

Copyright Piracy Losses Difficult To Calculate. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Fowler) reports, "The plastic in a blank CD or DVD costs less than a quarter. Putting a price on a disc loaded with content is more difficult. … When the music industry finds a CD that has been ripped off by copyright pirates, it says it is worth between $1 and $5. Hollywood says a pirate disc can be worth between nothing and the full retail price of around $25. The software industry sometimes weighs in at more than $200 per counterfeit disc." The Journal continues, "Why is there such a wide range in the estimates? Counting the losses from piracy isn't a science -- it's an art. Police in developing countries like China may count pirated goods at their street value, but companies and industry associations have different, often political, goals behind their counting systems. Now the growing problem of Internet piracy is making gauging losses even harder, and more controversial." The Journal adds, "Police data and surveys can provide estimates of the number of DVDs sold in street pirate markets, and the numbers of songs and programs downloaded off the Internet. But the music, movie and software industries -- which have been hammered by piracy in many developing countries -- face a more vexing problem of reckoning their losses. … Somebody who buys a pirated disc at a steep discount isn't necessarily a lost customer for a full-priced product. In many poor countries, a customer who buys a CD for $1 could never afford to pay

$16.95 for a legitimate copy. In countries such as China and Vietnam, many legitimate film titles aren't even allowed on store shelves because of government quotas and censorship standards. Moreover, music industry surveys have found that in some developed markets, 10% to 15% of consumers actually spend more money on legitimate music when they're also downloading songs illegally."

Former Federal Prosecutor Convertino Reportedly Under Probe In Drug Case. The Detroit News (6/2) reports, "Former federal prosecutor Richard Convertino is under criminal investigation for his handling of at least one other case in addition to the terrorism case for which he was indicted, one of Convertino's lawyers has alleged in a court filing." The News continues, "Lawyer Jeffrey Del Fuoco said in a motion recently filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit that Convertino is under investigation for possible criminal conduct in his handling of a 1998 drug case involving Joseph Stines." The News adds, "Stines, who was convicted of running a cocaine ring around Ypsilanti, has alleged misconduct by Convertino. Stines' lawyer, Carole Stanyar, has filed a motion seeking his release from prison. … 'It has been learned that Mr. Stines' baseless allegations are now the subject of an ongoing criminal investigation into Mr. Convertino's conduct,' Del Fuoco says in a motion filed May 26. … In the motion, Del Fuoco argues that Convertino should be allowed to intervene in the Stines case to protect his interests. If his request is granted, Convertino will be able to introduce evidence and cross-examine witnesses. .. Both parties involved, Stines and the U.S. government, allege misconduct by Convertino, Del Fuoco says in the motion."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Allows McCallum Questioning Over Tobacco Case. The AP (6/2) reports, "A judge ruled Thursday that Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum must undergo questioning in a lawsuit, a decision that is helpful to a private group seeking records about the Justice Department's conduct in a landmark case against the tobacco industry." The AP continues, "The action by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan is the latest problem related to McCallum's nomination as the Bush administration's choice to become ambassador to Australia. … Democratic Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois is blocking McCallum's nomination over allegations the No. 3 official at the Justice Department improperly influenced the government's lawsuit against cigarette manufacturers." The AP adds, "Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington sued last year after the department ignored the testimony of one of its own witnesses in the tobacco trial and reduced the amount the Bush administration is seeking from the tobacco industry from $130 billion to $10 billion. … CREW says the department has failed to produce a single responsive document to demands for information under the Freedom of Information Act."

The Financial Times (6/2, Washington) reports, "The judgment does not give Crew the latitude to interview Mr McCallum, the associate attorney-general nominated by President George W. Bush to be ambassador to Australia, on the underlying facts of the case. … But Crew says the deposition will shed light on whether the department sought to cover up its decision-making process by wilfully ignoring requests under the Freedom of Information Act." The Times adds, "The judge's ruling is the latest chapter in a long-running saga about whether a decision by the government last year to reduce the amount of penalties it was seeking from tobacco companies – from $130bn initially to $5.2bn – was politically motivated. … Reports in the Washington Post and other newspapers last June suggested that the government's decision to change its position on the five-year civil racketeering case against the tobacco industry was made over the objection of career lawyers at the Justice Department."

DOJ Requests Documents From Career Education. Crain's Chicago Business (6/2, Ryan) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has outlined the nature of its inquiry into Career Education Corp., almost two years after an investigation was first reported." Crain's continues, "On Tuesday the department asked the Hoffman Estates-based operator of for-profit schools to supply documentation of the way job placement rates and tuition costs were presented to current and prospective students at particular schools. The company was also asked to provide details about the way it compensates admissions officers, the way federal Pell Grants are used at one school, and the calculation of student refunds at another school, according to a Thursday filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. … 'We received a letter from the Civil Division of the U.S. Department of Justice advising us that it is reviewing allegations that certain of our schools may have submitted false claims to the U.S. Department of Education,' the Career Ed said in its SEC filing. A Justice Department probe was first reported in August 2004. Tuesday's SEC filing referred to the review as 'informational.'"

The Motley Fool (6/2, Duprey) reports, "Only last week, Career Education, the country's second-largest for-profit chain of colleges, announced that the Education Department had satisfactorily concluded its financial review of the company and might allow it to graduate to making acquisitions once again. … But (on Thursday), the company announced that the Justice Department was giving it detention again, investigating allegations that some of Career

Education's schools had submitted false claims or statements to the Education Department. The DOJ also wants information related to compensation for admissions personnel, the use of Pell Grant funds at one school, and student refund calculations at another." Motley Fool adds, "The company, and indeed much of the industry, has been dogged by allegations of misrepresenting graduation and job-placement rates, lowering admission standards, and paying recruiters to get warm bodies in their classrooms. Last year, Apollo was fined $9.8 million for admitting unqualified students to boost enrollment at its University of Phoenix online campus. … Yet while these types of charges have been raised many times over the years, most of the complaints have turned out to be unproven. ITT Educational Services was investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice and subsequently exonerated of wrongdoing. And Corinthian College was also given a passing grade by the SEC last year."

DOJ Appeals Ruling In Teen Firefighter Case. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/2) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has appealed a judge's decision that a 14-year-old Delaware County junior firefighter killed while answering an alarm was entitled to death benefits and a place on the National Fallen Firefighters Memorial." The Inquirer continues, "Christopher Kangas' mother hoped to see his name added to that memorial in October, but unless the Justice Department drops its appeal, 'the dream is deferred again,' lawyer Frank W. Daly said yesterday." The Inquirer adds, "Kangas was struck and killed by a car four years ago while racing on his bicycle to Brookhaven Fire Co. No. 52. Local and state officials awarded death benefits to Kangas' mother, Julie Amber-Messick, but the Justice Department said Kangas did not qualify as a public safety officer. … A U.S. Court of Federal Claims judge ruled in Amber-Messick's favor on March 27. Daly said the government had 60 days to appeal and did so at the last minute Tuesday."

Frist's 2000 Senate Campaign Fined $11,000 By FEC. The AP (6/2, Zuckerbrod) reports that the FEC "has determined that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's 2000 Senate campaign violated federal campaign finance laws. The federal agency fined Frist 2000, Inc., $11,000, according to a lawyer representing Frist's campaign and a watchdog group. Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington had filed a complaint last year against Frist's 2000 campaign committee and received the FEC's findings Thursday. The FEC found that Frist 2000, Inc., failed to disclose a $1.44 million loan taken out jointly by the campaign and Frist's 1994 campaign committee." The AP notes, "Federal law requires full disclosure of any loans taken out by campaign committees. Frist's 1994 campaign committee did disclose the loan to the FEC in January 2001, but the 2000 campaign did not, according to the FEC." Jason Torchinsky, "a lawyer representing Frist 2000, Inc., said the campaign settled the FEC complaint. 'What the FEC suggested, we believe would have resulted in double reporting of the loan,' Torchinsky said."

WSJournal Says Federal Prosecutors Should Examine West Virginia CSX Case. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "If the Milberg Weiss indictments are anything to go by, federal prosecutors are finally getting serious about tort lawyer corruption. So let's hope they've also noticed a federal lawsuit in West Virginia that describes some of the most sordid asbestos fraud to date." CSX last year "turned the legal tables on its nemesis -- Pittsburgh-based plaintiffs firm Peirce, Raimond & Coulter -- filing a lawsuit against it and an employee alleging fraud, misrepresentation and negligence." As the CSX case "shows, many of the corrupt practices rampant in silicosis suits got their start in asbestos. If the Justice Department really wants to clean up the trial bar, asbestos-lawsuit fraud is the mother lode."

LATimes Says Supreme Court Whistleblower Ruling Was Correct. The Los Angeles Times (6/2, 958K) says in an editorial that some civil libertarians are "denouncing a U.S. Supreme Court ruling Tuesday against a former Los Angeles prosecutor who says he was disciplined for speaking out against police misconduct. They may want to consider how they would feel if the same decision went against, say, a Bush administration official who was fired for saying that proponents of the president's immigration policy suppressed evidence that illegal immigrants increase crime and disease." The high court "was divided along ideological lines on the case. It held that the Los Angeles County district attorney's office did not violate the free-speech rights of Deputy Dist. Atty. Richard Ceballos by denying him a promotion because of his memo alleging that police officers lied to obtain a search warrant." Whatever "one thinks of Ceballos' actions, the court was right not to blur the distinction between citizen speech and employee speech."

DOJ Asked To Probe Ohio School District's Handling Of Disabled, Minority Students. The Ironton (OH) Tribune (6/2, Caldwell) reports, "Nearly 70 citizens — and one U.S. Congressman — are asking for some federal help to investigate the Rock Hill School District's handling of disabled and minority students, an issue that is already being addressed in three pending legal cases." The Tribune continues, "Though Rep. Ted Strickland has joined in on the request, the effort has been led by Richard Diamond, a vocal opponent to longtime Superintendent Lloyd Evans and parent of a child with disabilities in the school district." The Tribune adds, "Sixty-nine signatures were turned in on a petition asking the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Department of Education to step in, citing a host of allegations, most of which have not been substantiated or are part of three pending legal cases. … 'We know that over the years, parents have asked the Ohio Department of Education and the Justice Department for help but, until now, nothing has happened,' Diamond said in a written release distributed by Columbus attorney Mike Moore, who also represents the three families in the pending legal cases. … Three years ago, Brent and Amanda Unroe filed a lawsuit against the board, claiming Brent Unroe was unlawfully fired from his job as a special education teacher and that their adopted African-American special needs children were discriminated against. … School officials have always denied the allegations and have said in the past that Brent Unroe was terminated for insubordination and inappropriately handling students. … The Unroe case is scheduled for trial next week in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati."

Bush To Promote Gay Marriage Amendment. The AP (6/2, Pickler) reports, "President Bush will promote a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage on Monday, the eve of a scheduled Senate vote on the cause that is dear to his conservative backers." The AP adds, "Bush aides said he would be making his remarks on the subject Monday. … 'The president firmly believes that marriage is an enduring and sacred institution between men and women and has supported measures to protect the sanctity of marriage,' White House spokesman Ken Lisaius said."

US Threatens Suit Over Care At Wisconsin Prison. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (5/31, Zahn) reports, "Female prisoners with mental illness - some as young as 15 - are regularly placed in isolation cells at Taycheedah Correctional Institution, receive little treatment and are given psychotropic drugs for months without monitoring by a physician, a U.S. Justice Department report has concluded." The Sentinel continues, "In a May 2 letter to Gov. Jim Doyle, the assistant attorney general in charge of the Civil Rights Division, Wan J. Kim, called Taycheedah's treatment of inmates with mental illness 'unacceptable' and a violation of their constitutional rights. The letter states that Wisconsin can either voluntarily correct the problems or face possible legal action by the federal government this year." The Sentinel adds, "The Justice Department report was based on a yearlong federal investigation. It does not indicate what prompted the review, and federal officials declined to comment further. … John Dipko, Department of Corrections spokesman, said Tuesday the concerns raised in the report are being taken 'very seriously' and that the state will work with U.S. officials to address them."

New York Gay Couples Seek Right To Marry. The AP (6/2, Hill) reports, "Lawyers for same-sex couples seeking the right to marry in New York told the state's highest court Wednesday they are being treated as 'unequal citizens' and denied a constitutional right." The AP continues, "The 44 couples want the Court of Appeals to follow the lead of high court judges in neighboring Massachusetts and rule that New York's constitution gives same-sex couples the same right to wed that straight couples have always had. … 'We are evolving as a society,' said Terence Kindlon, one of the lawyers representing the couples in four lawsuits before the court, 'and just because we did something 200 years ago, or 100 years ago or 50 years ago, it's not necessarily a good justification to do it now.'" The AP adds, "The couples have lost in lower appeals courts and are at odds with Gov. George Pataki's health department and state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer's office, which claim New York law prohibits issuing licenses to same-sex couples."

WPost Examines Current State Of Black Men. The Washington Post (6/2, A1, Fletcher, 744K) reports in a front page story that it will run a series of stories in African American men, saying, "More than 50 years after the publication of Ralph Ellison's 'Invisible Man,' black men appear more visible than ever -- a freshman senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, is the American Idol of national politics, and Will Smith is perhaps the most bankable star in Hollywood. Yet black men who put their kids through college by mopping floors, who sit at home reading Tennyson at night, who wear dreadlocks but design spacecraft, say it sometimes seems as if the world doesn't believe they exist. The dueling realities of their history -- steady progress and devastating setbacks -- continue to burden many black men in ways that are sometimes difficult to explain."

WSJournal Criticizes Hawaii Reorganization Act. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M) says in an editorial that the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act is "secessionist, unconstitutional and un-American. And that was being kind. Our view of the bill -- which, like Freddy Krueger, refuses to die -- hasn't changed. But now that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has promised to bring it to a cloture vote in the coming days, it's worth reminding readers what this ugly drama from the beautiful state is all about." The Reorganization Act – "better known as the Akaka Bill, after its U.S. Senate sponsor, Democrat Daniel Akaka," could "also lead to discriminatory treatment of non-Native Hawaiians, who already are excluded from private schools run for the exclusive benefit of the Natives. Vast tracts of land (entire islands, perhaps) might also be set aside exclusively for Native use. The Office of Hawaiian Affairs, a state agency, acknowledges that the Akaka Bill allows for the 'complete legal and territorial independence from the United States and the re-establishment of a Hawaiian nation-state.' Years, if not decades, of litigation would follow its passage."

Michigan Minimum-Service Real Estate Legislation Moves Forward. Inman News (6/2, Roberts) reports, "A proposal to require real estate agents and brokers to provide a specific set of services for their clients is moving forward in the Michigan Legislature, despite opposition from the U.S. Department of Justice, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and a state regulatory agency." Inman continues, "House Bill 4849 and House Bill 4850, companion bills that passed a state Senate committee in a 4-0 vote Wednesday, provide that real estate licensees who enter into service agreements with clients must provide certain services for that client, including acceptance and delivery of offers and counteroffers; assistance in developing, communicating, negotiating and presenting offers, counter-offers and related documents or notices; and furnishing or causing to be furnished a complete and detailed closing statement." Inman adds, "In October 2005, after the Michigan state House of Representatives voted 105-3 to pass the bills, the Federal Trade Commission and Justice Department sent a letter to a state Senate committee chairman and the director of the Michigan Department of Labor and Economic Growth to express opposition, citing concerns about the possible anti-competitive and anti-consumer effects of the legislation. … The language in the bills is similar to other state legislation, sometimes referred to as minimum-service legislation, that has passed in other states despite similar federal objections. The Michigan Association of Realtors is supporting the bills, which could reach the state Senate floor as soon as next week. In other states, too, Realtor trade groups have endorsed the legislation as pro-consumer. … Opponents of minimum-services legislation have said that such efforts could serve to limit consumer choice for real estate services, while supporters have said the legislation ensures that real estate consumers will receive adequate service in real estate transactions."

eBay Launches E-Mail Campaign In Net Neutrality Battle. CNET News (6/2, McCullagh) reports, "eBay this week unleashed a political machine that should make politicians envious: a national e-mail blast over Net neutrality." CNET continues, "Meg Whitman, chief executive of the Internet auctioneer, called on more than a million eBay members to get involved in the debate over telecommunications laws and 'send a message to your representatives in Congress before it is too late.' … 'The telephone and cable companies in control of Internet access are trying to use their enormous political muscle to dramatically change the Internet,' Whitman wrote. 'It might be hard to believe, but lawmakers in Washington are seriously debating whether consumers should be free to use the Internet as they want in the future.'" CNET adds, "This is the first time that eBay has used e-mail to urge its members to weigh in on a national issue, and also the first time Whitman sent it out under her own name, the company said Thursday. … eBay--which has been active in a pro-Net neutrality coalition for years--confirmed that more than a million e-mails have been sent out so far, but declined to offer a more specific number. The campaign is ongoing."

Inco Will Not Sell More Assets To Win Antitrust Nod For Falconbridge Buy. Bloomberg (6/2, Alexander) reports, "Inco Ltd. said it doesn't expect to have to sell more than a Norwegian metals refinery to win U.S. and European regulatory approval for its C$19.5 billion ($17.7 billion) takeover of Canadian mining company Falconbridge Ltd." Bloomberg continues, "The deal, which would create the world's largest nickel producer, is being reviewed by regulators and Toronto-based Inco has offered to sell Falconbridge's Nikkelverk refinery in Kristiansand, Norway, and 'related marketing organizations' as a remedy to get approvals. … 'My view is that the remedy we propose should be adequate,' Inco Chief Executive Officer Scott Hand said today in an interview. 'I'm confident we'll get the clearance that we need.' … The European Commission, the EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, held a closed-door hearing May 29 to discuss Inco's proposals and antitrust concerns. The EC on Feb. 24 opened a four-month probe of the deal. A ruling is due by July 12. … The transaction, which has already been cleared by Canadian authorities, is also under review by the U.S. Department of Justice."

Rambus Releases E-Mails From Micron, Hynix In Chip Antitrust Case. The Wall Street Journal (6/1, A8, Clark) reports, "Newly released emails from Micron Technology Inc. and Hynix Semiconductor Inc. provide some of the first details of a global conspiracy to raise prices on memory chips and could support allegations by Rambus Inc. in a closely watched antitrust case." The Journal continues, "The messages were gathered by Hynix and Micron and provided to Rambus, which disclosed them to The Wall Street Journal. The Silicon Valley technology company has filed private antitrust claims in San Francisco County Superior Court against Micron, Hynix and Samsung Electronics Co., makers of memory chips that have been implicated along with Infineon Technologies AG in a long-running Justice Department price-fixing investigation. … The emails, mainly among sales personnel at Micron and Hynix, refer to other messages, phone calls, lunches and meetings among direct competitors in the memory-chip business. In some cases, the messages suggest competitors traded information in an effort to keep chip prices up." The Journal notes, "The conspiracy allegations have been a black eye to makers of memory chips, long considered one of the most competitive segments of high technology. The products at issue -- known as DRAMs, for dynamic random-access memory chips -- have become essential for many kinds of products, including computers and consumer-electronics devices. … The Justice Department investigation, launched in 2002, has so far resulted in more than $731 million in fines and guilty pleas negotiated with four companies -- Samsung, Hynix, Infineon and Elpida Memory Inc. -- and jail terms and fines for 12 individuals. … The Justice Department says the conspiracy hurt computer makers that included Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc. and Gateway Inc. In plea agreements, the defendants admitted discussing memory-chip prices to be charged to particular customers, agreeing on price levels and exchanging information to monitor adherence to those agreements. … But the Justice Department documents provide few details about how the conspiracy operated, and little about the involvement of Micron, the only U.S.-based company implicated in the probe."

The Financial Times (6/2, Nuttall) reports, "Shares in Rambus, a US memory chip designer, rose nearly 20 per cent on Thursday after it released emails in support of its antitrust litigation against chip manufacturers Samsung and Hynix of Korea and Micron of the US. … But Micron responded that the emails collected during a Department of Justice price-fixing investigation were unrelated to the San Francisco lawsuit where Rambus accuses the three of trying to exclude it from the memory market. The emails made available by Rambus were the result of its successful court action to get evidence unsealed to help its case." The Times continues, "One email sent in June 2001 by Linda Turner, an international sales vice president for Micron at the time, comments on Hynix lowering its prices for DDR (Double Data Rate) memory. … 'No problem!' she writes. 'We want DDR to explode in the marketplace so have actually been requesting Infineon, Samsung and Hynix to lower their DDR pricing to help it become a standard and drive Rambus away completely.' … Other Micron emails suggest the company's salesforce is concerned at pricing of DDR, with major PC manufacturers Dell and Compaq seeming to prefer RDRAM (Rambus Dynamic Random Access Memory) chips designed by Rambus." The Times notes, "Daniel Francisco, spokesman for Micron, said yesterday: 'Rambus has attempted to bootstrap the DoJ price-fixing investigation into a supposed boycott of Rambus Dram.' … 'Rambus Dram was a failure in the marketplace because it was too costly and any performance differentials were not sufficient to justify the inherent cost differences.'"

NYTimes Praises NYSE Deal To Buy Euronext. The New York Times (6/2, 1.19M) supports the NYSE Group's plans to expand by reaching "a deal for the cross-border European exchange company Euronext. If approved by regulators and shareholders, it would be the first trans-Atlantic market, though the rival Nasdaq has already bought up a 25 percent stake in the London Stock Exchange. Rather than leading the way, the exchanges are catching up to the reality of internationalized investing." If "a combined company can pass the fruits of those savings on to the average investor — not to mention added ease in buying shares of foreign companies — we're all for it."

US, Alaska Seek $92 Million More For Exxon Valdez Cleanup. The New York Times (6/2, Barringer) reports, "When the Justice Department and the State of Alaska reached their $900 million court settlement with the Exxon Corporation over the environmental damages caused by the Exxon Valdez oil spill, they agreed that, if unforeseeable damages occurred later, the two governments had 15 years to ask for $100 million more. … On Thursday, with the deadline approaching, the governments exercised this clause. They announced in a statement that they would seek $92 million from Exxon Mobil to clean up stubborn patches of oil, whose most toxic components, they say, have not dissipated since the spill in 1989." The Times continues, "Federal and state lawyers said in statements that they believed the lingering oil was still interfering with the recovery of animals in the area. The worries, environmentalists say, are focused on species that frequent the intertidal areas of Prince William Sound, like clams, mussels and harlequin ducks. … With this action, 'we are aggressively seeking to restore natural resource damages unforeseen at the time of the 1991 settlement,' said Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant attorney general for the Environment and Natural Resources Division of the Justice Department, in a statement. 'Our goal throughout this process has been to pursue all scientifically and legally appropriate means of restoration.'"

The Washington Post (6/2, A4, Mufson, Eilperin) reports, "Exxon has already paid $900 million for damage caused by the spill, the worst in the nation's history, but the 1991 agreement settling claims allowed the state and federal governments to ask for as much as $100 million more for damage that could not be foreseen at that time. The deadline for reopening the agreement is today. … 'After extensive review it is clear that populations and habitat within the oil spill area have suffered substantial and unanticipated injuries that are attributable to the Exxon Valdez oil spill,' said Alaska Attorney General David W. Márquez. In a background briefing yesterday, officials from the Agriculture, Interior and Commerce departments said the additional money was needed because substantial amounts of oil remained in the sound's tidal basin, affecting clams, mussels, sea otters, sea ducks -- especially harlequin ducks -- and other birds." The Post adds, "Exxon disputed the governments' move. 'Exxon will study this request carefully and respond as appropriate,' the company said in an e-mailed statement. 'Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified.'"

CNN.com (6/2) reports, "The Valdez ran aground in 1989 and leaked 11 million gallons of crude oil, polluting more than 1,000 miles of Alaska's shore and killing tens of thousands of birds and marine animals. … The company said it agrees that 'small pockets of sequestered and degraded oil residues' remain in spots on less than two-tenths of 1 percent of the affected shoreline. But it said 'there is no scientific evidence that this oil ... could cause damage to any population or species. Speculation and hypothesis do not amount to proof.'" CNN notes, "ExxonMobil also said the existence of small pockets of residue was expected at the time of the 1991 agreement and noted that about $145 million of the $900 million paid by Exxon to the oil spill trustees is still available. … 'If there were any matter in Prince William Sound that needed restoration or repair, it was the trustees' duty to use this money to remedy the problem, and we are confident that they would have done so,' the statement said."

The Financial Times (6/2, Mcnulty) reports, "Yet the federal and state governments said there was 'substantial loss of habitat' from the oil. … They said predators that feed in the inter-tidal - primarily harlequin ducks and sea otters - showed reduced survival rates in oiled areas and seemed to avoid locations with extensive lingering oil. … In addition, they said, subsistence users avoid harvesting in oiled areas because of concerns over contamination."

The AP (6/2, Lee) reports, "The state has until Sept. 1 to make financial demands of Exxon Mobil under the reopener provision. State and federal officials were required to provide the company with detailed plans and costs for any rehabilitation project at least 90 days before that date. … Alaska Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski sought to cut the process short by asking Exxon Mobil to voluntarily commit $100 million more to restoring the sound. The company, whose $36.1 billion in earnings last year were the highest ever by any U.S. corporation, rejected that proposal."

Bloomberg (6/2, Schmidt) reports, "The company is appealing to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals a $4.5 billion punitive damage award to fisheries, native Alaskans, cannery workers and landowners over the Valdez spill."

Gold Prospector Hopes To Hit Jackpot In Toxic-Waste Dump. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Carlton) reports, "Dave Pruett has prospected for gold for 46 years in mines from Arizona to the Amazon. He thinks he has finally found his big fortune in a pile of toxic waste in (Buckskin, NV). … Mr. Pruett's hope lies in nearly 200,000 tons of rubble sitting in man-made containment ponds outside a defunct mine. The rubble is laced with cyanide that Nevada regulators say threatens water supplies. But Mr. Pruett believes the pile, which is the waste, or tailings, left over from a previous mine, contains as much as 30,000 ounces of gold. Woven in with crushed rock and other material in a sort of rubble stew, that gold was considered not worth extracting. … But with gold prices having soared, the precious metal in the pile is suddenly worth around $20 million, Mr. Pruett figures. He has begun hauling truckloads of the waste to a larger mine that has facilities to extract the gold. 'Maybe, just maybe, this will be the big one,' Mr. Pruett says." The Journal adds, "The run-up in gold prices over the past few years -- the futures price stood at $627.60 a troy ounce yesterday -- has ignited a mining frenzy in Nevada, the biggest gold-producing state. It has led some mining companies to reopen mines with low-grade reserves that previously weren't profitable to extract. A 26-year high for the U.S. gold price was reached last month, well over $700. … In Nevada, most of the remaining gold lies deep underground, and the state's $3.7 billion-a-year gold-mining industry is dominated by big corporations with the technology and machinery to dig it out. But here and there are a few small-stake prospectors -- independent fortune seekers like Mr. Pruett who are a throwback to the gold rushes of yore. 'He's a dying breed,' says Royce Hackworth, owner of a drilling company in Elko, Nev. … The 68-year-old Mr. Pruett is racing against the chance gold prices may crash again. He rarely takes a day off as he shuttles between his pile, about 80 miles southeast of Reno, and a larger mine 350 miles away that extracts the gold. On a recent day, Wayne Monyihan and Wayne Monyihan Jr. -- a father-and-son team who call themselves the Sagebrush Express -- were each set to haul 20 tons of his ground-up waste rock on their 18-wheel tractor-trailers."

Greenpeace Memo About Bush Policies, Armageddon Was "A Joke." The Washington Post (6/2, A17, 744K) reports the environmental activist group Greenpeace "wanted to be prepared to counter President Bush's visit last week to Pennsylvania to promote his nuclear energy policy. 'This volatile and dangerous source of energy' is no answer to the country's energy needs, shouted a Greenpeace fact sheet, decrying the 'threat' posed by the reactors Bush visited in Limerick." But "after that assertion, the Greenpeace authors were apparently stumped while searching for the ideal menacing metaphor. 'In the twenty years since the Chernobyl tragedy, the world's worst nuclear accident, there have been nearly [FILL IN ALARMIST AND ARMAGEDDONIST FACTOID HERE],' the sheet said." Greenpeace spokesman Steve Smith "told the Web site that a colleague was making a joke in a draft that was then mistakenly released."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Bush Administration Seeks To Reduce Meth Use. The AP (6/2) reports the Bush administration "wants to cut methamphetamine use in the United States by 15 percent by 2009, relying on cooperation with Mexico and steps at home that include expanded random drug testing in schools. … Fewer than 600,000 Americans use meth, just two-tenths of 1 percent of the nation's population, according to administration estimates. But more than the half the nation's counties count meth as their top problem, said John Walters." There are more than 50 media references to this story. The AP story was published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of CBS News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, Arizona Republic, Kansas City Star, and Fort Worth Star Telegram.

Scripps Howard News Service (6/1) writes, "The U.S. government announced a new synthetic drug control strategy Thursday that calls for a 15 percent reduction in methamphetamine and prescription drug abuse in three years. 'Although teen drug use in the United States has dropped by nearly 20 percent over the last three years,' said John Walters…'we will not let up on the pressure being applied to the methamphetamine market. The aggressive measures called for in the synthetics strategy build upon significant progress already made as a result of law enforcement efforts.'"

From its Washington, D.C. bureau, the Des Moines (IA) Register (6/1) reports the national meth strategy "included recommendations to increase random testing of school students and use of special courts to handle drug addicts. The administration said that much of the production of U.S.-consumed meth has shifted to larger labs in Mexico and other countries. U.S. and Mexican officials said they are working to cut the flow of precursor chemicals to Mexico and to shut down labs in that country."

On its Web site, ABC News (6/1) reports the strategy is a global approach to curb the production and use of meth. ABC adds that John Walters said, "This represents a commitment of the administration to work toward a meaningful and a sustained reduction in meth use as well as the number of meth labs that have been poisoning too many communities." ABC notes the goal "is to cut methamphetamine abuse 15 percent by 2008 and reduce the production from illegal meth labs in the United States by 25 percent."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (6/1, 1:00 p.m.) reported, "The White House drug policy director is unveiling the administration's master plan for combating the methamphetamine epidemic. John Walters, along with law enforcement and homeland security officials, is announcing a 'synthetic drug control strategy' at this hour. A top diplomat from Mexico is also taking part in the announcement."

CNN (6/1) also reported, "A synthetic drug control strategy is being announced. The strategy aimed at reducing both the supply of and demand for methamphetamine in the US.

Local TV Coverage. KTVU-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (6/1, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "A new crackdown on the production and sale of methamphetamine. Officials at the Department Of Justice said while the [production] of meth is down, the international trade is up. They say the federal government is working to stop global trade of the chemicals used to make meth."

KING-TV, Seattle-Tacoma (6/1, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Methamphetamine is a grave problem in our state, and today in Washington, DC, the Bush administration unveiled a plan to help reduce meth abuse. The goal is to cut meth production by 15% over the next three years."

Individuals, Groups Added To List Of Foreign Drug Kingpins. The AP (6/2) reports, "President Bush added three accused drug traffickers and two reputed crime organizations to the US list of foreign drug kingpins on Thursday, denying them access to the American financial system and barring them from trade with US companies and individuals." The three individuals added to the list were "Dawood Ibrahim of India, Fahd Jamil Georges of Brazil and Ali Naway of Iran. The organizations are the Dawood Ibrahim Organization in India, Pakistan and United Arab Emirates and the Amezcua Contreras Organization in Mexico."

Connecticut Man Sentenced To 15 Years In Drug Conspiracy. The Hartford Courant (6/2, Tasker) reports, "A 32-year-old Hartford (CT) man was sentenced Tuesday to more than 15 years in federal prison for conspiracy to possess crack cocaine with intent to distribute." The Courant continues, "Kaniel 'Beevis' Forrester pleaded guilty on Aug. 23, 2005, to charges that he conspired to possess and distribute between 150 and 500 grams of crack, according to a statement released by the U.S. Justice Department. … Forrester, who his lawyer said has been on the streets since he was about 15, was on probation for a previous narcotics charge at the time of his arrest, federal law enforcement officials said. … Forrester was sentenced to 182 months in prison, and Hussey said he expects Forrester to serve about 10 years of the sentence. He also will have to complete a 500-hour drug program, Hussey said. … Forrester, a father of two, could be deported back to Jamaica after he finishes his sentence and five years of supervised release." The Courant notes, "Operation Big Boy, an investigation run by the FBI and the Hartford police, led to Forrester and his brother, Negus Forrester, after months of surveillance, wiretapping, crack seizures and purchases. … U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said in a sentencing memorandum that the calls were considered evidence by the FBI that Negus Forrester bought crack from an accomplice, and that Kaniel Forrester was involved in the transaction."

California Marijuana Dispensary's Safe Deposit Box Is Searched. The Desert Sun (6/1) reports federal agents "searched a safe deposit box belonging to a Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary earlier this week, prompting accusations of harassment from the dispensary's owner. 'I don't have anything to hide,' said Stacy Hochanadel, owner and operator of CannaHelp in Palm Desert, on Thursday. A spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Los Angeles office declined to comment, citing an ongoing investigation."

Brothers Sentenced In Georgia Crack Cocaine Case. The Athens (GA) Banner-Herald (6/2) reports, "Two Athens brothers will serve long sentences in federal prison after they pleaded guilty to being part of a local cocaine distribution ring. A U.S. District Court judge in Macon…sentenced Antron Ricardo Bishop, 24, and Antonio Ramon Bishop, 22, after they pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. … Since the Bishops and several other conspirators have been arrested, violent crime in the county has decreased, according to Athens-Clarke police Lt. Mike Hunsinger. … A countywide sweep of street-level crack cocaine dealers last July netted more than 80 arrests, and local police have been working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to collar mid-level suppliers." The Banner-Herald says Antron Bishop received a 14-year prison sentence, and his brother was sentenced to just under six years.

Confessed Colorado Drug Runner Sentenced, Agrees To Testify Against Alleged Conspirators. The Brighton (CO) Standard-Blade (6/1) reports, "A confessed drug runner who agreed to testify against his alleged fellow drug conspirators was sentenced May 18 to 7 1/2 years in federal prison. The sentence was slightly higher for 26-year-old Kenneth F. Fuqua of Brighton than prosecutors sought in exchange for Fuqua's continued cooperation with investigators. … Fuqua told investigators with the Drug Enforcement Administration and Boulder County Drug Task Force that he ran drugs between Santiago Mena-Flores, 26, of Henderson, and runners of the drug trafficking ring allegedly run by Donald Jason Skinner, 31, of Longmont. … Children allegedly were used to move the drugs locally."

Man Killed In Texas Blast Faced Federal Firearm, Drug Charges. The Longview (TX) News-Journal (5/31, Ramirez) reports, "A Longview (TX) man died Monday night while making a bomb he intended to use in retaliation against federal agents, local fire officials said." The News-Journal continues, "James Charles Torrence, 38, who faced possible jail time for multiple federal indictments from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Drug Enforcement Administration, died in his North Longview home while putting together one of two homemade bombs. … Torrence made the bombs to retaliate against authorities with both federal law enforcement agencies, whom Torrence believed had built a case against him, according to Brian Howell, Longview Fire Department assistant fire marshal. Documents inside the home listed names of several bureau and administration agents, Howell said." The News-Journal notes, "U.S. Attorney Matt Orwig told The Associated Press that Torrence had agreed to plead guilty to being a felon in possession of a firearm and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine. He said Torrence was set to enter the plea June 7, and the drug charge carried a minimum sentence of 10 years in prison up to life."

The Tyler (TX) Morning Telegraph (5/31, Middleton) reports, "Howell said it is believed Torrence was making pipe bombs to retaliate against individuals he believed 'snitched' on him in connection with a federal case against him. Howell said the individuals Torrence allegedly planned to use the bombs against actually were not related to the case. He told the Tyler Morning Telegraph he does not believe Torrence was targeting law enforcement agents. … Tom Crowley, a public information officer for the Dallas division of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), said via phone that authorities discovered bomb-making literature, firearms and additional bomb-making material inside Torrence's residence."

ATF Probes Suspicious New York Church Fire. The Glens Falls (NY) Post-Star (6/2, Lehman) reports, "Christ Church Episcopal on Route 9 was destroyed by a suspicious fire late Tuesday, a blaze that came two weeks after two burglaries at the church in which religious phrases were scrawled inside the building, officials said. … 'We believe, at this point, the fire was deliberately set,' Warren County Sheriff Larry Cleveland said." The Post-Star continues, "Investigators from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the state Office of Fire Prevention and Control, the Warren County Office of Fire Prevention and the Warren County Sheriff's Department were on the scene, sifting through the charred remnants throughout much of the day Wednesday." The Post-Star adds, "ATF was brought in because federal law requires the agency be notified when a church fire occurs where the cause is not clearly identifiable, said Warren County Fire Coordinator Marvin Lemery. That statute was put in place after a spate of arson fires at southern churches in the late 1990s. … 'Anything where there is something that looks like it could be the least bit suspicious (at a church), you need to notify ATF,' he said. 'That (burglary history) was enough to say we should get these guys in to look whether this was done to cover a burglary or there was something else going on.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Urges Congress To Pass Immigration Reform Bill. The AP (6/2, Loven) reports that in an address to the US Chamber of Commerce, President Bush "pressed a passionately divided Congress on Thursday to reach election-year compromise on immigration legislation that provides a chance at citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants already in the country." Bush "will travel to several cities next week -- Artesia, N.M., Laredo, Texas, and Omaha, Neb. -- to pitch his immigration approach, the White House announced Thursday." The AP adds, "There is skepticism that a compromise can be reached in a year when most of Congress is up for re-election, and many believe Republicans could be at risk of losing their control over one or both chambers."

Much of the reporting on Bush's remarks, which wasn't covered by the network newscasts, analyzes the House-Senate split on immigration, and Bush's attempt to promote the Senate bill without alienating the "GOP base," which is being identified with the House-passed legislation. Analysts, however, don't agree on whether Bush's emphasis yesterday was on challenging House Republicans or on touting his proposals as tough enough on the enforcement side.

The Washington Post (6/2, A4, Baker, 744K), for example, emphasizes the President's statement yesterday that "unscrupulous" employers "have contributed to the illegal immigration crisis in the United States by knowingly hiring undocumented workers, and called for steep new penalties on those exploiting the shadow economy." The President was trying "to emphasize his focus on enforcement and to combat the conservative complaint that his immigration proposals add up to amnesty for millions of foreigners violating US immigration law." Said Bush, "Businesses that knowingly employ illegal workers undermine this law and undermine the spirit of America. … And we're not going to tolerate it in this country."

Also, under the headline "Bush Tries To Regain His Footing On Once-Rock-Solid Conservative Base," USA Today (6/2, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports that "whether...Bush is talking about a get-tough border policy or the importance of judicial restraint -- he discussed both Thursday -- he is sure to throw in an appeal these days to wavering conservative supporters." Bush and his aides "are playing up items such as tighter borders and judges who 'administer the law' rather than make it, seeking to reconnect with conservative Republicans whose support has shrunk in recent polls -- and whose votes will be critical in this fall's congressional elections."

On the other hand, The New York Times (6/2, Stolberg, 1.19M) headlines its story "Bush Chides Party Members On Immigration," and says the President "rebuked conservative opponents of his plan on Thursday and warned that there is 'no excuse' for delay." Said Bush, "It's a difficult task. Yet the difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it." The Post also reports, "Whether Mr. Bush can bring his party's warring factions together remains to be seen." In his speech, Bush "took aim at House members who brand the Senate bill amnesty, though he did not mention any by name. 'Some members of Congress argue that no one who came to this illegally should be allowed to continue living and working in our country,' he said. The lawmakers are 'are acting on deeply felt principles,' he said, but added, 'I also believe that the approach they suggest is wrong and unrealistic.'"

And the Washington Times (6/2, Dinan, 90K) titles its report "Bush Shuns Republicans' Stand To Return Illegals," and says Bush yesterday "rejected House Republicans' stance that illegal aliens must return home, calling it 'wrong and unrealistic' and saying many will have to be allowed to stay." Bush "drew praise yesterday from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, a key Democrat on the issue." But Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, "demanded the president do more to distance himself from the House bill."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Quijano) noted the US Chamber of Commerce "stands firmly behind…Bush's proposal for a temporary guest worker program." CNN added that "what was interesting to note is that today we heard the President, despite being in the friendly environment, have some tough talk, really trying to show that he is serious about enforcing US immigration laws."

On its website, the Wall Street Journal (6/1, Pulizzi, 2.11M) noted Bush also "touted the economy, called for 'fiscal sanity,' and repeated his threat to veto a pending emergency spending bill if it exceeds his spending limit."

Tax Provision Of Senate Bill Called Unconstitutional, Could Derail Bill. The Washington Times (6/2, Hurt, 90K) reports, "The long-fought Senate immigration bill that opponents say grants amnesty to 10 million illegal aliens is unconstitutional and appears headed for certain demise, Senate Republicans now say. A key feature of the Senate bill is that it would make illegals pay back taxes before applying for citizenship, a requirement that supporters say will raise billions of dollars in the next decade." The Times adds, "There's just one problem: The U.S. Constitution specifically prohibits revenue-raising legislation from originating in the Senate." The Times adds, "Republicans -- including the bill's supporters -- say this will kill the bill, and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says he's offered a simple solution." He "wants to attach the immigration bill to a tax bill that has already passed the House. It would then proceed as planned to a 'conference committee,' where negotiators from the House and Senate hammer out differences between the two chambers' immigration bills." But Minority Leader Harry Reid "won't go along with that fix. His office said yesterday that the concerns raised by Mr. Frist and House Republicans are 'technical in nature' and can be ignored."

The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Gaouette, Gerstenzang, 958K) also reports the story, and says the problem "is stalling efforts to appoint a House-Senate conference committee that would try to reach a compromise on the final form of immigration legislation. Those negotiations were expected to difficult at best." But "unless the procedural stumbling block is resolved, the talks won't even start."

CBO Report Finds Senate Bill Would Add 20 Million Legal Immigrants Over 10 Years. The Washington Post (6/2, A4, Fears, 744K) reports, "The nation's population of legal immigrants would increase by nearly 20 million over the next decade if the recently passed Senate immigration bill becomes law, and taxpayers would spend more than $50 billion to operate a new guest-worker program and pay for extra welfare, Social Security and public health-care costs, according to a Congressional Budget Office report." But "the cost of absorbing the newcomers would be offset by a boost of $66 billion in federal revenue from income taxes and payroll taxes generated by the temporary guest-worker program, along with fees that immigrants must pay to participate, the report said."

Immigration Services May Be Unable To Implement Senate Bill. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports the executive branch "might be unable to implement Senate immigration bill even if Congress enacts it. Bill would require immigration service to handle 12 million illegals according to length of U.S. residence, processing some within 90 days. Current capacity 'is not there,' says agency director Emilio Gonzalez, noting the government's 4,000 'adjudicators' already have 'day jobs' processing seven million legal immigrants yearly."

Schwarzenegger To Send Guard Troops To Mexican Border. The AP (6/2, Davis) reports, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger agreed Thursday to send the California National Guard to the Mexican border, ending a 17-day standoff with the Bush administration." The two sides "had been at odds over whether California Guardsmen would join the effort to bolster the Border Patrol and who would pay for it." They "reached an agreement under which California will contribute about 1,000 Guardsmen for border duty and the federal government will pick up the full cost, Schwarzenegger said." The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Nicholas, 958K) also reports the story.

Immigration Is Key Issue In Fight For Cunningham's Seat. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Lueck, 2.11M) reports, "To Brian Bilbray, the 'greatest ethics scandal in America' isn't about Washington lobbyists or the bribery conviction of Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, formerly this area's unbeatable congressman." Bilbray, a former Republican House member seeking Cunningham's vacant seat, "is fighting what he calls the scandal of illegal immigration." He "hopes that tough talk on the campaign trail about securing borders and cracking down on employers who hire illegal workers will bring enough supporters to the polls on June 6 to help him defeat a challenge from Democrat Francine Busby." Busby "takes a softer line on the issue, supporting proposals to allow illegal immigrants to become citizens and create new guest-worker programs." The race, if Busby wins, "shift could portend a wave of Democratic wins this fall." It is also "shaping up as an early test for how immigration and scandal could play out this year in the polls, and which issue may get greater traction with voters." SurveyUSA, a nonpartisan market-research firm, "reported a dead heat -- 45% for Mr. Bilbray and 45% for Ms. Busby -- in May."

118 Illegal Aliens Arrested In Arizona. The Washington Times (6/2, Seper, 90K) reports, "The US Border Patrol arrested 118 illegal aliens at a 'safe house' in Rio Rico, Ariz., just north of the U.S.-Mexico border, in a raid this week by a unit of undercover agents that has targeted alien smugglers and those who help them." The team, known as the "Disrupt unit, raided the house near Interstate 19 after receiving a tip about 'suspicious activity.'"

Colorado Billboards Criticize "Illegal Sanctuary" For Undocumented Aliens. The Washington Times (6/2, Richardson, 90K) reports from Denver, "Two prominent billboards criticizing sanctuary policies for illegal aliens were uncovered here yesterday in the latest salvo in Colorado's simmering immigration debate." The first billboard "shows three military helmets atop rifles and has the message, 'Mr. President, Mr. Governor, Mr. Mayor; they did not die for ILLEGAL SANCTUARY.'" The second "purports to welcome illegal aliens to Denver, which has policies forbidding authorities from asking about immigration status. 'Welcome to SANCTUARY CITY ... Relax, you made it! Brought to you by Executive Order 116,' the black-and-white billboard says."

Washington State Imam Agrees To Accept Deportation Order. The AP (6/2) reports, "A Seattle-area mosque leader who was investigated for possible ties to terrorist groups agreed Thursday to accept an order of removal from the United States, federal officials said." In a hearing yesterday, Immigration Judge Victoria Young ruled Abrahim Sheikh Mohamed "had no legal basis to remain in the United States." ICE lawyers "presented evidence that Mohamed has Kenyan citizenship. Young ordered him deported to Kenya or, if that cannot be done, to Somalia, the agency said." The AP notes, "Among other things, federal agents believed he came to the country to help raise money for the Ogaden National Liberation Front, which wants an independent state for ethnic Somalis in Ethiopia, FBI Special Agent David Rubincam said during a February hearing in the case."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (6/2, Johnson) notes that the terrorism allegations had "angered his many supporters in the local East African community," and the "nearly six months of confinement -- much of it in isolation -- weighed heavily on his decision to accept deportation, according to his lawyer, Hilary Han." She "said Mohamed's decision to agree to be deported had nothing to do with the terrorism allegations. An FBI spokeswoman said she could not discuss whether there was an ongoing criminal investigation of Mohamed. Aziz Junejo, who hosts a local cable TV show on Islam, said it was 'a very sad day' for the Muslim community."

Embattled Philadelphia Immigration Judge Replaced. The AP (6/2) reports, "Another judge has been assigned to fill in for an immigration judge recently criticized by an appeals court for his handling of asylum cases, the court administrator said." The AP continues, "The Executive Office for Immigration Review, which manages the nation's immigration courts, has assigned a judge from Arlington, Va., to fill in for Judge Donald V. Verlise following an unexplained two-week absence. … Elliott Edwards, the administrator for the immigration court of the Philadelphia region, said Ferlise's absence was not due to illness, and the arrangement would continue for an indefinite period." The AP adds, "The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in April that Ferlise, 62, a former prosecutor, prejudged cases and bullied asylum-seekers, denying them their right to fair hearings. The Philadelphia City Council last month called for his removal. … Washington attorney Ralph Conte, who said he was defending Ferlise but declined to say why he had been retained, referred questions to the Justice Department, which declined comment on what a spokesman called a 'personnel action.' … A 2000 study published by the San Jose Mercury News ranked Ferlise as among the 10 toughest asylum judges in the country, saying he had granted 74 of 715 asylum requests between 1995 and 1999."

TAX:

IRS Ruling Could End Charitable "Conduit" For Mortgage Industry. The Washington Post (6/2, A1, Salmon, Downey, 744K) reports a ruling by the Internal Revenue Service "threatens to extinguish a fast-growing -- but controversial -- charitable industry that has funneled hundreds of millions of dollars in cash to first-time home buyers for their down payments." The "unexpected IRS edict throws into question a practice that has helped boost national home ownership rates to a near-record 69 percent in the past six years." Almost "200 charities, such as AmeriDream, based in Gaithersburg, and Nehemiah Corp. in California, have acted as cash conduits between home sellers and buyers." Sellers "provide cash to the charities, which then give it to home buyers for their down payments. The sellers, who pay the charities a service fee, often recoup their money by charging a higher price for the homes -- usually 2 or 3 percent more, or an amount equal to the down payment, says a Government Accountability Office study."

Former Norristown, PA, Councilman Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/2, Shields) reports, "A former Norristown councilman whose criminal activity inspired a four-year corruption investigation pleaded guilty yesterday to tax evasion charges." The Inquirer continues, "Ernest W. Scott Jr., 56, admitted in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia that he hid more than $142,000 in income from his auto tags business between 1999 and 2001. He is scheduled for sentencing Sept. 8; federal guidelines call for a sentence of 12 to 18 months in prison. … He is the third Norristown official to be convicted or plead guilty in the last six weeks in a series of indictments resulting from the U.S. Attorney's investigation. Ex-Mayor Ted LeBlanc was convicted on bribery and tax evasion charges April 18, and former municipal administrator Anthony Biondi pleaded guilty to corruption charges May 12. Scott is currently serving a 6 1/2- to 20-year state sentence. In 2003, Scott, then a member of the Norristown municipal council, admitted to running a corrupt organization that included issuing fake insurance cards and dealing marijuana." The Inquirer adds, "The Montgomery County District Attorney's wiretap evidence from Scott's case was handed over to federal investigators in late 2002. The U.S. Attorney's Office used it to launch a wide-ranging probe that produced indictments against Scott and the man who prepared his taxes, as well as LeBlanc, Biondi, and four businessmen who were awarded contracts with Norristown."

Nevada Strip Club Owner Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion. The AP (6/2, Ritter) reports Las Vegas strip club owner Rick Rizzolo "pleaded guilty Thursday to a felony tax evasion charge but avoided any mention of organized crime as the government ended a decade-long federal probe of whether the club was linked to the mob." Rizzolo "pledged to sell the club," Crazy Horse Too, "and agreed not to contest some $17 million in fines, forfeitures and restitution. The financial settlement includes a $10 million payment to Kirk Henry, a tourist from Olathe, Kan., whose separate civil lawsuit alleges he was paralyzed when he was beaten by club employees in 2001." US Attorney Daniel Bogden "called Thursday's deals an efficient way to achieve what he called a primary goal of the investigation -- to strip Rizzolo of club ownership and bring closure to Henry and his family 'for the brutal and tragic extortionate attack at the club.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

White House Credited With Attracting "A-List Names" As It Retools Under Bolten. Under the headline "Bush's New Team Scores A-list Names," the Christian Science Monitor (6/2, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "These are hardly the waning days of the Bush White House, but in some ways, time is running short for major new policy initiatives. And in the inevitable changing of the guard, as top appointees move on, it might seem a tough sell to lure A-listers onto the team. The pay isn't much to write home about, especially for those used to a healthy private-sector paycheck, and the administration remains deeply unpopular with much of the public." But "something has happened on the way to the makeover of Team Bush: The president has managed to bring in some first-string players, at a time when two-term White Houses are typically moving to the bench, analysts say." The Monitor adds, "Exhibits A and B are Goldman Sachs chairman Henry Paulson, tapped to take over Treasury, and FOX TV commentator Tony Snow, the new press secretary." Joshua Bolten, the new chief of staff, is also "getting high marks for his energetic retooling work -- including helping snag his former colleague, Mr. Paulson -- and setting his sights on upgrading the White House's communications and domestic policy shops."

Paulson's Environmentalist Beliefs Noted. The A2 (6/2, Heilprin) reports, "Paulson may find the tightrope he'll be walking as…Bush's Treasury secretary will span a wider gulf than in his current twin jobs as chairman of Goldman Sachs and The Nature Conservancy." Both Paulson "and the world's richest environmental group look at global warming as a dire threat requiring government-mandated reductions in carbon dioxide and other gases that trap heat in the atmosphere like a greenhouse. Bush doesn't." Steve McCormick, president of The Nature Conservancy, "said Paulson won't shy from sharing his views on global warming in Bush's Cabinet."

Paulson's Experience With China Could Prove "Crucial." The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Solomon, Browne, 2.11M) reports, "Few US business leaders have courted China as assiduously" as Paulson, and "those ties could prove crucial as the administration deals with China's emergence as an economic powerhouse." Paulson 'says he has traveled to China more than 70 times in the past 15 years, rubbing shoulders with the country's political, financial and academic elite, both as chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and as a director of the Nature Conservancy, an environmental group." Paulson's "ties could be pivotal as the US tries to navigate its delicate relationship with China -- a country that puts a premium on loyalty among its foreign friends and where personal credibility counts for more than a corporate title."

Bush Said To Have Lied About Snow's Resignation. The Washington Post (6/2, Froomkin, 744K) reports in its online "White House Briefing" that when "asked about Treasury Secretary John Snow's future last week, President Bush could easily have ducked the question, or told the truth -- but instead, he chose to lie about it." There's "really no other way to describe what Bush said Thursday. Press secretary Tony Snow's widely-quoted explanation that Bush's statement was in some way 'artfully worded' is just plain wrong." When asked at his joint press conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair if Treasury Secretary Snow had given him "any indication that he intends to leave his job any time soon," Bush said, "No, he has not talked to me about resignation. I think he's doing a fine job."

More Commentary On Paulson. In the New York Times (6/2, 1.19M), , Paul Krugman writes a memo to Paulson, "So you decided to take the job, after all. It's no surprise that they wanted you. As the joke that's making the rounds puts it, they're so desperate they're scraping the top of the barrel. But most of us are surprised that you accepted." He adds, "Before we get to the specifics, you need to disabuse yourself of any illusion that this administration rewards loyalty. … Right now, you're being flattered. You have a natural urge to be a team player. But if you play the game your new bosses want you to play, your credibility with the public will evaporate in no time at all. And when you're no longer useful to your new friends, you'll be tossed aside."

Kavanaugh Sworn In As US Appeals Court Judge. CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush today sealed a victory in his drive to put a more conservative stamp on the nation's courts. He hosted the swearing in ceremony for new U.S. Appeals Court Judge Brett Kavanaugh. Kavanaugh is a former White House aide who once worked for the independent counsel Ken Starr in his investigation of President Clinton." Kavanaugh "won confirmation despite critics who complained he was too political and inexperienced for the bench." Bush "urged the Senate to give more of his stalled judicial nominees the green light."

The AP (6/2, Riechmann) says presidents "usually are not present when new judges take their oaths. But Kavanaugh, whose nomination was opposed by Democrats, has worked at the White House for the past five years -- in the White House counsel's office and as staff secretary."

34% Rate Bush As Worst President In 60 Years. CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Blitzer) reported that a new poll finds that "registered voters rate President Bush as…the worst president in the last six decades. The Quinnipiac University poll shows 34 percent of voters put Mr. Bush at the top of the list of worst presidents. Richard Nixon comes in second with 17 percent. Who was the best president? Twenty-eight percent of the voters surveyed say it was Ronald Reagan. Twenty-five percent say it was Bill Clinton, but another 16 percent of voters rated Clinton as the worst president, whatever that means."

Reid's Office Admits Misstating Ethics Rules For Boxing Tickets. The New York Times (6/2, 1.19M) runs a version of the AP story that was first distributed yesterday, noting that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's office "acknowledged Wednesday night that he had misstated the ethics rules governing his acceptance of free boxing tickets and had decided to avoid taking such gifts in the future." Several "ethics experts criticized Mr. Reid's rationale that he felt obligated to take the tickets to ensure that boxing was being properly conducted in his home state."

Hastert Becomes Longest-Serving GOP Speaker. The AP (6/2, Abrams) reports Rep. Dennis Hastert, "who vaulted out of political obscurity when Newt Gingrich resigned as speaker of the House more than seven years ago, on Thursday became the longest-serving Republican speaker in history." Hastert, 64, "surpasses fellow Illinoisan Joseph 'Uncle Joe' Cannon, a pugnacious politician who ruled the House from November 1903 until the Democrats regained the majority in March, 1911."

Air Force Fuel Bill Rises With Oil Prices. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 6, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported "gasoline prices in this country are likely to remain high, at least through the summer. And Americans will also be footing the bill for the US military's soaring fuel bill." CBS (Martin) added, "The Air Force burns more than three billion gallons of fuel a year, and every time the cost of oil goes up $10 a barrel, the fuel bill goes up $600 million."

Medicare Posts Prices On 30 Surgical Procedures Online. USA Today (6/2, Appleby, 2.31M) reports the prices Medicare "pays for hip replacements, cardiac surgery and 28 other procedures in each of the nation's counties went online Thursday, in the government's first effort to post hospital price information for consumers." The "move comes as employers and others who pay the nation's $1.9 trillion health care tab encourage patients to be more like savvy shoppers when it comes to medical care, currently a difficult prospect because so little comparative information on cost and quality is available." Employers groups say that "the federal government, the nation's largest purchaser of health care, is posting such information on its Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services website is important."

USA Today Says Ethics Reform Legislation For Show Purposes Only. USA Today (6/2, 2.31M) says in an editorial that Congress' response to scandal of Jack Abramoff's 2002 Scotland golfing trip has been "well, not much. In separate 'lobbying reform' bills crawling through the legislative process, the House of Representatives and Senate leave many of the loopholes allowing members and their staff to accept gifts from lobbyists well above the stated $50 limit. These include sham trips, bargain rates on jets, and premium seats for major sporting events and concerts." The legislation "has one objective: to make it appear as if a scandal-racked Congress is doing something in an election year. But the fact is that many members of Congress feel cruelly cheated by the $165,200 annual salary they have voted for themselves and harbor a sense of entitlement to supplement their incomes with freebies."

OTHER NEWS:

Data Suggest Economy Is Slowing. USA Today (6/2, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "The economy is cooling from the torrid pace of earlier this year, with home construction, housing price gains and manufacturing activity starting to slow, according to government and private data released Thursday. Factories are paying more for materials. Labor costs are rising more slowly than previously estimated -- bad news for workers who have seen wages lag but a signal that inflation pressures aren't mounting." Economists said "the reports add credence to the Federal Reserve's prediction that the economy will slow in the second half of the year but added it's not yet clear where inflation is headed."

The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Conkey, 2.11M) runs a similar report titled "Data Indicate Economy Is Cooling," and the Washington Post (6/2, D1, Fleishman, 744K) notes "US home prices continued to rise in the first quarter of the year, but in another sign of a cooling market the pace slowed from the last quarter of 2005, according to a report released yesterday." Home prices "nationally were 12.5 percent higher in the first quarter than a year earlier, according to the survey released by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. In 2005, the average home price jumped about 13.3 percent."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (6/2, Trumbull, 61K) reports on "a common quandary in today's economy. On average, American paychecks are rising, as employers offer higher salaries to attract and retain staff. At the same time, inflation has been heating up, burning a bigger hole in consumers' pockets. The result is a dynamic that's challenging for workers and potentially risky for the economy."

Reports Suggest Inflationary Pressure Easing, Boosting Stocks. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Browning, 2.11M) reports, "A fresh batch of economic reports spurred hopes that inflationary pressure might be easing, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average, which has been under pressure for almost a month, rose 91.97 points, or 0.82%, to 11260.28. It is up 5.1% this year." Investors "shifted money to stocks they had fled. The Nasdaq Composite Index, whose beleaguered technology stocks had pushed it into the red for 2006, surged 1.88%, or 40.98 points, to 2219.86. It is up for the year again, by 0.7%." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, "whose 3.1% May decline was its worst monthly drop in two years, rose 1.23%, or 15.62 points, to 1285.71, up 3% for 2006." USA Today (6/2, Shell, 2.31M) also reports the stock numbers.

US Automaker Sales Continue To Slump. ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 10, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was more bad news for the American auto industry today. General Motors and Chrysler posted double-digit declines in sales for May. Sales at Ford also fell, all as a result of high fuel prices and increasing demand for fuel-efficient vehicles. Toyota and Honda reported large sales increases."

More Commentary On Economy. In a column titled "Economy Holds Good News -- For The Rich," Julianne Malveaux writes in USA Today (6/2, 2.31M), "The average American has not experienced much good economic news lately. The wealth gap is growing. Median family income has been dropping. Meanwhile, gasoline prices are up 36% from a year ago. With interest rates rising, those with adjustable rate mortgages face higher payments, and residential rents also are nudging up. Incomes are not keeping pace with inflation, and the job market is weak."

Author Charles R. Morris writes in the New York Times (6/2, Morris, 1.19M) notes that May "saw one of the sharpest drops in consumer confidence since the recessions of 1979-1982. But those were truly dreadful times. Oil prices tripled, rates on home mortgages shot into the mid-teens, the stock market was a disaster area and unemployment rates reached double digits. Over the past three years, by contrast, American economic performance has been almost glittering." There are "parallels with another historical period, however, that suggest the deeper currents of uneasiness. Pan the camera back to Pittsburgh, July 1877. … But why did people feel so miserable? Partly they were confused by prices, which were dropping sharply. Farmers thought falling grain prices meant they were getting poorer, without noticing that the price of everything else was falling too. Farmers' terms of trade -- the price differences between what they sold and what they bought -- actually racked up solid gains in the 1870's."

US Foster Care System Examined. ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 9, 2:45, Gibson) reported, "500,000 children are in foster care right now a number that has doubled in 20 years. And one of the most troubling aspects of the system -- how so many children are moved from family-to-family, never finding a real home." ABC (Sawyer) added, "They are witness to a searing truth, how the most fragile, abused and neglected children in the country, are bounced from home-to-home, with devastating results, in the American foster care system." And the "more placements, say the experts, the worse the outcome. One study shows there's twice as much posttraumatic stress disorder in foster kids as there is in veterans of US wars." There is now a "pioneering approach that respects the attachment a child has to a biological parent. A team of counselors surrounds and guides both parent and child. And it costs no more than the foster care which can have such disastrous results."

New York Comptroller Apologizes For Remark About Shooting Bush. The AP (6/2, Goldman) reports New York State Comptroller Alan Hevesi "publicly apologized Thursday for a 'beyond dumb' remark about a fellow Democrat 'putting a bullet between the president's eyes.'" Hevesi "hastily called a mea culpa press conference hours after putting his foot in his mouth at the Queens College commencement." In the videotaped speech, Hevesi "describes Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., as, 'the man who, how do I phrase this diplomatically, who will put a bullet between the president's eyes if he could get away with it.'" At the news conference, "a contrite Hevesi said he was trying to convey that Schumer has the strength and courage to stand up to the president." Hevesi "apologized to Bush and Schumer and said he is 'not a person of violence.'"

New York Republicans Fear Political Clout May Be Slipping Away. The New York Times (6/2, Cooper, 1.19M) reports, "Twelve years ago, when they gathered at their state convention, Republicans were so hungry to retake the governorship that party bosses led by Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato brokered a deal to spare George E. Pataki a primary against his fiercest opponent." But when Hew York Republicans met "Thursday to choose a new candidate for governor, the party found itself dispirited and deeply divided. Last-minute efforts by Governor Pataki, a lame duck, and other party leaders to avoid a potentially damaging primary fell apart. And the leadership's favored candidate for governor, William F. Weld, finished a distant second, earning a spot on the primary ballot but failing in his bid to be the party's designee." The Times adds that "many Republicans here said privately that they feared their 12-year run of good fortune was coming to an end. … Many Republicans, from state senators to consultants to county chairmen to a former Pataki administration official, said privately that some of the blame lay with Governor Pataki. They used phrases like 'train wreck' to describe the party and 'lack of leadership' to describe the governor's stewardship of it."

Faso, Weld Win Spots On GOP Gubernatorial Ballot. The AP (6/2, Gormley) reports that New York Republicans "on Thursday designated former Assembly minority leader John Faso as their candidate for governor but gave enough support to former Massachusetts Gov. Bill Weld for a spot on the primary ballot. Faso became the party designee by receiving more than 50 percent of the weighted vote after negotiations that went into the early morning and included Gov. George Pataki, said state Republican Chairman Stephen Minarik. Faso, who had lost a December straw poll, came away Thursday with 59.5 percent of the weighted vote to Weld's 40.5 percent. 'Today we begin a battle for the hearts and minds of our fellow New Yorkers,' Faso said. 'Our message is clear: We need to cut taxes, we need to create jobs and we need to restore opportunity, and we need to reform New York state's government.'"

Bloomberg (6/2, Bensinger) notes that Faso "also has the endorsement of the state Conservative Party, which has backed every successful statewide Republican candidate for the past 30 years. Weld has been dogged by questions about his presidency of Decker College a Kentucky trade school, which fell into bankruptcy a month after he resigned. The Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating the school for fraud." State Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno (R) "said Faso's win 'was a very decisive vote.' Without saying whether he would ask Weld to withdraw, Bruno described Faso as 'the nominee.' Weld said he would stay in the race. 'This is the first day of the rest of the campaign,' he told reporters. 'I will predict with some assurance that I will win the primary.' Faso said, 'I would certainly like to avoid a primary, but if we have one, so be it.'"

Supreme Court Decisions Could Become 2006 Issue. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports that the Supreme Court under Chief Justice John Roberts "looms as factor in 2006 elections. Justices prepare to rule on series of controversial issues at close of first session under Bush's new chief justice. Each side hopes that decisions, to be issued at 10 a.m. each Monday this month, will fire up ideological base as Republican and Democratic candidates square off for control of Congress." Rulings are "expected on military trials for Guantanamo detainees, Texas redistricting driven by DeLay, Vermont's campaign-finance laws, and application of Clean Air Act. With O'Connor gone, close cases may turn on maverick Justice Kennedy, who has infuriated conservatives by citing international law and opposing a voter initiative challenging gay rights."

Iraq Vote Seen As Putting Senators Eyeing '08 Bids At Disadvantage Over Governors. The New York Times (6/2, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports, "With Iraq looming yet again over an American presidential campaign, senators considering a White House race are at a disadvantage over governors who might run, forced to explain their votes -- and in some cases, alter their views -- on an increasingly unpopular war." The Times notes that Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "have encountered hecklers protesting their support for the Iraq war." Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D) and ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D) now "say they regret voting for the war. Both have called for setting a deadline to withdraw American troops." Meanwhile, "governors are finding considerable maneuvering room when it comes to Iraq. And they are taking advantage of it for now." For example, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) "declined to say in an interview how he would have voted on the war." Vilsack said, "If we're looking at the elections of 2006 and 2008, I think it's important to look to the future and learn from whatever mistakes we made in the past." And ex-Virginia Gov. Mark Warner (D) said of the war in Iraq, "My sense is going out without a plan is just as bad as going in without a plan. So I have not been one of those people who say that come heck or high water, we are going to leave by a fixed date."

Kerry Lambastes Bush Administration Over Iraq Policies. The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Khalil, 958K) reports that Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D), in a speech Thursday in Los Angeles, "harshly criticized the Bush administration for 'disdaining diplomacy' in favor of a confrontational and unilateral foreign policy that has hurt the United States' standing around the world and made it less safe." Kerry "warned that the mistakes of Iraq must not be repeated in the current standoff with Iran. 'War is the ultimate failure of diplomacy,' Kerry told a gathering of the Pacific Council on International Policy. 'Yet our current leadership has arrogantly discarded this basic principle." Kerry said the result "was an ill-advised rush to war in Iraq that alienated other governments and diminished sympathy for the U.S. generated by the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. America's current isolation, and the presence of thousands of U.S. troops in Iraq, is 'playing right into Iranian hands,'" said Kerry. The senator "said he would attach an amendment to this summer's defense appropriations bill calling for a total withdrawal of U.S. combat troops by the end of this year. But he acknowledged that the idea would be unpopular. 'I know I'm not going to get the majority of my own caucus.'"

First Plame Book Deal Falls Through. The New York Times (6/2, Rich, 1.19M) reports the "$2.5 million book deal that Valerie Plame Wilson, the former Central Intelligence Agency officer whose identity was publicly disclosed three years ago, negotiated with Crown Publishing Group last month has fallen through." Wilson, who "could not agree on terms with Crown, is now in exclusive negotiations with Simon & Schuster, which originally had lost an auction for the book to Crown."

NYTimes Backs Courts For Striking Down AIDS Funding Rule. The New York Times (6/2, 1.19M) says in an editorial that "Federal judges in New York and the District of Columbia have declared unconstitutional a 2003 rule that limits the way U.S. health groups spend their privately raised money if they want to get federal money for international AIDS work." The rule required "nonprofits that want government support" to "sign a pledge saying they oppose prostitution and will not spend any money — public or private — on programs the government does not approve of." By "declaring that government may not use its spending clout to compel or coerce private speech, the new decisions have vindicated an important constitutional principle, while removing at least one impediment for health groups trying to reach a high-risk community, and save lives."

WPost Says More Money Needed To Combat AIDS. The Washington Post (6/2, A18, 744K) says in an editorial that the UN target "of mobilizing $7 billion to $10 billion per year has been met: Last year low- and middle-income countries spent $2.5 billion of their own money and an additional $5.8 billion from donors on AIDS treatment and prevention and the care of orphans. But that money has bought less than expected. Rather than hitting the 'three by five' target of getting medicines to 3 million people by 2005, the world has put only about 1.4 million people on treatment -- a big improvement on the 240,000 who were receiving drugs in 2001 but still well less than half of the number who need medicines immediately. Equally, better-financed prevention efforts have succeeded in driving down infection rates among young adults, notably in Kenya, Uganda, Zimbabwe and Haiti. But last year there were 4.1 million new infections worldwide. The plague is still advancing."

Russia, China Back Package Of Incentives, Penalties For Iran. CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Blitzer) reported that "the United States and five other world powers appear ready to formally make an offer to Iran." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "and other officials reportedly have reached what is being described as a substantial agreement on a package of incentives and penalties to formally be presented to Iran. If Iran is to accept those penalties and those incentives, the whole package, the U.S. presumably would start direct talks with Iran, the first time in more than two decades." CNN (Ensor) added that the announcement is "something of a success for American diplomacy."

NBC Nightly News (6/1, story 5, 1:20, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "Russia has now said they will join these talks in trying to pressure Iran; China not so sure yet after a conversation between President Bush and the Chinese leader today. What does Iran get? Iran gets a possible trade deal, airplane parts, a lifting of sanctions, and a suspension of all action at the United Nations if it gives up its nuclear research and sits down to talk."

ABC World News Tonight (6/1, story 4, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Vienna, Austria, and the US and five other world powers, including Russia and China, have agreed upon a package of incentives to convince Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment program."

The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Rubin, 958K) says "few details of the agreement were forthcoming, and British Foreign Minister Margaret Beckett, who announced the deal in muted language, cautioned that negotiators wanted to present the package to the Iranians before making it public." But "diplomats close to the issue said incentives were similar to past proposals, including helping Iran obtain a civilian nuclear reactor." Fox News' Special Report (6/1, Cameron) reported, "Officials said the package will be revealed publicly after their presentation to Iran. Some incentives include allowing Iran to have a water reactor and a supply of fuel so it would not need to enrich uranium itself. Sanctions include a ban on Iranian visas."

The Financial Times (6/2, Khalaf) reports the "rare show of international unity will substantially raise the diplomatic pressure on the Islamic Republic," while the New York Times (6/2, Shanker, Sciolino, 1.19M) notes "the word 'sanctions' was not uttered in the public dialogue on Thursday, perhaps in an effort to avoid giving Iran an obvious target for early objections." The "emphasis of the agreement on Thursday was less on how to punish Iran, than on how to reward it for agreeing to freeze its enrichment-related activities." Undersecretary Burns, when "pressed on whether the six nations had reached full consensus on Thursday, …expressed broad satisfaction. 'We are very satisfied by the results of today's meetings here in Vienna,' he said. 'We consider them a step forward in our quest to deny Iran a nuclear weapons capability.'"

The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Solomon, Spindle, Iran, 2.11M) says the deal "sought to buttress a pledge by the Bush administration to engage directly with Iran should it agree to give up uranium enrichment work," and it "provides Tehran with a clear path to reintegrating with the global community should it agree to talk." Undersecretary Burns is quoted calling the agreement "a step forward in our quest to deny Iran a nuclear-weapons capability," and said discussions had been "by far the most substantive and…concrete" to date.

Meanwhile, Iranian officials yesterday welcomed the US offer to negotiate over its nuclear program but declined to stop enriching uranium. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 4, 1:40, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "The Iranians had a mixed answer about the US offer for direct talks about their nuclear program. Yes, they'd love to talk. But, no, not if they have to stop enriching uranium to do it." President Bush: "My reaction is the choice is theirs, and we'll see whether or not that is the firm position of their government." Axelrod: "The President's position was strengthened in Vienna tonight. The US reached an agreement with Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, and China on a unified approach to Iran: Stop enriching, negotiate, or, says the British foreign secretary, face further UN Security Council measures." Margaret Beckett, British Foreign Secretary: "We urge Iran to take the positive path." Axelrod: "Iran's response to the US was really no big surprise, but getting Russia and China to say that they're willing to join the US to tighten the pressure on Iran, that really was in doubt."

On its front page today, the Washington Post (6/2, A1, Kessler, 744K) says the deal "brings general unity to the countries' approach to Iran after months of discord, diplomats said. It is intended to sharpen the choice facing Iran, giving it a clear reason to opt for cooperation over confrontation on its nuclear program." The Post adds, "Aides to Rice said the deal also commits China and Russia to a long list of specific steps to punish Iran if it refuses to halt its enrichment program. … Analysts and diplomats described [Iranian] responses as preliminary. The most powerful elements of Iran's theocratic government remained silent on the US proposal and were said to be intensely engaged in the private consultations that precede major policy announcements in Tehran. The measured tenor of the Iranian diplomats' initial replies appeared to signal that their country was at least not dismissing the start of a process it had actively solicited in recent weeks, through back-channel messages seeking direct engagement with Washington."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/1, Roberts) reported, "This is a very high-stakes game of chess. The prize, the support of Europe, Russia and China. And with Iran's insistence that it will not agree to talks with preconditions, the U.S., for the moment, appears to be winning. Iran's rejection of the White House offer was not just expected, it was part of the plan. According to administration officials, the entire goal of this new overture was meant to heighten awareness of the world to Iran's intransigence. … What looks on the surface like a softening of the U.S. position, the offer of face-to-face talks, is actually just another play in their game of diplomat hardball to force Iran to give up its nuclear program."

The Washington Times/AP (6/2, Gearan, Jahn) reports that at the White House, President Bush "warned that the confrontation would end up at the U.N. Security Council if Iran continues to enrich uranium. 'If they continue their obstinance, if they continue to say to the world, "'We really don't care what your opinion is," then the world is going to act in concert,' Mr. Bush said after meeting with his Cabinet."

More Commentary On Iran. William P. Kucewicz, editor of GeoInvestor.com, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M) that Rice, "in signaling a new US willingness to negotiate with Iran, also warned that 'international isolation and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions' would follow if Tehran defies its international obligations by continuing to develop nuclear weapons. … There's simply no getting around the fact that you can't eat petroleum. Iran's 132.5 trillion barrels in proved oil reserves -- 10.2% of the world total -- are of little benefit unless they're earning money. A trade embargo would hit Iran especially hard, because its economy and government budget are inordinately dependent on petrodollars. Oil shipments account for about 25% of GDP, represent 90% of total export earnings and provide as much as 50% of fiscal receipts." Iran "doesn't have the world over a barrel. It's the other way around. The economic and fiscal squeeze of new trade sanctions could indeed become so painful as to prompt regime change."

White House Turns Down North Korean Offer Of Bilateral Talks. The New York Times (6/2, Onishi, 1.19M) reports Pyongyang "on Thursday invited the top American nuclear envoy to visit its capital, Pyongyang, for bilateral talks, but the White House insisted that the North return to long-deadlocked six-nation talks instead. North Korea invited" Assistant Secretary Chris Hill "to Pyongyang, indicating that it wanted to discuss an agreement that was reached last September but never carried out." Press Secretary Tony Snow is quoted saying, "The United States is not going to engage in bilateral negotiations with the government of North Korea. The United States sticks by its position, which is, North Korea has to return to the six-party talks."

The Financial Times (6/2, Fifield) adds, "With the move, North Korea again demonstrated its capacity for wily negotiating as the invitation is unlikely to be accepted, enabling Kim Jong-il's regime to blame further the stand-off on the Bush administration."

Backers Of India Nuclear Deal Worry Opponents May Insert "Poison Pill." The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports, "Proponents fret about prospects for civilian nuclear deal with India. Pact opening up sale of U.S. technology is top Bush priority, and backers say it has majority support in Congress. But opponents could add 'poison pill' amendments that might force New Delhi to scotch agreement to separate civilian and military nuclear programs. Administration still hopes to win approval before the August recess, despite tight legislative calendar."

Bush May Criticize Putin's Human Rights Record. The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Harwood, 2.11M) reports President Bush "weighs human-rights digs of his own at Russia's Putin, who has turned increasingly autocratic. The president plans one-day stopover in Ukraine, Russia's adversary. Before July G-8 summit in St. Petersburg, U.S. officials may attend a gathering of democracy advocates organized by chess champion Garry Kasparov."

Bush Will Host Congolese President Monday. The AFP (6/2) reports President Bush "will welcome Congo's President Denis Sassou-Nguesso June 5 for talks on efforts to keep peace in Sudan's Darfur region, the White House said." Press Secretary Tony Snow is quoted saying, "The two leaders will discuss implementation of the May 5, 2006 Darfur Peace Agreement, NATO assistance to strengthen the African Union Mission in Sudan and the follow-on UN mission, United Nations authorization to promptly transition to a UN peacekeeping force." Sassou-Nguesso currently chairs the African Union.
